HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1867.

THE SECOND NUMBER of HARPER'S BAZAR, for November 9, will be issued on Tuesday, the 29th of October, after which time a Number will be published regularly every week.

Ladies in the Country will be supplied gratuitously through the mails with the FIRST SIX NUMBERS OF HARPER'S BAZAR upon written application to the Publishers.

Single Subscribers to HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied from the beginning to the end of the year 1868, which will complete the first Volume, for the yearly price of Four Dollars.

OUR BAZAR.

A BAZAR, in Oriental parlance, is not a vulgar market-place for the sale of fish, flesh, and fowl, but a vast repository for all the rare and costly things of earth—silks, velvets, cashmeres, spices, perfumes, and glittering gems; in a word, whatever can comfort the heart and delight the eye is found heaped up there in bewildering profusion.

Such a repository we wish Harper's Bazar to be, combining the useful with the beautiful, and aiming to include every thing that will be interesting to the family circle, for whose use it is designed. Being intended largely for ladies, it will devote a considerable space to the matters which fall particularly under their jurisdiction, such as dress, and household affairs. In this connection the fashions are naturally an important subject; three hundred millions of dollars being annually expended in this country for dry goods, the making up of which is executed or superintended almost wholly by the female portion of the household. Ladies are interested, therefore, in securing correct information as to the best and most economical mode of fashioning this vast amount of raw material; and especially in obtaining patterns and practical directions which will readily enable them to do this themselves or to have it done satisfactorily by others.

To supply this want we have perfected special arrangements with the leading European fashion journals, especially with the celebrated Bazar of Berlin, which supplies the fashions to the newspapers of Paris, whereby we receive the same fashions in advance, and publish them weekly, simultaneously with their appearance in Paris and Berlin, the great centres of European modes. This advantage is shared by no other newspaper in the country. Our readers will thus be sure of obtaining the genuine Paris fashions simultaneously with the Parisians themselves, instead of from stray journals three or four weeks old. That this is desirable no one can doubt who knows the popularity which every thing Parisian maintains in the world of fashion, or has seen the curiosity with which every lady's wardrobe is scrutinized on her return from Paris, with a view to copying the articles fresh from this great fashion emporium. We shall also give in each alternate number of our journal numerous patterns, accompanied with plain and practical directions, readily understood, which will enable every lady, if she chooses, to cut and make her own and her children's entire wardrobe, with much of that of her husband. Beautiful colored fashion-plates will likewise be presented from time to time to the patrons of Harper's Bazar.

With the Parisian modes will be combined a chronicle of the fashions most in vogue in New York, which in this respect may be styled the Paris of America. Fancy work of all kinds will also find room in our columns, together with every department of household affairs.

In a word, we propose to make the Bazar a first-class weekly newspaper of fashion—the only one in existence in this country—comprising all subjects that legitimately pertain to such a journal.

But while the fashions will be a leading feature of Harper's Bazar, they will not be its sole feature. The opinion is generally prevalent that a fashion journal is worth nothing as a literary authority. We hope to do something toward dispelling this prejudice, and proving that a family paper may devote special attention to a theme, the influence of which is so universal, without derogating from its claims to be considered an earnest and thoughtful exponent of public opinion. Harper's Bazar is designed to be a Family Journal, in the true sense of the word, and it is hoped that its literary merit will equal its practical utility. Serials, novellettes, poems, literary and art miscellany, familiar science, aesthetics, the current literature, new books, amusements, gardening, architecture, household literature—in short, all that is likely to interest the home circle will receive due notice. The children too will find that they have not been forgotten. We shall endeavor to maintain a spirit of pure and high-toned morality, and to exclude from our columns every thing that could offend the most fastidious taste; at the same time we shall avoid entering into sectarian or political discussion as being outside the province of our paper.

With the fervent wish that Harper's Bazar may accomplish at least part of our desires, and contribute to increase the happiness of American families, we commend its wares to the indulgence of the public.

EXPENSIVE MATRIMONY.

MARRIAGE is in a fair way, just now, to become a standard topic for newspaper treatment. Half the editors in this land of critics are most gravely discussing the difficulties that are accumulating in the path leading to the bridal altar. We are glad to see the interest that is taken in this matter. Newspapers are the literature of common life; they are grand equalizers of intellect by radiating those general influences that concern every body's instincts, aims, and circumstances; and hence, if such evils as are peculiarly social and domestic are to be remedied, their agency is essential to the good work.

But we are not quite sure that this subject is properly handled. The most of our editorial brethren are disposed to lay the blame on the extravagance of the age, and particularly on the expensive habits of our ladies. The burden of complaint is every where the same. Editors from Maine to New Orleans, discoursing on this topic, write alike; and the same fact—viz., the excessive costliness of women—points the argument. If this is a true statement of the question we have not much to apprehend, as the evil will probably cure itself. Women will not be likely to risk their chances of marriage for the sake of indulging in extra show. The truth is, however, that the extravagance of the day is affecting the habits of our men more powerfully than those of our women. Luxury and fashion are costly things for both sexes. A woman's follies in the expenditure of money usually appear on her person and in some of her "surroundings;" but a man's follies are none the less dear because they are confined to the club-house or known only to his intimate friends. If, then, so many women are putting themselves out of the reach of matrimony by their high notions of style, is it not equally certain that just as many men—perhaps more—are voluntarily placing themselves in the same position by lavishing thousands per annum on their own precious selves?

The decrease of marriages in this country is obviously among our most prosperous classes, and it is comparatively limited to those sections which are accumulating wealth most rapidly. Men and women in these classes and sections are alike enriched by the growing fortunes of business and speculation. Sons and daughters share in the father's gains. How, then, can the evil bear on one sex to the exclusion of the other? Observation has long since taught us, that whenever families grow rich the sons are more extravagant than the daughters—they demand more money—they waste more money, simply because the ways and facilities for wasting it are much more numerous and accessible. The main reason, therefore, why the number of marriages in this class of our population is declining is because the men choose to have it so, and not because the women are beyond their capacity to support. Three-fourths of the bachelors of our acquaintance are rich enough to bear the expense even of the most fashionable women; and, what is equally certain, they are bachelors just because they are rich. Wealth often indisposes men to marry, but it rarely has this effect on women. At the period of life when marriage begins to charm the fancy and awaken the sensibilities our fast young men are preoccupied. They have already, in most cases, surrendered their souls to other captors. Dissipation and licentiousness have utterly unfitted them for poetry and love, and they vastly prefer a midnight debauch to the pleasures of the fireside and the companionship of a devoted wife. Talk as we may, then, of the extravagance of the age, it is corrupting our men far more than our women; and it does this, not only by its direct consequences, but by fostering a cold, callous, vicious-heartedness, which makes matrimony too much of a conscience and a restraint for their unbridled passions.

Men soon outlive the sentiment of marriage. Nature provides for its early development and rapid growth. If between eighteen and twenty-five years of age young men are absorbed with their gross gratifications—or, if they are moral and have the excitements of fortune in possession or prospect—it commonly happens that marriage is much less attractive than it otherwise would prove. It is not felt as a present want of their whole being; and as marriage with men usually turns on thoughts and sentiments belonging to one given period of life, and not as with women by a sort of prophetic anticipation of what their nature will need for maturity and old age, the loss of youthful impressibility is rarely recovered. There have always been dissipated, licentious men. The fast age is as old as the world, so far as Smith or Jones has rioted in sensualism. But this fast age can not wait on advancing life as its predecessors did. It forestalls hope and heart. It is intensely eager for young blood and fresh souls. Premature sots, gamblers, rakes abound. Now, it is just here that the source of the decrease in marriages is to be found. Vice plucks out the hearts of hundreds of our young men—plucks them out by the roots—and leaves them no soul to admire and love virtuous women.

Marriage is God's law, and men are not to set it aside. In relation to his providential, earthly government, it holds a position somewhat analogous to religion in his moral and spiritual government. All civilized society is bound not only to recognize its sanctity, but to encourage the extension of its ties and the operation of its restraints over the largest possible number. The worst feature of the extravagance of the age is its influence on our domestic character; but let it be remembered that there is no sort of parallelism in its effects on the two sexes, for where one young lady is spoiled by it five young men are ruined.

SUITABLE DRESS.

THE uniformity of dress is a characteristic of the people of the United States. The man of leisure and the laborer, the mistress and the maid, wear clothes of the same material and cut. Political equality renders our countrymen and countrywomen averse to all distinctions of costume which may be supposed to indicate a difference of caste. The uniformity which results is not favorable to the picturesque, and our everyday world in America has, in consequence, the shabby look of being got up by the Jews in Chatham Street and turned out in a universal suit of second-hand clothing.

Our working-people, in vindicating their claims to social equality, by putting on their heads the stove-pipe hat and flimsy bonnet, and clothing their bodies in tight-fitting coats and flowing robes, not only interfere with the picturesque, which is of minor importance, but make, we think, an unwise sacrifice of comfort, convenience, and economy. What could be more unfavorable to that free movement of the muscles essential to those trades and occupations requiring the exercise of physical force than the scant coat and tight-fitting trousers now in vogue? It would be as well to put Hercules in a strait-jacket, and set him thus accounted to slay the hydra, as for our muscular sons of labor to clothe themselves in suits of fashionable cut, and so to strive at their mighty work. It is surprising that the blouse of the French workman is not generally adopted. Nothing can be more graceful, convenient, and economical. Its lines are flowing, its form admits of perfect freedom of movement, and it can be made of a material both cheap and lasting. Artists generally adopt the blouse for work in their studios, and thus guarantee its tastefulness as well as utility. The free American citizen has no reason to scorn it as a symbol of slavery. The French blouse has vindicated its title to the drapery of a freeman in many a bloody encounter with tyranny on the barricades and in the streets of Paris.

As for the suitability of the female dress of fashion to working-day purposes no one will venture, we suppose, to hold that crinoline is convenient in the china-closet or safe in the proximity of a red-hot stove, and that a flowing train of silk is the most appropriate broom for the kitchen floor. Crinoline and train, however, are constantly found in these inappropriate places and dangerous proximities. We can not for the world see why Bridget and Katarina, and their mistress too, indeed, when the occasion requires, should not dress appropriately—to their spheres we do not say, but to their occupations. They would be gainers in every respect—in taste, comfort, convenience, and economy. It is quite a mistake for the female servant to suppose that by spending her money in gaudy dress and mock finery she advances her social position, though with her rustling silk she may pass in the dark, or, coming out of the front-door on a Sunday, be taken at a distance for her mistress. She may spend a half year's wages on a flimsy bonnet, it will not avail her—the sham lady will still be manifest. If she has personal charms of her own and desires that they should be appreciated, let her take the advice of the tasteful, who will tell her that the rude freshness of natural beauty appears to the greatest advantage in a plain setting.

A white cap, a close-fitting jacket, with sleeves neither so tight as to hinder movement nor so loose as to lap up the gravy or sweep off the sherry glass, and a short skirt of simple stuff—plain or many-colored as it may be—make an appropriate costume for the household servant. Scraps of cotton lace, bits of bright ribbon, and collars and cuffs of linen, may be added according to the taste. Any one who has seen the picture of the Chocolate Girl of the Dresden Gallery will not doubt of the picturesque capabilities of a dress which was so effective in this particular instance that it procured a rich and titled husband for the original of the portrait.

The female cap should be insisted on as an essential to cleanliness by those who are not so sentimental as to prefer to receive daily pledges of the cook's affection in the shape of locks of hair in the soup.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a young Papa.

MY DEAR SIR,—You may have remarked that nothing is more comical than the free-and-easy way in which the independent American citizen behaves in the railroad car. The grave manner in which the presence of other people is wholly disregarded is—as you may have observed—often very diverting and sometimes very exasperating. You, my dear Sir, especially illustrated this great truth when you entered the train with your family at Mugby Junction a few weeks since, upon which occasion a select car-full had the honor of traveling in your company.

You are evidently, dear Sir, a young and recently-created papa, and therefore very much is to be forgiven to you, as even an old curmudgeon of a bachelor like your present correspondent will cheerfully allow. There were, if you will kindly remember, three ladies in your party and a boy of fourteen, and many bags, and bundles, and baskets, and what you were pleased to call "satchels"—but, chiefly, there was the baby. And here let a bachelor, not naturally savage, declare upon his honor to all traveling mothers with young children, that he does not, with the ferocious Charles Lamb, pledge the memory of the good king Herod, whenever he hears the cry of the baby in the car. Far from it. So far that there is nobody he pities more than the sensitive mother whose child will cry, and who struggles desperately to console him, with the harrowing consciousness that there are a remorseless multitude around her who are internally, or even audibly, wondering and peevishly demanding "why on earth women with young babies will be forever traveling in the cars! Cars are no places for babies. Nurseries are the places for babies. If babies must travel, why not provide a separate car?" Alas! so populous is the kingdom of Herod!

But, exasperated fellow-travelers, let us reflect. These poor mothers, often exhausted and hopelessly contending with poor babies equally exhausted, and hot, and suffocating, and uncomfortable, are to be soothed in every way and no derided and scolded. Do you suppose women prefer to travel with babies? And which, upon the whole, is the more edifying spectacle—an uncomfortable child tired and fretting, or a mature man querulous and sulky because of the fretting! If you observe the child do you suppose nobody observes you? Why, my dear fellow-bachelor and curmudgeon, we are all quietly watching and studying each other at the rate, as we fly, of twenty-five miles an hour.

Other women than the mothers understand this if the men do not. How often men turn round, and shrug their shoulders, and stare at the hapless mother vainly humming to her tired and restless child, while some woman, with a few gentle words of kindness or experience to the mother and of soothing to the child, consoles each, as if an angel had descended. I read in the reports of the suffrage debate in the New York Constitutional Convention a speech in which the orator said that women were so harsh and fierce in their judgments of each other, that if women should ever sit as jurors upon their accused sisters he could only say, "God have mercy upon the accused!" What a perpetual consolation to that eloquent orator it must be to know that Providence has graciously provided a sex to secure fair treatment to women—and that he belongs to it! But his experience is different from that of this bachelor who has never found the hands of women reluctant, nor their hearts chill, nor their tongues hesitating, whenever another woman was to be relieved. Who betray women? Who, when they are fallen, stretch out to them a helping hand? These last are they who in a crowded car sympathize with the travel-worn mothers whose children weep and wail.

One of these tender comforters was Barbara Lovewell. That was not her name, of course, but that was her nature. Barbara was neither young, when I first knew her, nor beautiful; nor was she ever married, nor in any manner graceful or personally attractive. But no sylph of Saratoga, no Newport belle, is likely to be the heroine of a truer romance than her life was—a romance and a tragedy which nobody suspected who had not heard her story. Once, indeed, it was told in the pages of Harper's Magazine, but under strange names and willful disguises so that you could only vaguely gather the substance of the truth. Barbara Lovewell was a heroine without knowing it, without caring about it. She was such a simple, earnest, honest soul, so interested in a thousand things, and so intelligent and full of sympathy, that her life and mind were always occupied, and she had no time to contemplate herself or to reflect that she had earned the right, if she could do it, to win the world to listen to her melodious woes.

When she was more than fifty—nearly sixty years old, indeed—she was traveling over one of the long Western railroads, and in a car very crowded and uncomfortable. Toward midnight a baby began to wail in the dim, hot car. In vain the mother tried to hush the child to sleep. The wail became a fret, and the fret a positive cry. The passengers began to awake, and to move, and mutter impatiently in their seats. In the stillness of the car the cry of the child seemed preternaturally loud, and the poor mother was at her wit's end. Suddenly a man's voice exclaimed from the dark end of the car, "Do stop that baby!" There was an audible "Amen" from many passengers, and a grunting and pishing which went to the very heart of the young mother. Nothing would appease the child. Singing, and trotting, and patting, and scolding, and changing his position, were tried in vain. He was fearfully wide awake, and his fretful cry was undeniably most disagreeable and disturbing. Then Barbara Lovewell, who sat at the end of the car from which the impatient voice of the man had proceeded, rose quietly and went to the mother, and said, gently, "Let me try to comfort your little boy." The mother looked her gratitude, and sitting down by her, Margaret put the child's head upon her bosom, and the kindly handling, the motion of the car, and the sweet sense of change immediately lulled the restless child to sleep. The whole car was relieved. There was a low murmur of gratitude from the passengers; and just as all were sinking again, like the child, to sleep, the silence was broken by an old gentleman who leaned over to Margaret and said to her, "Law, ma'am! how easy 'tis to see that you've put children to sleep all your life. Nothing like a grandma, ma'am, to put children to sleep!"

The children of Alice call Bartrum father, says Elia, in the Dream Children. Barbara Lovewell never knew the caress of a child of her own; but in the "undiscovered country" to which she has gone there could be no more childlike purity of soul than hers, and in this world no more loving and maternal heart.

Well, well! I have strayed very far from Mugby Junction and your interesting family group, my dear Sir, and we will return immediately. You remember that the three ladies of your party sat near the middle of the car and talked loud—I may even say sonorous—baby-talk to the baby, so that the whole company in the car were compelled to hear. The boy sat at the end of the car; and in the midst of the prattle and chuckling of the three ladies and the crowing of the baby, the boy suddenly broke in from near the door with a startling "Ah boo! Ah boo!" addressed to the baby. The astonished passengers stared, but the delighted infant responded, "Ah boo!" cheerily and incessantly answered from the end of the car by the boy. And you, dear Sir, joined with animation in the innocent round, and loudly cried, "Ah boo!" Ah boo!"

Were you unconscious of other persons in the car? Or didn't you care? Or did you suppose them to be delighted to share in the festive prattle of your nursery? Ah boo! my dear Sir; ah boo! Nothing, as you well know, if you would only reflect for a moment, can be more ill-bred than to thrust yourself and your little family upon the attention of others. Without the least consciousness of the fact, and, of course, with no such intention, you make them and yourself laughably ridiculous. Now, my dear young papa, you travel a great deal. I have met you elsewhere than at Mugby Junction. You have not thought of the very grotesque and unfavorable impression you have made; and I feel very sure you will feel that I have written this letter to reveal it to you because I am sincerely,

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

IN this our introductory we shall merely give a glance at the fashions in general as they now prevail in New York. In future numbers we shall narrate explicitly all the interesting details of a lady's toilet, giving each week descriptions of the new and beautiful garments fashioned by our leading modistes.

BONNETS.

To begin at the beginning, with the bonnet, that most important article of feminine dress, we have a decided change to record in the fall shapes, and for the winter still greater novelties are predicted. The "airy fairy" Fanchon, so long popular, is gradually being deposed by a much more stately bonnet, more in keeping with the picturesque costumes now worn. This bonnet is called the Marie Antoinette. The name of that unfortunate queen is given generally to the styles of the last century about to be revived—a name so fraught with interesting reminiscences that it will by mere association lend an additional charm to the question always dear to the feminine heart of "Wherewithal shall we be clothed?" The Marie Antoinette bonnet, with all its variations of Mousquetaire, Marquise, and Princess Caroline, has a narrow brim, short ears, and a broad, flat crown without the least semblance of a curtain. It is worn farther on the top and front of the head than were the shapes of last season, and fits closely over the chignon. Broad bandeaux of gilt or of velvet, and wreaths of flowers, forming an elaborate diadem, are placed over the forehead. This diadem is the most noticeable characteristic of the new shapes, and this it is that gives the stately appearance requisite. The strings are also an important feature in the new chapeau. It has usually two or three pairs of strings, intended for service as well as ornament, as they are really required to hold the short ears in proper position. The narrow ribbons that serve to tie the bonnet at the throat are fringed or ornamented with embroidery and lace. The over-strings are of real lace with velvet ribbon insertion, or wide scarfs of colored tulle beaded with jet and gilt or dew-dropped with crystal, arranged in the Spanish fashion over the back of the bonnet.

The Fanchon still lingers with us in a slightly changed form. It used to be a matter of some doubt which was the front and which the rear of this bonnet; but as now worn the Marie Stuart point still remains in front, while the back is shorn of its point, being entirely straight on the chignon.

The Trianon, a cross between the Fanchon and Marie Antoinette, will be a favorite with those who dislike to be the first by whom the new style is tried.

In trimmings there is great variety. Feathers are not so much used as they will be later in the season. Flowers are in profusion every where. Many bonnets are simply frames covered with velvet heart's-ease or daisies. There are new designs in flowers of gilt and velvet, and many novelties in leaves and berries—wreaths of leaves of all the varied shades of the autumn forest—metallic berries, bronzed, red, and fire color, with clusters of golden wheat, grapes, acorns, and thistles of downy marabouts. Gilt ornaments of every description are in high favor; jet and pearl are used abundantly; amber has disappeared. Ribbons are but little used for trimming, and only in narrow widths. There are, however, some pretty shaded and fringed ribbons very effectively introduced as scarfs on the new bonnets.

In round hats white felt is the favorite material. Bronzed straws are worn with Bismarck suits. It is useless to name a hat, as each milliner has a different name of her own. One pretty style has a shallow crown and narrow brim; another has a half high crown and turned up brim. Wreaths of leaves and bandeaux of shirred velvet, with a rosette or an aigrette at the side, are the trimmings. Ostrich feathers and willow plumes are too large for these tiny chapeaux, and are superseded by small tufts of marabout and cock's feathers.

DRESSES.

The picturesque gored dress continues to be the approved style. This is not only a graceful but a sensible fashion, as it does away with the absurd practice of gathering into a few inches at the waist the same quantity of material that is made to cover a large space on the floor.

THE CORSAJE.

There is a return to the short waists of the "Empire." The corsage is short on the shoulder and under the arm, and rounded at the waist to be worn with a wide belt. Small reversed collars are worn with chemisettes half high at the throat. Many dresses are cut away square à la Pompadour, but the high standing collar vandyked or scalloped and bound to match the trimming on sleeves and skirt is more stylish. For evening dress the neck is cut square and very low indeed.

The Marie Antoinette fichu, which crosses in front of the corsage and falls into long rounded streamers tied negligently at the back, is made of the same material as the dress, and is decidedly an ornamental addition. Waist-belts are wide and much trimmed with tasseled fringe and jet pendants. Wide sashes of lace or ribbon are tied behind in a large bow.

SLEEVES.

Coat sleeves are still worn and are gradually narrowing to the tight sleeve of the Empire. Flowing sleeves are only suitable for full dress. In their proper sphere they are graceful and becoming, but are in bad taste for home dress, where comfort and convenience are the great consideration. They are cut quite short on the forearm, sloping gradually away to a point at the back and are very much trimmed inside. Puffs and caps at the top of the coat sleeves are but little used.

SKIRTS.

Gored skirts are made with long trains for full dress. They are gored to fit plain in front and at the sides; but the two back widths are left entire and plaited or gathered in at the waist in order to give the proper fullness to the train. In very long trains these back widths are sometimes cut off square to prevent them from curling up as pointed trains are apt to do. The front and sides are quite short—gradually sloping longer toward the back, giving a graceful sweep to the train. When two skirts are used the upper one is looped up at the sides or caught up in a loose knot behind, à la benoiton.

Indoor dresses for demi-toilette have plain gored skirts just long enough to escape the floor.

WALKING DRESSES.

Short dresses for walking have become indispensable articles in a lady's wardrobe. Short enough to escape the rubbish on the sidewalk, yet sufficiently long to be modest, they relieve the hands of the onerous task of holding up voluminous skirts, and dispense with the trouble of looping, and are withal so trim and jaunty that they would have found their way into favor had there been nothing to commend them on the score of availability. The double skirt, always popular in Paris, has found a rival here in single skirts with trimming arranged to simulate an upper skirt. The handsomest designs are the costumes in two colors—the embroidered petticoat of blue, green, or Bismarck, with black pardsus over it—a combination of the Swiss peasant bodice and peplum.

SACQUES AND PALETOTS.

Short paletots are worn with walking dresses, and are variations of last winter's styles. The mantilla paletot has long lappets in front resembling a mantle, but the back is straight and short. A long loose sacque called the Gabrielle is worn with suits. It reaches to the knee, and is confined at the waist by a wide belt fastened behind with a large bow and ends. A tight-fitting pelisse with cape is also worn.

THE BRETON JACKET.

The Breton Jacket introduced last season is, mirabile dictu, still a favorite. It is a piquante little garment specially intended for morning wear, made of scarlet, black, or blue cloth embroidered in bright colors. Jet and gilt beads and tinsel braid are also introduced into the trimming. It was this coquettish little garment that first brought about the rage for colored embroidery which is now so universal.

COLORS.

Bismarck, or gold-brown, is the prevailing shade, and reappears in some guise almost every where. The new shades of green are its only formidable rivals. The deep green known as Invisible, now called "Mermaid," is in great favor. There are a variety of lighter shades for evening wear—yellowish greens, prettier than one would imagine—and really beautiful by gaslight—these are "Pistache," "Frog," "Butter," and "Chou," cabbage—names certainly not very attractive in the abstract, but which will on examination commend themselves as perfectly appropriate.

DRESS GOODS.

Silks are either brocaded or embroidered by hand. Decided contrast is the rule in brocades. Black and Bismarck grounds are strewn with flowers of brilliant hues—half-blown roses, heath-cells, daisies, and convolvulus; autumn leaves are scattered on a Marie Louise blue; gilt and blue figures on a white ground, and a white or amber design on black.

Handsome and more expensive than the brocades are the embroidered robes. Heavy corded silks, Bismarck or black grounds, are worked with the needle on the front, back, and two side breadths, in pyramids of flowers, so beautiful and lifelike that a perfume is only needed to persuade one that they are real.

POULT DE SOIE ANTIQUE.

In plain colors there is a novelty called poult de soie antique, a thick corded silk with the lustre of satin. This is brought out in the quaint old colors worn by our grandmothers—blue-black, dead-brown, invisible-green, or mermaid, and of course the inevitable Bismarck. The quiet colors of this elegant material make it particularly desirable for handsome walking dresses.

THE CHAMELEON.

An appropriate name for another novelty is the chameleon, a revival of the changeable silks, that take new tints in different lights. The combinations of color in these silks is most exquisite, and the ingenious French, with their talent for nomenclature, have given them separate cognomens, viz.: "Sunrise," a pearly gray combined with rose color; "Sunset," a golden hue in one light, purple and azure in another; and a "Moonlight," whose glimmering is too intangible to admit of description.

Among other new fabrics is the magnificent "Antwerp" silk, thick enough to stand alone, a yard and a half wide, and worth the price asked for it—twenty-five dollars per yard. Another novelty is Holland satin, a reversible material, satin upon one side and silk on the other. Drap de la Reine is corded diagonally on one surface only.

WOOLENS.

In woolen goods brown and Russian gray predominate. Merchants say they are selling ten pieces of Bismarck to one of any other color. There has been imported a larger assortment of bright plaids than at any previous season. Knotted velours, with a raised white dash, are pretty and durable, and are sold at two dollars and a half a yard. Shaded velours are a welcome change from the plain velours so long worn. Empress cloth is brought out in Cashmere patterns, and is preferable to the real Cashmere, as it is thicker and warmer. A new article of twilled winsey, a mixed gray and black, is well adapted to walking suits, as it is perfectly waterproof. Blue serge, and gold color with black, are much admired.

There is considerable variety in poplins. The chené is in grave shades of purple, green, and brown with white, while the plaids are in every color of the rainbow. In solid colors there is a French poplin that many consider superior to Pym's best Irish; it has smoother threads, is softer, and falls into more graceful folds.

TRIMMINGS.

Cross cut folds of satin with a heading of lace, or a narrow piping of the material of the dress placed in the centre, is a fashionable trimming. These folds are put on straight with pointed leaves at intervals on either side. Pippings of silk are braided together an inch in width. Vandyked and castellated points of silk neatly bound are sewn around sacques and on sleeves. Elegant jet fringes and gimp are among the novelties. Amber has disappeared, but gold ornaments are used profusely. Embroidery is, however, the ruling passion of the hour. The Oriental patterns are in all colors. The work is beautifully executed, and the colors selected with artistic skill, yet the effect is not good. A French mixture of crochet work and embroidery in fine jet and black silk, or in silk of any one shade, is in better taste. The eye will follow the fashion, and we shall in time probably come to admire the brilliant variety of colors, but at present it is a little too prononcée to meet with approval.

CRINOLINE.

Crinoline has grown beautifully less until it is as small as can possibly be worn. The standard skirt for ordinary toilette measures only two yards round the bottom, and those for ceremonious occasions only three yards, which, of course, affords but little assistance in managing a train.

Under-skirts, even those of fine muslin, should be gored. Any gathers about the hips spoil the effect of the gored dress. The Boulevard skirt, made of felt, entirely seamless and shaped on a frame, is an improvement on the full bal-moral.

CLOAKS.

It is rather early to say which of the many designs in cloaks will meet the most favor, but it is positively known that all are to be longer and looser than those of last year. In many imported cloaks the added length is entirely confined to the front. The long tabs and points that reach almost to the floor in front slope upward in the back until they barely conceal the waist. This is another innovation which looks exceedingly grotesque now, but to which time will probably reconcile us. Tufted cloths are not so popular as they were last winter, and have given place to smooth surfaces on which immense quantities of trimming are lavished. The favorite colors are black, brown, and purple; gray has lost favor. Cloth is trimmed with a heavy silk braid, varying from an eighth of an inch to an inch and a half in width. Velvet is profusely ornamented with embroidery and lace. Very few circulars are imported—the gored sacque with flowing sleeves being the genus of which there are innumerable species.

LACES.

A love for beautiful laces is becoming a mania with ladies nowadays. Nothing tells more in a lady's costume than the lace she wears: let that be inferior, and the richest velvets and jewels will not shield her from criticism; while real lace, of no matter how small a quantity, gives a better tone to the most ordinary material. Point Gaze, the handsomest of all laces, is beautifully brought out in patterns of fern-leaves and medallions. The Point Gaze for a trousseau, consisting of a flounce for the bridal dress, with narrower lace for garniture, a shawl, fan, and parasol-cover, and long barb, all woven in the same exquisite pattern, is marked at two thousand dollars. A Point mantle, quite large, yet of such gossamer texture that it might be drawn through a finger-ring, had two hundred medallions, each of a different pattern. The price of this beautiful work of art is twenty-five hundred dollars. A parasol of Point d'Alençon, with pearl stem and coral handle, is marked six hundred dollars.

The Shakspeare style is most popular for collars of fine lace. Standing collars, embroidered in Vandykes and edged with Valenciennes, are pretty and stylish. A small chemisette, worn inside the dress, is attached to hold them in position.

Veils of real lace are small and square, with the lower edge deeply pointed. Long barbes are tied at the back with bow and streamers, or merely fastened with ornaments of jet or pearl.

GLOVES.

Gloves are longer at the wrist, and ornamented on the back with embroidered crests and ciphers in contrasting colors, and stitching in a Grecian pattern. Substantial studs and hooks are used as fastenings, but the handsomest are drawn together by tasseled turrets. Tiny eyelets of gilt or silver are laced together on the back of the glove by a silk cord with tassels. Etna and Vesuvius browns—redder tints than Bismarck, are the favorite shades. White gloves, hitherto so plain, are ornamented with turrets and tassels to match the lacing on the back. Gloves intended for evening wear extend half way to the elbow, and are fastened with several studs.

PRICES.

There is not the general declension in prices that was anticipated. Silks remain at the high figures demanded in war times, and with the present enormous rates of duty there is little prospect of a change. A disease among the silk-worms of China and Japan has also materially affected the silk crop. Woolen goods vary but little from the usual standard. Domestic goods have decreased in price, almost reaching the low figures of the ante-war times.

Ladies Mantelet.

THIS mantelet is cut in imitation of a short paletot in front, with Greek sleeves, and is made of pearl gray ladies' cloth, trimmed with black guipure lace.

Promenade Dresses.

Fig. 1.—Gored dress of gray poplin, trimmed with black and white dotted ribbon, arranged in the form of a cross on a pedestal, and alternately reversed, as in the engraving.

Fig. 2.—Dress of violet silk, trimmed with violet velvet ribbon and crystal beads, with belt to match.

Fig. 3.—Short dress and under-skirt of brown and white mousseline marine, trimmed with bias folds of brown silk, edged on one side with a white silk cord. The skirt is looped up a little on one side. From the belt three leaves fall like a sash nearly to the bottom of the dress, as seen in the figure.

Hair-Dressing.

WE give illustrations of several beautiful Parisian coiffures and chignons. No striking change has been made in coiffures. The chignon is worn lower, and the melon rib waterfall is no longer in vogue. The Eugénie bandelette, consisting of a row of short curls across the forehead, is worn in connection with the long Marie Antoinette locks, one behind each ear. One of the latest novelties imported from Paris by the New York hair-dressers is the "rope chignon," which is at once simple and effective. For this the long hair is fastened a little way below the crown by a small circular comb, and is then divided into two twisted ropes of two strands each, which are brought downward side by side for about seven inches. The two ropes are then joined by twisting together the two alternate strands, thus forming two new ropes, which are carried upward outside of the first two, and are fastened under the comb, thus making a chignon composed of four parallel roped lines. The front hair is slightly crêped, and drawn back from the forehead.

An excellent way to lengthen the hair for plaiting is to fasten a tress of hair to the ends of three long rats, a little shorter than one's own hair, then to tie these rats quite high under the latter and braid them in with it; in this manner a seemingly thick braid is obtained of any length that may be desired.

LAURA'S STRANGER.

MY door opened and let in Laura—Laura with her passionate, dark eyes gleaming out from under her jaunty velvet-bound hat, with its dancing Trogon feather. To understand my story at all you ought to have known Laura; but there you would have been in advance of her, for she did not know herself.

Her features were pure Greek—the low, fair brow, with which the nose made the straight classical line so seldom seen; the mouth a little haughty yet sweet; the small, proud head daintily poised, with the shining black hair massed heavily at the back; and then those eyes of which I spoke, very large, almond-shaped, long-lashed, full of meaning, full, too, of a smouldering fire which should be kindled some day. A woman all impulse and emotion, and yet a good woman—ignorant, moreover, of the power of her own impulses because her temperament had another side, a sort of Oriental indolence which made her accept little things calmly, and gave her a wide reputation for good-nature. I looked up, as she stood in my doorway, and began of a sudden, as it seemed, to realize how handsome Laura was.

We were at the Wadawanuck, at Stonington; I had been sitting at my window, with a glass at my eye, trying to make out the shape of the distant craft in the offing, and looking longingly over to Watch Hill, where the very Atlantic itself was thundering in on the east beach.

"Are you ready for a sail?" Laura asked.

"To Watch Hill? Yes."

"Come then. Regie Babcock has invited us, and his boat is ready, and his sail up."

I caught my hat and a scarlet cloak. In those little six by nine rooms every thing is handy. Just then in came Laura's mother, stout, florid, and dreadfully out of breath with the stairs.

"Laura," she said, sitting down heavily, "you must not go out with young Babcock. He has not had experience enough. The water is deep, and you can't swim more than a little way."

"Indisputable facts," said Laura, with an air of solemn acquiescence, her eyes scintillating with fun.

Mrs. Dinsmore proceeded gravely, not heeding the interruption:

"And Captain Brewster saw five sharks the last time he went over."

"Why! it would only take one of them to make an end of me," and Laura's face was comically drawn into an expression which tried to be frightened and was funny.

"You can not go sailing with Mr. Babcock," Mrs. Dinsmore said loftily, and with severity. She had a vague suspicion that Laura was laughing at her fussiness; but in Laura's laughter was no element of disrespect, only pure merriment; and though, of these two, the mother always fussed and the daughter always laughed, neither of them ever knew how to get on without the other.

"We must go and let poor Mr. Babcock know his disappointment," Laura said, pulling me along with her. Then, turning back to her mother, with a merry smile, she asked,

"How do you propose that we shall get to Watch Hill? There is a fresh wind to-day, and the wooing surf is not to be disregarded."

"If you find Captain Brewster at the pier you may go with him; but I'll not have you flirting off with any young fellow who'll be making pretty speeches and forget to trim his sail."

"But Mr. Babcock took out the Nickson girls yesterday. Are their necks worth less than mine?"

"You are my girl—they are not," Mrs. Dinsmore's air was final. Laura only laughed and hummed a stave of waltz music.

"Why didn't you talk the mother over?" I asked, as we went down stairs. "Couldn't you?"

"Possibly; but then she would have been uncomfortable while I was gone. After all, Captain Brewster is the better sailor, and Regie Babcock won't be heart-broken."

That was one of the "little things" which would have fretted some girls, but which Laura, with her sunny acceptant nature, never minded. I knew there was latent among her possibilities a great power of self-assertion; and I rather wondered sometimes at her calm, which no slight gales ever ruffled.

We found two boats at the pier—Regie Babcock's and Captain Brewster's. Regie's was a gay little affair, with cushioned seats and snowy sail. Captain Brewster's had seen harder service and was much less elegant. Laura smiled as young Babcock came gallantly to meet her.

"It is too bad," she said, "entirely too bad; but mamma will not let me go out with you. She declares you are not old enough to be trusted. What a pity you hadn't gray hair. I was as pathetic as I could possibly be, but her dictum is absolute. She says I must go with Captain Brewster, or I don't see Watch Hill to-day."

Captain Brewster heard his own name, and came forward with alacrity.

"So your mother wants you to go with me? Most ladies that I've carried over once do think I'm the man to go with," he added, with harmless self-clamency. Just as he had seated us, young Babcock said, with affected carelessness,

"I guess I'll go over with you too, Captain Brewster. I want to try the surf to-day, and it's dull music sailing alone."

Laura left him chiefly to me. We were all three sitting on one side at first, but she made an excuse to go over to the other, and sit next to Captain Brewster, to study navigation, as she said. She was in high spirits. She bandied nautical phrases with her Captain to his intense delight, asked him numberless questions which he was proud to answer, sang snatches of gay music, and now and then joined in the talk between Babcock and me—a chat about some private theatricals we had had at the hotel a night or two before, when pretty little Mrs. Clark had distinguished herself as a soubrette, and some one else had murdered a part which Laura ought to have taken and did not. Regie Babcock talked to me, but he looked at Laura. He was over head and ears in love with her, but either she did not know it or regarded the fact with a grand indifference which sat well on her.

Just as we neared Watch Hill the steamboat from New London touched the pier, and among the disembarking passengers I distinctly noticed one—a man very handsome, in Laura's own style, with dark eyes, clearly cut classic features, and crisp dark hair. His figure was lithe yet strong, and he stepped off the boat and walked up toward Plympton's with an air of careless grace which distinguished him among the crowd.

Three quarters of an hour afterward Laura came out of her bath-house looking like a sea-nymph—that is, if sea-nymphs look as they ought—I never saw one. I had been ready a few moments first; and while I had stood talking with Regie Babcock and waiting for Laura I had seen my handsome stranger go down to the water—a real sea-lover evidently, who was losing no time.

"I shall leave Mr. Babcock to you," Laura said to me as she joined us. "I can swim, you know, at least, as my mother said, a little way, and you can't; and I do like to be independent."

She was so utterly unconscious of young Babcock's disappointment that it amused me. I knew he was inwardly cursing his unlucky stars; but like a courteous squire of dames he graciously accepted the task appointed him and made no sign.

Once in the surf Laura dashed away gallantly, while I would not part company with the rope. The breakers were strong, and I was busy with my own footing, and for a few moments lost sight of Laura. At last I heard a scream and saw Regie striking out manfully. Laura, it seemed, had been near meeting with an accident, but some one closer at hand had been too quick for Regie; and when I saw her she was standing quietly, neck-deep in the water, upheld by the dark, handsome stranger I had seen come off the steamboat. Regie swam back to me discontentedly. Laura's eyes were brighter than their wont. A clear red burned on her cheek. She was the only woman I have ever seen who was handsome in the surf. Her splendid physique made her insensible under the force of excitement to any amount of fatigue.

Five minutes afterward I saw Regie growing white about the lips, and felt a nervous tremor in the hand which held mine. I insisted then on going in, and made him go. Laura had evidently found a friend, and did not need us. His coming chill seconded my arguments so urgently that he yielded. We had been out of our bathing-rooms half an hour before Laura joined us. The beach was then almost deserted; but my handsome hero stood there at a little distance, hat in hand, and bowed to her as she came near with the silent respectfulness of a stranger too well-bred to presume upon having served her.

"I thought you knew him," I said, wonder-ingly, as Laura moved on with us toward the pier where the Sea-Gull waited.

"Our only introduction was my need of him, and the touch of salt-water which makes the whole world kin," she answered, carelessly. "I swam a little too far, and found the tide too strong for me. Then I was foolish enough to scream, and he swam to the rescue. For the rest, he is an excellent bather, and I have seen him, as Captain Brewster saw the sharks, once, and never any more."

Then she sang in a low, sweet voice the refrain of a favorite ballad of hers—

"Never, never, never, never, Never any more."

After that she was silent. I tried once or twice to make her talk, but she said she was tired. She did not look so, however, with the clear red on her cheek, and the smouldering fire kindled in her great dark eyes. I wondered if it would indeed be "never any more" with her and her fellow-bather; and I speculated a little on the strangeness of such chance meetings, if it is right to call any thing chance in this life.

That evening at tea I saw Laura's stranger, as for want of a better name I called him, in an opposite corner of the dining-hall; and after supper Colonel MacMorton came to me on the piazza and asked leave to introduce his friend Major Flemming, pointing out the stranger as he spoke.

"The Major went over to Watch Hill to-day, took his dinner, and came back in the Massasoit at three. He meant to stay there, but I believe he got tired of it. We must make it as pleasant for him here as we can. His position and antecedents are all they should be," he added, seeing me hesitate a moment.

"Introduce him, of course," I said, a little ungraciously, through sheer absence of mind, for I was admiring the Major's ingenuity. I wondered if he would have tired of Watch Hill so soon if he had not bathed with Laura; also, how he had found out that she was at the Wadawanuck. Somehow or other, I felt sure, he had ascertained her locality, had come to Stonington for her sake, and was now seeking her thus deftly through me her friend—veiling his anxiety with a discreet show of indifference. He certainly understood the art of making himself agreeable, and he looked handsomer than ever as he stood there on the piazza talking with me.

It was ten minutes, perhaps, before Laura came our way, walking and talking, as girls do, with pretty Mary Burnie. Just at that instant it flashed into my mind that Laura was engaged. She was so much in the habit of forgetting the fact herself, that her friends might perhaps be pardoned for following her example. Her betrothed was a thorough man of business—a kind, unselfish, well-informed, and well-bred man, who understood making money. It is true that he had no sentiment, but as an offset to that he exacted none. He would never have been tempted, however, to forget Laura, or beguiled into remembering another woman.

"That," said the Major, diplomatically, affecting a look of sudden recognition—"surely that is your friend, with whom I had the honor of bathing to-day. Might I ask you to introduce me?"

I beckoned Laura to my side, and in five minutes more she and the Major were walking round the veranda together, and I was left to sit and talk to Mary Burnie, thinking how lovely she was in her delicate blonde beauty, with the azure trimmings to her hat falling soft as sea foam and flecked with glittering dew-drops. As we talked Laura and her companion came several times within range of us, and I saw a look of interest in her face which might have made me uneasy if I had had less confidence in her. That night I waited in vain for her to come to my room, for the usual talk, after we put on our dressing-gowns, and while we brushed our hair, which had become a pleasant habit with us since we had been staying under the same roof. I knew then that there had been something in her experience that day which she was not quite ready to discuss.

As the days went on Regie Babcock's kind and pleasant face grew sad. He had loved Laura with youthful desperation; but he was young, and had not the weapons to dispute her possession with an accomplished man of the world like Major Flemming. I took pity on his sad aspect one day, and told him confidentially that Laura was engaged—a fact not generally known in the hotel.

"Will she keep her engagement, do you think?" he asked.

"I think she is sure to, it would be so much the best thing for her."

I was amazed to see his face brighten perceptibly. He understood my look of surprise and answered it.

"At least, then, she won't marry that man, that Major!"

"Why do you care which?"

"Because I distrust him. As a rule, I distrust all men with black eyes."

A very consistent sentiment, as you will see, for the ardent lover of a black-eyed woman!

I was in Mrs. Dinsmore's room the next morning after my talk with Regie, when Laura came in from a walk with the Major—all her walks were with the Major in these days. Mrs. Dinsmore had put on her heaviest silk and her uttermost dignity. I offered to go out, but she asked me to stay.

"You will be no interruption," she said, "in what I have to say to my daughter."

I secretly thought she was conscious of feeling a little support in my presence, and she needed all she could get, good lady. She began, solemnly:

"Laura, I do not understand your movements."

"They are the simplest thing in the world, mamma; indeed, the place is so circumscribed here that they could not very well be intricate or various. This morning, for instance, I rolled a string in the bowling-alley, and then took an ice at Burchard's. That's all, so far."

"And always with the Major! I suppose the company, as well as the place, is circumscribed?"

"Rather."

"But I am not indifferent, if you are."

Laura opened her eyes.

"I am not, either, I assure you. I really like the Major very much."

Mrs. Dinsmore spread out her silk gorgeously, and waved her fan solemnly.

"Do not affect to misunderstand me, if you please."

"Certainly not. You were speaking of the Major, and you said you were not indifferent. Considering how little attention he has shown you I am a little surprised at your interest, that's all."

"Laura, are you lost to all sense of propriety that you talk about your mother as if she were a flighty, flirting girl? I mean I am not indifferent, if you are, to the obligations you are under to some one besides the Major."

"So that way blows the wind?" Laura smiled; but there was an ominous glitter in those great eyes of hers. "It is poor Mr. Paywell on whose account you are uneasy. You are right, perhaps. If you think I ought, I will write to him next mail and dismiss him. It may be my engagement was too much of an experiment, and too little of an experience. I certainly shall not marry him until I have satisfied myself whether what he has to give will pay me for all I should have to do without."

Mrs. Dinsmore actually grew pale—quite an achievement for her, but the Paywell alliance was very dear to her heart. She was subdued, too; for just this which Laura had threatened was precisely the peril she had feared.

"Better wait, at any rate," she said, meekly, "until you are certain of yourself. But I thought it was hard on the Major."

"Oh, it is the Major you are anxious about, after all! Perhaps he doesn't care. Any way, I'll tell him of my engagement this afternoon, if that will satisfy. I shall sail with him after dinner, and I'll tell him then."

Mrs. Dinsmore sighed ponderously. She felt that Laura had somehow got the better of her, and she was at a loss about her next move. It would not do, some intuition whispered, as in Regie Babcock's case, to forbid the sail. So she held her peace. Laura's power of self-assertion was coming to the surface.

That afternoon, between sea and sky, she told Major Flemming about her engagement.

She never knew just how he took it. His face was turned away, and he seemed very busy with the sail. When he spoke she fancied his voice was colder.

"I shall have to tack; excuse me if I ask you to move your seat."

There was a little space of silence—it seemed an hour long to Laura—and then he said,

"Thank you for your confidence, Miss Laura. I think Mr. Paywell a man to be much congratulated. Shall I be able to say the same of Mrs. Paywell by-and-by?"

"I think the world will say so," Laura answered, carelessly. "We live up to our income, and my marriage will be a brilliant match for a dowerless maiden."

Her tone was careless, but her eyes were sad; and Major Flemming read the eyes and understood them. If he had asked her then to give up this brilliant marriage for him would she have consented? Would she not? Who knows? Who can ever tell what any of us would have done if the words had been spoken which no ear heard?

The Major asked nothing; and silence fell between them, as the mist fell upon the sea, shutting off the shore from view, and making them feel as if their boat was a speck in this gray immensity which seemed to them like the hollow of God's hand. Laura shivered at last, from the very sense of the infinite mystery of circling existence in which she herself was such an atom.

"You are getting cold," the Major said, and directly he put his boat about and began to make for the shore.

When they touched the pier, after a silent half hour's sail, he held her hand a moment longer than was necessary as he helped her out.

"You meant to be kind to me—thank you," he said, very gently; and then he walked up to the hotel by her side, carrying her waterproof and umbrella—her gracious, courtly cavalier as usual.

That night Laura danced all the evening, and with every one who asked her. She seemed in the wildest spirits; but there was a minor chord in her voice which told me of some unspoken pain. "After the revel was done" she came to my room, as she had not before since Major Flemming's advent.

"I have told him," she said, taking up some of my ribbons and twisting them absently round her fingers.

"What did he say?"

"Something about congratulations, I believe. I really don't think he cared."

Her sad voice, her face, so woe-begone now the excitement was over, startled me.

"Did you want him to care, Laura? Do you love him?"

"How do I know? I can not tell. Sometimes, since he has been here, I've been on the point of discovering that I had a heart; but I'm not quite sure of it yet. It's all vanity and vexation of spirit. I think when once I'm married I shall be happier." Then she kissed me wearily and went away.

I was troubled. As I said at the beginning of my story, Laura did not know herself. But I did not care to have Major Flemming teach her too many lessons in human nature. I comforted myself with saying a prayer for her, asking that God would love her whom I loved so well, and guide her at last to the best things.

In a week more Mrs. Dinsmore, sagacious matron, began to find that sea air did not agree with her, and to make solemn preparations for departure. Laura made no remonstrance. Perhaps she was glad. I think she was just in the state then where she needed rest more than any thing, and was ready to barter any thing else for it. She had been Major Flemming's companion almost constantly for the past week, as usual; but all the time there had been an indefinable something in his manner which told her he was treating her as honor required him to treat another man's affianced wife, and, side by side with this, another indefinable something which suggested how differently he might treat her if her destiny were not already a settled fact.

The last evening came. The Dinsmore trunks were packed, and Laura, in the plain black silk she wore for traveling, looked simple as a nun. She had many friends in the house. One and another clustered round her for a few last words, and it was nine o'clock before Major Flemming saw his opportunity. She was for a moment standing alone with me, and he came up to us.

"The moon is full, and it is too bad to miss seeing her path of light upon the waves. Half the house have gone down to the Breakwater. Won't you two go down with me?"

Laura assented. I excused myself at once. I was tired. If Laura would come to me to say good-by, when she came in, I would go to my room. She promised; and then they went away together into the stillness of the summer night.

It was just past eleven when Laura came to my room. Something in her face startled me as she stood in the full lamplight; and yet she had never been so handsome. Her dark hair, damp with the breath of the sea, fell heavily about flaming cheeks and glittering eyes; but there was, in spite of her look of excitement and exaltation, a sad, grieved curl to the lips which went to my very heart. She laid down a bunch of spicy, blood-red carnations on my bureau.

"Take them," she said. "Major Flemming gave them to me, but I hate odors. I never want to smell carnations again. It is all over."

"What is?"

"This summer, the Wadawanuck, Major Flemming—I almost wish life were all over as well. I do not think life pays—do you, Helen?"

I answered her question with another.

"What did he say to you?"

"A good deal; and yet nothing that he might not have said to Mr. Paywell's betrothed or his wife equally well. I suppose he regarded them as much the same thing."

"Did you want it different? Laura, did you love Major Flemming?"

"I wish I knew," she said, sadly. "I told you I did not know myself. I think I should have liked, just once, to hear him say that he cared for me—just once!"

"Laura, if you feel like that, you must not marry Mr. Paywell."

"Why not? Because I am a child who can not have the moon shall I refuse to light my candle? I do not know that I could even have liked Major Flemming well enough to give up every thing for him; and I have no reason, not the least in the world, to think he cares for me. I am tired, Helen. I only came here to keep my promise. Good-night, dear—good-night and good-by."

For a moment I touched her quivering lips with mine, and felt her heart beating fearfully fast against my side; then I let her go.

I meant to get up in the morning and see her off, but the train started very early, and somehow I overslept myself, and they were gone when I got down stairs.

Major Flemming lingered a few days after they left. I suppose he did not care to inform the public that Laura had been his sole attraction to Stonington by leaving immediately in her wake. During those few days he favored me with a good deal of his society—I had been neighbor to the rose, you know. One afternoon, after we had grown to be pretty good friends, I said to him:

"Major Flemming, if you loved a woman whom you knew to be engaged to another man would you not tell her of it, and give her the chance of preferring your love to his, if she chose?"

He was silent for a few moments; then he answered me, gravely:

"I think not. My ideal woman would never, in any case, marry a man whom she did not love. If she loved her betrothed, why should I put my heart under her feet? If she had ascertained that she did not love him, or could feel more for me, as an honorable woman she would give him up, whether she thought I cared for her or not; and then would be my time."

Neither of us mentioned Laura, but I knew he understood my meaning, as I understood his; and thereupon I sketched in my mind a very pretty romance.

I did not hear from Laura for several weeks after I left Stonington, but that was nothing strange, for she was at all times an indolent correspondent. I used to ponder over my romance, making it daily more beautiful in my own mind. I may as well write it out, for it is the only ending to my story with which I could ever be satisfied.

After Laura was quite away from Major Flemming she was to begin to understand how much she really cared for him, and how impossible it was to feel the same enthusiasm for Mr. Paywell. She was to tell all this to her betrothed, so sweetly that it should make a friend of him—even though their engagement was dissolved—and not an enemy. Then, somehow, Major Flemming was to find out that she was free, and like the Prince and Princess in the fairy tales they were to be married, and live happily forever afterward.

This was the way I ought to have been able to finish my story; only, unfortunately, I am writing about real life and not Utopia, and in this world how few of us are sufficiently strong swimmers to go against wind and tide.

The very first letter I received from Laura was a summons to come to New York and help to choose her trousseau, and afterward assist at the ceremony which was to make her Mistress Paywell. I packed up my clothes and my disappointment and went on my way. No use now to tell her what the Major had said. I always thought it was meant as punishment, not mercy, when Moses was shown the glories of the promised land of which he had failed.

Laura did not seem unhappy, though her spirits were rather fitful, and her temper not always so serene as it used to be. But her trousseau was elegant, and the diamonds Mr. Paywell sent her were of the first water.

I asked her one day if she had ever told him about the Major.

"I began to once," she answered, "but he cut me short. 'Spare me the biographies of your victims, Laura,' he said; 'I am satisfied to know that their name was legion. Why expect me to care about them, after you have turned from them all to me?' And after all, Helen, what was there to tell? He never even said he liked me. It was just the idle sport of a mid-summer day."

But Laura's eyes grew sad, even as she spoke her careless words; and I put up a silent prayer that in her married life to come Major Flemming might never cross her path, at least until she had learned to love Sampson Paywell more than she loved him now.

The wedding was a brilliant one, and the home where Laura reigns is a palace of all temporal delights. Mr. Paywell is a wonderful judge of wines and of upholstery; and for the rest, he has money and Laura taste. It is just one of the matches people make every day, and it is not my fault if stern reality won't let me end my story like a fairy tale.

TO LILLIE.

By C. H. WEBB.

If I were a bee-bird
What would I do?
I'll tell to no other,
Darling, but you.
On the breast of the Lily,
Folding my wings—
Think it no harm, darling,
'Tis a bee sings—

There I'd repose me
All of the day,
None of the garden
Should tempt me away:
The Tulip, proud lady,
I would disdain,
The Violet's blue eyes should Woo me in vain.

The tears of the Blue-bell
Ever might fall;
The Rose and the Woodbine
Cling to the wall,
The Cowslip and Daisy
Lie in the sun,
I would not kiss them—
Never a one.

But alone with my Lily
Ever I'd rest,
Shrined in the blossom
Of her white breast—
Think it no harm, darling,
Not mine the tongue—
I but interpret
What the bee sung!

THE HIDDEN DESPOTISM.

VERY few of our citizens were aware of the presence of Hayashi Daigaku No Kami, during his visit to the United States, still less of the fact that he came on a secret and special mission; sent not by the Tycoon, who is the everyday ruler of Japan, but by that other sovereign, known as the Mikado, whom the Japanese keep shut up as country dames do their china tea-cups.

Two motives were at the bottom of this mission. The Mikado owed the Tycoon a grudge; for, as is well known, the latter signed the treaty with the United States and European powers, while the former refused his signature, and the treaty has proved a success. Also the Mikado was curious. Such scraps and shreds of information concerning the United States as reached him in his retreat had roused him to astonishment. The self-government of the people, as explained to him, passed his comprehension; and after much meditation he had settled to the belief, that just as foreign powers had signed a treaty with a subordinate Japanese chief, so the United States had carefully kept their real ruler in the back-ground; in short, that the Japanese biter was bit.

Substantiate this belief, and the Tycoon, after the charming custom of his country, must commit hari kari! Accordingly, Hayashi, who spoke English, and was a man of resources, came to America.

So it happened that Mrs. Dobbs, just as she was wondering what she should do, saw stepping up on her piazza a —; of what color was he? He was not a negro, nor an Indian, Mrs. Dobbs was sure; but, at any rate, he was a well-dressed gentleman, and asked to rest on her charming piazza, in excellent English, though with a peculiar accent.

Mrs. Dobbs is one of the readers and victims of Our Foreign Correspondent. She has every detail of the Great Exhibition by heart, and had been peculiarly impressed by the fact that the Sultan and other Oriental despots had come down their marble stairs, holding by golden balustrades, and banged their carved cedar doors after them, to walk about the streets in frock-coat and trousers; and in these days, when it is the fashion for sovereigns to run about the world incognito, was Mrs. Dobbs so very unreasonable if she imagined that this Eastern and unaccountable stranger might be the Sultan himself?

Mrs. Dobbs fluttered at the notion. Of any other potentate she would have been simply in awe; but the Sultan came straight out of the Arabian Nights, and Mrs. Dobbs had a feeling of having known him when a very little girl; besides, as I said, she was just wondering what she should do—and Hayashi listened with so much interest—and—in short, Mrs. Dobbs found herself telling the Sultan of Turkey her troubles.

"Yes, the view was fine," said Mrs. Dobbs, "and the house was cheerful, and an easy rent, and the garden was in good cultivation. It would be hard to leave. They liked the neighbors too. She must say she was clear out of spirits."

Hayashi listened with flattering attention. In Mrs. Dobbs's complaints he hoped to find the clew to that dark and subtle despotism of which he was in search.

"You give up your house," he asked, "your view, what you like; why? Who make you do that? your government?"

"My government!" repeated little Dobbs, lost in wonder; "I should like to see government meddling with our affairs."

"But some one meddle, some one make you go," persisted Hayashi, eagerly.

"Why, yes," sighed Mrs. Dobbs, "some one does make us go. I suppose I may say, we are moving to please the Irish girls. They won't stay here for no wages. The kitchen is damp; that is the only fault the house has; and the butcher won't come so far but twice a week; and then it is so lonely here. I am sure I have tried every way," said Mrs. Dobbs, plaintively; "I have given them the dining-room to sit in, and books, and papers, and days out, and high wages. I have tried big girls and little girls, and I do all the work myself; at least I have tried to do all the work myself, but that is too much, with all the serving besides; but it won't do. Mr. Dobbs, he said last night, 'Well, all is, we shall be obliged to move to a place where an Irish girl will stay; and when he said that, I knew the case was desperate.'"

"Irish girl!" repeated Hayashi, with sparkling eyes, and pulling out his note-book.

"La, sakes!" cried Mrs. Dobbs, retreating in alarm, with a sudden hideous suspicion that this was a madman. Hayashi looked up with his most insinuating smile.

"The Irish girl, Madam, who drive you where she like; could I see her one moment, Madam?"

"See her? the idea!" gasped Mrs. Dobbs, backing nervously into the door.

Hayashi followed.

"One little minute, Madam; only one."

"No, no, I tell you! Get out! go away!" screamed Mrs. Dobbs, hastily retiring behind the door, which she barred with energy, convinced that she had discovered the most dreadful intentions in the foreigner's restless eyes.

Hayashi perceived Mrs. Dobbs's alarm, but interpreted it after his own fashion. She was a silly woman, with no lock on her lips. She had revealed a secret concerning this carefully-hidden despotism. Its spies, hidden no doubt in the hen-coop, or under the piazza, would report. Mrs. Dobbs would lose her head, and Dobbs be forced to commit hari kari. Hayashi walked away, now convinced of the existence of the secret power of which he had started in search.

Hayashi dined that day with C. P. T. Stubbs, of Union Square, to whom he had letters of introduction from a wealthy Chinese house, and he hurried to catch the train. Seating himself, he paid no manner of attention to what was passing around him, till his ear was caught by two magic words, pronounced by a lady in front of him—Irish girls.

"My heart sinks at the notion of bringing another into the house," said the lady to her companion. "We have had no girl now for a week, and we have been so comfortable. I do wish we could live without them."

Hayashi pulled out his note-book, and made an entry.

"For myself," answered her companion, "I make it a point now to shut my eyes. My cook requires double the quantity of every article that I do. She consumes a heart-breaking quantity of fuel, and breaks and wastes on all sides, besides her wages; but if I change her, how can I tell that number two will not add thieving to the virtues of number one. They are very much alike, the difference being that some are worse than others. Why should a woman spend an entire life in the worse than useless attempt to check and control them? I say, shut your eyes."

"I don't consider that just to my husband," replied the first lady. "He works hard to earn what my girl wastes wantonly."

"Very true. All over the country there are plenty of men who can hardly keep the ship above water because of the leak in the kitchen, even when their wives practice the closest economy," answered her companion; "but of what use is the economy? They only distress themselves, and as fast as they mend the fence in one place our Irish friends will break through in another. Since we must have them, I say, shut your eyes; it is the price of peace."

Every word of this conversation went down in Hayashi's note-book, under the head of Evidences of a Hidden Despotism.

Arrived at the Stubbs' mansion, Hayashi's attention, after the first salutation, was attracted by certain singular stains on the superb drawing-room carpet.

"Oh, you are looking at the carpet," observed Mr. Stubbs, in his usual boisterous manner. "That is the sign-manual of our governing order, Dinger Kamer (the Stubbs version of Daigaku No Kami). While we were off at Long Branch, our cook and waiter honored us by giving a party in our drawing-room; upset wine and oyster gravy on the carpet, broke six pieces of our dinner-set, and run me up a bill of seventy-five dollars at one grocery. Now if you had them at home, you would have had their heads off. We got in a lot more of the same sort, and it's a chance if they don't serve us the same trick, or worse."

"Lot? chance?" Hayashi looked inquiry.

"Mr. Stubbs is talking of our Irish girls," explained his wife. They are such a trial, Mr. Kamer, and yet you have almost to beg them to come to you. They must have all the modern improvements. And their impudence; actually one told me the other day, after eying me all over, that she was not used to live in any but respectable families; and a friend of mine Mr. Dinger, Mrs. James, a teacher, was deserted by her cook because, cook said, she had been deceived; Mrs. James had the appearance of a first-class lady, whereas she was only a woman that worked for her living. Next," continued Mrs. Stubbs, warmly, "we shall be required to furnish them with an account of our pedigrees and our incomes."

Hayashi looked from one to the other.

"But what you do? You let your carpet be spoiled, your dishes break; you give your pedigree. Who make you do that? your government?"

"Why," answered Stubbs, laughing at the notion, "I suppose we may call it that, for, by George, they do govern us! They govern our women, you see, and the women govern us."

"Now, Mr. Stubbs, how can you!" exclaimed Mrs. Stubbs.

Shortly after a singular paper was discovered in a Fifth Avenue stage, which on being translated proved to be the rough draft of Daigaku No Kami's first report to the Mikado. Weeded of Japanese idioms, circumlocutions, and tedious compliments addressed to the Mikado, it reads as follows:

During the first weeks of my stay in this country, I should have supposed, if it were possible, that the Mikado was mistaken in his theory of a Hidden Despotism. I examined the entire political machinery, and it contained no hint of such a power; down to its smallest rivet I was sure to find the word Liberty engraved in such very large letters. Now, when I hear a shopman declare that he never cheats, and a woman that she never scolds, I set one down as a thief, and the other as a shrew. I regarded, therefore, this constant recurrence of the word Liberty as suspicious.

The people one and all assert their freedom, and indignantly deny that they have any rulers but themselves. Nevertheless I have proofs to warrant me in saying that such a secret power as the Mikado has imagined does exist, and holds every household in the country in its grasp.

This hidden power is a race of Amazons, dwelling familiarly among the people, and called "Irish girls."

It is required that one at least of this governing order shall be found in every house. I have been repeatedly assured of this fact by the inhabitants themselves.

The members of this order decide where the family shall live, and even compel a removal from a desirable locality. See instance in the appendix. (Doubtless he refers to the Dobbs' case.)

They make also certain inexorable demands concerning the domestic apparatus of the house, with which the owners are forced to comply.

These Amazons levy heavy taxes on the families in which they are found, partly in money and partly in a certain proportion of whatever is consumed in eating and drinking.

In person and manners they are represented as generally unpleasant. They are also careless and filthy in habits, and often destroy articles prized and cherished by the family.

In every house I was met by complaints of these unwelcome members of the family, but invariably I was assured, almost in the same breath, that there was no remedy, and that it was hopeless to attempt to live without them.

We have then the extraordinary spectacle of a strong nation, with a complete set of laws and political machinery, in which the existence of their actual governing power is never once acknowledged; the continual assertion that their rulers are their servants every where contradicted by the fact that their servants are their rulers, and the loud vaunts of personal freedom every where followed by complaints of a minute and searching despotism, unparalleled in the history of nations, and which they do not even hope to remove.

I add the names of a few of the members of this governing order, which I have procured unsuspected, and hope shortly to present the Mikado with a full list of those persons with whom it may be desirable to negotiate. (Here follow the names.)

Chemise for Girl from 6 to 8 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 27-30.

CHEMISE of linen, richly trimmed with hem-stitching, needle-work, and embroidery. Fig. 27 gives half the front and back, which are cut together lengthwise from the stuff folded double, and are whole on the shoulder. Pleat the front, as shown in Fig. 27, joining two dotted to two smooth lines, and finish in the middle, from 50 to 51, with insertion, as shown in illustration. Arrange the sleeves after Fig. 29, sew them from 52 to 53, set in gusset, Fig. 30, join from 52 to X, hem them narrow on the bottom, put on trimming, and sew them in; lastly, set the double yoke, cut from Fig. 28, which gives one-fourth thereof, on the body, to correspond with the figures on the pattern.

Chemise for Girl from 2 to 4 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 31-33.

CHEMISE of linen, closed on the shoulder with buttons and button-holes, with embroidered yoke and sleeves. Cut two pieces double, lengthwise of the stuff, from Fig. 31, and two pieces for each sleeve from Fig. 32. An inch is to be allowed for a hem on the sleeves and body. Fold the stuff bias, and cut the yoke from Fig. 33. Join the sides from 58 to 59, and hem the bottom. The upper part of the body, both front and back, is gathered to X, and is stitched into the double yoke to correspond with the figures; and lastly, the buttons and button-holes are put on the shoulders. The sleeves are felled up from 58 to X, then are hemmed on the bottom and sewed into the arm-hole to correspond with the figures on the pattern.

Trousers for Boy from 2 to 4 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 34-37.

TROUSERS of dimity or cloth, made in a similar manner to the drawers for girls, but with several tucks in the bottom, for which allowance is made in Fig. 34. Both under strips as well as the waist-band are cut double, lengthwise of the stuff, from Figs. 35, 36, and 37. The illustration shows the manner in which the parts are joined together.

Under-Waist for Child from 3 to 5 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 38 and 39.

WAIST of flannel, buttoned up behind, with a button at the bottom, whereby the drawers or petticoat is fastened. Cut from Fig. 38, allowing for a hem an inch wide at the bottom and down the back. Cut two pieces of linen or elastic for the shoulder-straps from Fig. 39. Hem the bottom and back, bind the neck with a strip of linen about an inch wide, and put on the shoulder-straps to correspond with the numbers on the pattern. Finish with buttons and button-holes.

Under-Waist for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 40-44.

UNDER-WAIST of fine white muslin, fastened with linen buttons, and trimmed round the neck and sleeves with black ribbon run through tating. Cut after Figs. 40, 41, 42, and 44, two pieces each, and after Fig. 43 one piece, lengthwise of the stuff double. In cutting Fig. 40 allow an inch for a hem in front. Hem the front. Put the buttons on the left side and the button-holes on the right, and join the waist according to the figures on the pattern. Hem the bottom and cord the neck. Sew up the sleeves from 84 to 85, hem the bottom and sew them into the arm-holes from 84 to 84, then put on the trimming.

For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Fig. 45.

NIGHT-CAP of linen, bordered with a double scalloped frill of the same. Cut the front and back together, on the bias, from Fig. 45, allowing room for the shirr marked, through which an elastic cord, six inches long, is passed. Gather the back from 86 to 87, and join it to the front, and stitch a narrow bias fold over the seam. At the top of this fold, at 86, on each side, sew a strip of linen, two inches wide, and scalloped on the bottom; bring these strings to the top, and tie them in a bow. Hem the edge of the cap, put on the frill, two inches wide, and finish with linen strings.

Linen Standing Collar for Girl from 8 to 10 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 46.

COLLAR of double linen, embroidered with braid. Cut from double stuff, from Fig. 46, embroider, finish with button and button-hole, and sew on chemisette of mull or nansook.

Linen Collar and Cuffs for Girl from 6 to 8 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XII., Fig. 47-49.

COLLAR and cuffs of double linen, with a triple row of stitching, and set on a chemisette and sleeves of nansook. Figs. 47 and 48 give the pattern of the collar, and Fig. 49 that of half of the cuff. The chemisette and sleeves are cut from Figs. 83, 84, and 85; and the collar and cuffs are made in the same manner as those in No. 22.

Toilet Basket.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 50 and 51.

CUT six pieces of pasteboard from Figs. 50 and 51 each; cover and line them with silk, and overhand the six pieces of the basket together from X to ●, and the six pieces of the cover from X to ●. Cut two six-sided pieces of pasteboard, for the bottom and the top, and cover and line them with silk, then overhand them on the basket. Overhand one side of the cover to one side of the basket, and trim with a ruche of silk or ribbon, as in illustration.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 52.

MAKE a round box of pasteboard, three inches high and five inches in diameter, line it with silk, and pleat silk round the outside, finishing it round the bottom with a ruche of the same material, or of ribbon. Cut a circular piece of pasteboard to fit the top, cover it with cotton, and line it to match the box. Cut the pointed cover in four pieces from Fig. 52, line the points, and trim with ruches, as in the illustration.

Drawers for Girl from 3 to 5 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XX., Figs. 74-76.

DRAWERS of muslin or linen, trimmed on the bottom with tucks and needle-work insertion. Cut both legs from Fig. 74, allowing for the tucks, and sloping the front as shown in the pattern; and cut the belt double, lengthwise of the stuff, from Figs. 75 and 76. Sew each part together from 41 to 42, and leave the opening as marked, put on the side pieces, sew up the legs from 43 to 41 and from 41 to 44, gather the top, put on the belt, and finish with buttons and button-holes.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XXI., Figs. 77-80.

PEPLUM of lilac silk, lined with thin silk of the same color, with an interlining. Cut the upper and under part and interlining, from Figs. 77-80 of the Supplement, of the stuff double. Run the belt together, on the wrong side, around the top and sides, turn it over and put on the lappet in plaits, as in Fig. 78, X to ●. Join the loops in front to correspond with the numbers on the pattern, and put on the hooks and eyes and trimming.

"Sailor" Under-Handk. and Sleeves for Girl from 6 to 8 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XXII., Figs. 81-86.

COLLAR and cuffs of double linen, with several rows of stitching, trimmed round the edge with a row of hem-stitching, in imitation of insertion and needle-work edging. The collar is sewed on a chemisette of mull, tucked in front, and the cuffs are set on sleeves of the same stuff. For the collar, cut one piece from Fig. 81, and from Fig. 82 two pieces, the whole double, then stitch the last between the double stuff of Fig. 81, finish with button and button-hole, stitch the collar around the outer edge and put on the hem-stitching and edging. Cut both fronts of the chemisette from Fig. 83, and the back from Fig. 84. Tuck the front, as seen in the illustration, then sew the shoulders together from 53 to 54, and hem the top very narrow, then sew on the collar. The bottom is put on a binding. Cut the sleeves of single mull, from Fig. 85, and the cuffs of double linen, from Fig. 86; stitch the latter around the edge, and put on the trimming and buttons. The side of the cuffs that is left untrimmed is sewed with an overhand seam from 58 to 59. Lastly, sew the cuff on the sleeve from 57 to 58, making the numbers correspond, and hem the top of the sleeve.

False Front for Boy from 8 to 10 Years old.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XXIII., Figs. 87-91.

Tuck and cut the front from Fig. 87; and cut the rest of the garment from Figs. 88, 90, and 91. Put the buttons on the right side and the button-holes in the left of the bosom, then stitch a false hem about an inch wide, on the left side, in order to conceal the buttons. Set on the waistband, to correspond with the numbers on the pattern; and put loops on each shoulder through which to pass the suspenders. Make the collar of double linen, stitch it round the edge, put it on a binding, and sew it to the front. Finish with button and button-hole.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XXIV., Figs. 92 and 93.

NIGHT-CAP of fine linen, bordered with scalloped frill of the same. Cut the front and back from Figs. 92 and 93, the first bias, allowing for the shirr, through which an elastic cord is run, six inches wide. Gather the back from 63 to X, and join it to the front, making the figures on the pattern correspond; then cord the front from the middle to ● on either side, and put on the frill, which is an inch and a quarter wide in the middle, and narrows toward the end. A strip of linen, three-quarters of an inch wide, is stitched under the edge of the front, to hide the seams. The strings are of linen, two and a half inches wide, and half a yard long. A narrow scalloped edge is stitched on the slope of the cap, back of the strings, as seen in the illustration, the seam being covered on the under side with a narrow bias strip of linen.

Infant's Under-Petticoat.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XXV., Figs. 94 and 95.

PETTICOAT of flannel, a yard and a quarter long and three-quarters of a yard wide, bound round the edge with ribbon. It is buttoned together at the bottom, and fastened at the right side by bows of ribbon. Cut the garment from Fig. 94 and Fig. 95, as shown in the pattern; sew the shoulder-straps on the waist, pleat the skirt, and sew it to the waist, leaving the back loose on the right to the ●.

THE FASHIONS—AFTER A FASHION.

THE judgment displayed by the Bazar in selecting me to do its fashion feuilleton can not be too highly commended. For if there be one thing on earth about which I know absolutely nothing, and for which I care a little less, that one thing is feminine attire. This, of course, frees me from every prejudice in the beginning, and loosens my pen for the unbiased discussion of all that pertains to a lady's toilet.

However, little as I know about fashion, I am still known as a follower of the latest styles. I followed one yesterday, for instance, all the way from Bond Street to the Croton Reservoir, where it suddenly disappeared. Indeed, I have noticed most mysterious disappearances among ladies in the vicinity of that same Reservoir. Whether they slip in to pay their waterfall-tax, or to come out again with their plain silks changed to watered ones, I do not know. When my attention was first attracted by the mystery, I determined to solve it by careful watching, and did watch; but after keeping vigil for several days I gave it up as a thankless task, only serving to whet my curiosity still farther. But to return to our millinery mutton.

Waterfalls are still worn. They have retrograded from the position they at one time assumed, directly on the top of the head, and now seem in a fair way for slipping down the back a bit. Facilis descensus. For a time considerable apprehension existed that the chignon in its upward and onward course would encroach upon the forehead, giving the fair wearers the unique appearance of the unicorn, but this apprehension is happily dissipated. The feminine nose is not to be made crinoid, nor is the ball to be forever up. Originally invented as a cushion for the brain, the locality of that organ is plainly indicated by the place of a lady's chignon. It is not considered ton to wear it under the left ear, otherwise it may be disposed of at pleasure. When not in actual use it serves an excellent purpose in the nursery; the children can play ball with it. Long may the waterfall wave and never may it waver! Let the wild waves wag as they will, I hope that no lady can be induced to go back on her back-hair.

As for bonnets, there are several styles. One worn by a leading belle yesterday particularly attracted my attention. I wish I knew where it was bought and what it is called, in order to tell the reader where not to go, and what not to get. The prettiest thing of the season, and undoubtedly destined to be the favorite, is what is known as the "Marie Antoinette"—most appropriately named after that most unfortunate queen, who, having no head to speak of toward the close of her reign, manifestly could not require much of a bonnet. The "Marie Antoinette," being made of straws, shows which way the wind blows in the fashionable world. It has two elevations—one in front called the "diadem," and one at the back known as something else. There is some difficulty in distinguishing the "diadem" from the other thing, owing to the impossibility of telling the front of the bonnet from the back. This doesn't matter much, however, being rather an advantage than otherwise, inasmuch as a husband can not tell which way his wife is going when she puts on her things for a walk without asking her politely. In this respect the bonnet is not unlike a Brooklyn ferry-boat, though a better comparison, perhaps, might be instituted between it and the shapely double-ender of our navy. There are several other styles of bonnets, all of about the same size. It is worthy of note that the smaller they are the more they cost, which is encouraging to milliners, and enables them to get ahead pretty fast. In its present aspect the bonnet is but a waif; it will probably get to be a wafer before the season is over. The adoption of the wafer would undoubtedly be hailed with general delight, being so easy of adjustment, and calculated to stick to the head without the aid of strings. Moreover, would it not be carrying out the spirit of the age to the letter?

Skirts are worn short and scant for the street. This saves material, and enables the careful mother to make aprons for the children. Dresses for the evening are made with a long trail, economically obtained by cutting a considerable amount of dry goods away from the neck. There is no use in burning your candle at both ends in times like these. Low on a narrow neck, a dress can be made to stand, or rather to set, to excellent advantage. As to the waist of the dress that is in great measure a matter of taste. Haste makes waste, it is said, but it is not claimed that a waist made in haste is better than one deliberately fashioned. The waist-knot is omitted unless the wearer wants knot, in which case some remnants of ribbon and the first few things that come handy are stuck on. As a general thing the waist should be cut scant—waist-fulness seldom pleases the one whom a woman should dress to please.

As to the bodice, that is nobody's business. The souls and bodies of women are their own, however the opponents of their rights may talk. As regards that portion of her attire a lady can consult her own comfort and convenience, staying as long as she pleases. Of course it is impossible to handle all portions of a lady's dress in detail, especially in a first attempt. Of the bodice anon, or anonymously.

The outer garments are of various styles. It is safe, however, to predict that few box-coats will be worn by ladies this winter; they had better be avoided, especially when men are inside of them. The basque is a graceful garment, and can be made of different materials. The sun is not bad to bask in occasionally, nor are the smiles of a young and comely gentleman, who owns a pair of horses and is desirous of setting up a wife and carriage, to be sneezed at. Should he not prove to be all your fancy painted him—which is to say, should his income turn out to be not lovely and divine—you can intimate very gently, but firmly, that your basqueing days are done, and give him the sack. If it be cut in the present fashion, he will see a great many points—they can not escape his eye. Gazing on the bugles which adorn the garment he may assert that he'll be blown if he does not trumpet your faithfulness to the world; but you can remark that he is at liberty to trumpet it or follow suit, as he thinks best, after which he will probably hold his whist.

As for the tout ensemble of your things, the more that they are cut up and slashed about the edges the better, and the more you'll look like a Chinese—which is the grand end and aim of woman's life this season. The effect of the whole dress could be heightened by a few of the red labels which come on tea-chests, judiciously displayed at tasteful intervals around the edge of the balmoral. Looking so very man-darin, none would for a moment suppose that the wearer was afraid of a man.

After which I have only to remark, that if any one has been amused by this article the world is more foolish than I had imagined; and if any one has been instructed the intention of the writer certainly has not been carried out.

INIGO.

PERSONAL.

MOSES H. GRINNELL has been elected President of the Union Club in place of the late Ex-Governor John A. King. The "Union" is one of the oldest and most opulent of American clubs. It was organized nearly fifty years ago.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER is one of Mr. Harrison's concert notabilities. There are persons living old enough to remember the extraordinary apparel in which he enveloped himself when on his first visit to this country. He had one pair of plaid pants, the plaids of which were so large that it required two men to show the whole pattern, and two days to give a correct exposition of its general effect.

MR. JAMES PARTON is a gentleman of slight and somewhat delicate figure, head small but highly developed in the moral faculties and in the propelling forces, shallow complexion, fine eye, and very affable and brilliant in conversation. His wife—Fanny Fern—we noticed a few days ago seated on one of the benches in Union Square with her little grandchild by her knee, watching the sparrows, who were picking up bits of bread kindly thrown to them by a duck of a gentleman. Look out for a birdy article in the Ledger.

MR. DANA's new evening paper will number among its staff many well-known journalists. Mr. England ("young" England no longer), formerly of the Tribune, is to be city editor. Head Centre John Savage is to do the literary reviewing, Kane O'Donnell the music, and Mr. Cornish the marine. The report that Mr. Maverick is to manage the foreign department is inaccurate. He prefers his present agreeable and responsible position on the Evening Post.

MISS ROSE EYVING is much talked of for the elegance and taste with which she dresses her drawing-room characters. In this respect she is coming up to the faultless "expositions" of Mrs. Hoey. She has a striking stage presence, fine figure, fine eyes, raven hair, fine face, easy, lady-like manners, and is the most natural lady artist now on the New York boards. The reception-dress she wears in the Long Branch drawing-room scene consists of dark green silk, the bodice of which is high, the sleeves small, close-fitting, and open at the back, and the skirt gored and scalloped, with a very long train, trimmed round the scallops and up each seam with black and white lace. The skirt is open down the front, showing a white silk petticoat, trimmed with a deep flounce of the same material, which is headed with a smaller flounce of black lace and a puffing of pink silk. The two skirts, contrasting so artistically in color, form a very pretty picture with the jewels and ornaments that accompany the tasteful costume.

FANNY JANACSCHKE, the German tragedienne, who for eight years has been the Risor of Germany, is fine looking, about thirty, highly cultivated, has a full, sonorous voice, with a style and presence on the stage that German gentlemen and ladies pronounce unsurpassed.

MR. BATEMAN's success in bringing out Madame PAREPA, and the exceedingly brilliant and merry French Opera Company, has induced him to engage a company of Parisian artists, who will present to the New York public the lighter comedies and farces so popular in the French capital. They are to alternate with the singing people, and once a week cheer up the flagging spirits of the Brooklynians.

THE HON. MRS. YELVERTON, who is soon to give a series of readings to this people, is a handsome, stylish person, with a pleasant voice and attractive manner. But, according to a private letter just received from London, her main object is to gather materials for a book on the present state of society in the United States—a trite and trifling subject, easily disposed of in a few off evenings.

DOCTOR GWINN is again an aspirant for Senatorial honors in California. A Boston notion of it is that he should "Gwinn and win."

JOHN SAVAGE, poet and literary man, has been appointed Head Centre of the Fenians of the United States. He has entered upon its duties at a sacrifice and salary of $4000 a year.

HALLECK is gracefully growing old at his cottage in Guilford, Connecticut. Some years ago PARK BENJAMIN passed the summer in the same town, and wrote thus: "Mis'able place, this; only two poets in the town; rest of people idiots!"

EDMOND ABOUT, Frenchman, is a fearful quill-driver. He is a regular contributor to seven weeklies and two reviews, is writing two novels and three dramas—About enough to keep one thinking apparatus in pretty constant operation!

ANNA DICKINSON, on dit, is about to "change her local habitation and her name." Doubtful. A. D. is a great worker and an eloquent speaker. She owns houses and hereditaments in Philadelphia, and is the main support of a large family. Earned it all herself. Is modest, unpretending, and charming in private, and the most effective female platformist in the country. A husband, babies, and things would be a bother.

MR. DEWEY, of the Commercial Advertiser, is one of the most industrious, practical, common-sensible men of the New York press. He is an importation from Rochester. One of the same name was, for many years, a leading bookseller in that city. He advertised Eugene Sue's Wandering Israelite thus:

The Wandering Jew,
By Eugene Sue,
Is now on view
At D. M. Dewey's News

Establishment in the Arcade.

THADDEUS STEVENS, the "leader of the House," though in feeble health, expects to be in Washington at the commencement of the session. A gossipier says: "His gray eyes are full of fire; he has an eagle nose, indicative of ability to command; his thin, compressed lips show his decision of character, and his broad and lofty forehead is a dome of thought which would make a phrenologist leap with ecstasy."

MR. FORRESTER is playing a successful engagement at the Broadway Theatre—the first since his return from California, where he amassed much gold. The following paragraph is said to have been written by him to a gentleman in Boston:

"Well, I am here, here in New York once more, and on Monday next to begin again my professional labor—labors begun more than forty years ago in the same city. What changes since then in men and things! Will any one of that great and enthusiastic audience which greeted my efforts as a boy be here on Monday evening next to witness the matured performance of the man? If so, how I should like to hear from his own lips if the promises of spring-time have been entirely fulfilled by the fruits of the autumn of life!"

Mr. Forrest lives in one of the finest houses in Philadelphia, and possesses by far the largest and most valuable library ever owned by any actor, past or present. He is a fine linguist, and a close student.

—GEORGE WILKINS KENDALL is writing spicy letters from his big farm in Texas to his New Orleans Picayune. His last playful allusion is to the Hon. Mr. Chambers, whom he describes as a "smooth bore 1-pounder Congressman!"

—General GRANT and Minister Adams are nominated for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency by a London paper—the latter for his ability, the former for his availability.

—Assistant Bishop CUMMINS of Kentucky, who has recently been officiating in this city, is a gentleman of fine presence and a forcible preacher. Two years ago we heard him, in Chicago, deliver a sermon on the use and abuse of gold. He extolled the uses and inveighed against the abuses of the legal tender with equal power—so much so that we could not satisfactorily decide whether he was "long" or "short" of the article.

—General SICKLES has returned to town. It is possible he may be ordered to his regiment, which is distributed at various points in the western part of this State. It is not true that he proposes to take any part in the approaching political campaign. With his one leg it would be bothersome to stump it.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Thursday Eve.—"Well, Mr. Typeset," said I, this morning, "what are you thinking about?"

Not a word of answer from Mr. T.

"Mr. Typeset," said I, speaking with a little more vigor, "what are you thinking about?"

"About a new paper, my dear," said Mr. T.

"Well, I'm sure, Mr. Typeset," said I, and visions of a new edition of our little parlor, with a contingent new sofa, and a some-day-possible Brussels carpet, rose before my mind—"I'm glad you've thought about it; we certainly do need one shamefully; seven years we have lived in this house, and this our best room, and common too, and never had a new paper to it yet; and there's a lovely thing in panels, with a buff border, on a pale blue ground, and a vase of moss roses in the centre, down at Field & Forrest's now, only—"

"Pshaw, my dear," said my husband, "I don't mean a new wall-paper; it's a new newspaper I am thinking about. Though you shall have a new wall-paper too, if all goes well."

"A new newspaper!" I repeated, and my heart fell; for, to my mind, my husband takes more papers now than do him any good, and of course I thought he was going to subscribe for another.

"Yes; the firm are going to start a new paper; and I am to write a column for it."

"What sort of a paper is it going to be?"

"Well, the plan is new, you know; and things, probably, are not quite settled yet. But there will be regular departments, containing matters of general interest; and of special interest too, I fancy, for it will give the very latest Paris fashions, and minute descriptions of all those new-fangled fancies that ladies like so much, with first-class engravings to show how they look. Then there will be amusing and instructive things, just such reading as one enjoys at home of an evening. It will contain a great deal for the ladies, and there's to be a corner for the children. In short, I think it will be the kind of paper a man would get, coming home, for his wife and children; but he would be pretty likely to read it all through himself."

"And what do they want you to write?"

"That is just what I have been trying to make out in my own mind. I think what is wanted is a sort-of-a-kind of a-what-you-may-describe as a miscellaneous-general-news-column."

"Items?" said I.

"Well, yes; some items," said Mr. Typeset.

"Deaths and marriages?" said I.

"Well, not too many of them," replied Mr. Typeset, shaking his head.

"Poetry?" I asked.

"Now and then a short piece, if it is very good."

"House-keeping recipes?"

"Yes, if I found any first-rate ones. You would have to try them over for me though; I have no opinion of most of the recipes one sees published."

"Riddles and rebuses? Would those come in?"

"Yes; I think they might."

"Gossip about folks would not be proper, I suppose," said I, meditatively.

"Oh yes, it would," said Mr. Typeset; "it would be capital. I suspect what is wanted is a sort of mélange of what is going on from week to week—just what happens, and what people are talking about; what they like to read to each other and to the children; now a story, now a verse; here a joke, and there a bit of good advice; one week grave, and another gay; and—"

"Why, I do believe, Mr. Typeset," said I, "that is exactly my DIARY."

"Your diary?"

"My diary, Mr. Typeset; at least I call it so, though it is not such a diary as they put into memoirs. I am sure you have seen me writing in it ever so many times; and those are just the things I put into it. And evenings, when you don't come home till late, I read bits and stories out of it to Aunt Anne and the children. Why, Mr. Typeset, I will read you what I have written in it this very last week."

So I hurried up stairs, and down I came in a moment, bringing this little pet volume with me. I knew Mr. Typeset would not stay very long, so I began at once with what I wrote only last night.

Wednesday Eve.—How strange that ladies will adopt a particular fashion regardless of genuine good taste! Just as if there were not fashions enough nowadays, pretty and stylish ones too, so that every one might select what was suited to her personal peculiarities. It is very true what I read in some English paper this morning:

"Are stripes the fashion, a tall woman wears them and makes herself look like a hop-pole, or a fluted column, or a monument. Are flounces the rage, a short stout lady insists on adopting them, and in consequence reminds all beholders of a well-hooped cask. Is it the fashion to draw back the hair 'à la Eugénie'—a custom that requires a face of classical beauty to redeem from its unnatural ugliness—and lo! every fat round-faced woman at once adopts it, heedless of the ridiculous effect produced."

"You can do any thing if you will only have patience: water may be carried in a sieve if you can only wait till it freezes."

Very likely; but what sort of a plan would it be to get a pail instead of waiting?

What an ingenious people! A few months ago a Boston house sent out a cargo of five hundred hoop skirts to Japan as a venture. The Japs put a cover on them and used them for umbrellas.

Red hair has been all the rage, and now black hair is announced! Eyes have their fashions too, sometimes a blue one being the favorite style, and then again a black. Wonder whether red eyes will ever come into favor! Apropos of eyes, the French say:

"Les yeux bleus sont amoureux,
Les yeux noirs ont de l'espoir,
Les yeux gris ont de l'esprit,
Les yeux chataigns sont malins."

The Persian says:

"A gray eye is a sly eye,
And roguish is a brown one:
Turn full upon me thy eye—
Ah, how its movelets drown one!
A blue eye is a true one;
Mysterious is a dark one,
Which flashes like a spark-sun;
A black eye is the best one."

The following method of mending torn greenbacks and currency is recommended: Smooth out the edges carefully and moisten the edges with the finger-tip, after wetting it on the tongue. Then lay the bill on a piece of writing paper, carefully drawing the edges together, and lay another piece of writing paper over it. A few seconds' rubbing with the finger over the seam will make it adhere, and a little adroitness, when it is dry, will enable you to lift the bill from the paper without tearing it. The seam will then be invisible, and be the strongest part of the bill. Resolved I would try this method the first time I got a green-back.

[Here I paused in my reading, and glanced up at Mr. T., to see if he would take the hint; but he did not "see it." So I went on.]

It seems that in Brazil it is excessive rudeness to inquire after a man's wife. Queer country that in several respects. A certain captain tells a story of a Brazilian gentleman about sixty years old, who was a passenger on his vessel. He was accompanied by two little girls, one of them thirteen years old, and the other younger. The gentleman soon retired to his cabin, being sea-sick, and left the children upon deck. The captain devoted himself to their amusement, took them upon his knees, and told them stories, while he enjoyed their childish prattle and pretty smiles. In the midst of this pleasant occupation the gentleman came upon deck. With a fierce expression of face he gazed upon the scene for a moment, and then inquired in a singularly harsh voice, "Captain, are you married?" "Yes, indeed, senhor, and have a daughter two or three years older than your eldest little girl here. She reminds me of her very much," added the captain, as he patted the lovely child upon the cheek. "That little girl, Sir?" exclaimed the indignant passenger, with a severe emphasis on little girl, "that little girl is my wife!" The captain immediately provided a chair for the gentleman's wife and another for his sister-in-law.

When a widow is married a second time it is not customary for her to wear orange flowers, nor is the cake decorated with them. Formerly a widow was married in a dress of some light-colored silk or satin, such as silver-gray; but at the present time this custom is not universally attended to. Instead of the veil being thrown over the head, one of those elegant arrangements now worn as bonnets is frequently used, from which depends the soft flowing tulle which envelops the figure and shades the face of the bride.

Bridget, my new cook, inquired to-day where she could store her feather-beds. "Feather-beds!" said I. "What feather-beds?" "Why, sure," replied she, "my feather-beds that I brought over. It's three that I've got, and my own mother made them, and I wouldn't part with them for the world." It seems, also, that her two sisters, who have just come from the "old country," have each their feather-beds; and, so far as I can learn, every Irish girl considers from one to half a dozen of these articles of furniture as indispensable. In England feather-beds are in common use, especially among the middle and lower classes. But not so in France; there mattresses of carded wool are in use. Medical authority pronounces feather-beds unwholesome, especially for children, and they are going out of use among the higher classes.

What queer little things children are! "Dot" always has a funny speech to make while I am putting her to bed. To-night she caught sight of the vaccination mark on her arm, and shouted out to her sister, "Oh, Susie! see! here is where I was baptized!"

By-the-way, some one told me the other day of a curious trick that can be tried with flowers, and I must amuse the children with it some time. For example, a purple dahlia can be changed in a quarter of a minute so that every petal shall be tipped yellow. This is simply done by burning some brimstone, and holding the flowers a few seconds in the fumes. The change is instantaneous; and the experiment is easily tried by lighting a few lucifer matches. Must be careful, however, not to let the little folks perform with the matches by themselves, or the Insurance Companies will suffer.

People are always saying that the "true sphere" of woman is in her own home; that her duties and pleasures should be in her family. Very good. But if husbands will go to their clubs every other night, leaving their wives oftentimes lonely and without amusement, have not the ladies a right to get up an opposition? Some of the Parisians think so, and a "Ladies' Club" has been organized in Paris. A maid will accompany every member, and remain in the vestibule, provided, however, with a casket of Russian leather, containing white and red paints, English salts, black for the eyebrows, and the door keys of her mistress. On one floor will be found all sorts of games—chess, billiards, lotos, cards. The concert-room will be ornamented with pictures, and the music will be excellent. Every thing will be charmingly arranged, yet a short season is predicted. Wonder if some such clubs in this country would not bring men to their senses?

Gentlemen may as well stop saying any thing more about discarded crinolines turning up in all odd places. They shed their cast-off paper collars in every imaginable spot. Isn't there one in the corner of every bureau drawer, and two or three strewn around on the table or chairs, after my spare room has been occupied a few days by one of the wearers? And how often is the eye offended by torn and dirty relics in the streets, on the sidewalk? And the other day I even saw a couple lodged upon the door-step of a fine "brown stone!"

Would not this be a good lesson in alliteration for Johnny to read—provided he did not laugh too much?

"Two terribly-tired travelers toiled through tangled thickets thickly thorned, toward the Talitan turnpike, telling touching tales, theoretically told, to those that thought themselves thoroughly theoretical tacticians. Therefore the throng that threw themselves thickening thitherward thought them Thespians. Thraso-like they thundered thrasonically their thriftless threnodies. Thirsty they tiptoed together. Their tactability told them tolerably tolerant. Their tortuosity, too, transfigured the Talitans timorously. Their talaras that Tiffany toilfully trimmed till the topaz trembled therein took the throng. The Tokay that they took, trying the tavern table, told terribly—tinging, tinging, troubling their thoughts—till their titinabulary tones tortured the tired townsmen; they thereupon thrashed the tipsy thronian tyros through the town." Well, that's enough for me whether it is for Johnny or not.

Here Mr. T. rose suddenly and pulled out his watch. "Very good, my dear, very good," said he. "That Diary of yours may be turned to some account yet. But I am five minutes late, and must be on my way. So good-by. But I'll think about it." And away he went with a nod and a smile.

FACETIÆ.

HOW TO "FINISH" A DAUGHTER.

1. Be always telling her how pretty she is.

2. Instill in her mind a proper love of dress.

3. Accustom her to so much pleasure that she is never happy at home.

4. Allow her to read nothing but novels.

5. Initiate her into the principle that it is vulgar to do any thing herself. To strengthen the latter belief let her have a lady's maid.

6. And lastly, having given her such an education, marry her to a clerk upon five hundred dollars a year, or a lieutenant going out to a fort.

If, with the above careful training, your daughter is not "finished," you may be sure it is no fault of yours, and you must look upon her escape as nothing short of a miracle.

Here is a specimen of a curious advertisement: MR. X—, who is supposed to have been dead ten years, is requested to call at the office of the Messrs. C. & Co., where he will learn something to his advantage.

One of the most original of juvenile inventions was that of little Fanny, who, instead of saying her prayers at night, spread out her alphabet on the bed, and, raising her eyes to heaven, said, "O Lord! here are all the letters; arrange them to suit yourself."

This reminds us of another instance of the keen perception and ready wit of children. A curly four-year-old of our acquaintance was surprised by his mother in the act of hopelessly entangling his father's fishing-tackle. "Oh, my son, how your papa will scold you when he sees this!" she exclaimed. "No, no, mamma," answered the youngster, with imperturbable assurance, "papa won't scold me at all, he'll scold you for letting me have it."

Rowland Hill's church is in general but sparsely attended; one morning, however, it was suddenly filled to overflowing, owing probably to a violent thunder-shower, which forced the passers to seek the nearest refuge. The preacher stopped short in the midst of his sermon and exclaimed, "Many are rebuked by the world for making a cloak of religion; but for my part I have no better opinion of those who make it an umbrella."

The love of neatness may be carried to excess, especially when it makes one forget courtesy for cleanliness. This was especially the case with Colonel S— when dining with his friend Holmes. No sooner was he seated at the table than, not liking the appearance of his glass, he began polishing it with his napkin. His host noticed the action, and said uneasily to the waiter, "Change the Colonel's glass." Another glass was brought, whereupon the Colonel picked up his napkin and recommenced his cleansing process. "How dare you bring dirty glasses here!" cried Holmes, angrily. "Take it away and bring another." A third glass was set before the Colonel, who coolly set to work as before. Holmes, too furious to speak, motioned to the servant, who once more changed the glass. This time the Colonel lost patience, and, turning angrily around, exclaimed: "Do you want me to wipe all the glasses in the house?" The harmonious conclusion of the dinner may be imagined.

Count de B— was sitting at the table by the Duchess of —, a fat old lady, whose napkin kept continually sliding from her lap to the floor. Her polite neighbor as often picked it up and returned it to her, till finally, weary of the hopelessness of his task, he said, in his most courtly manner: "Wouldn't it be better, Madam, for me to sit under the table, so that I could hand your napkin up to you more readily?" The proposition was a happy one, but we doubt whether it was accepted.

PARTINGTONIA.—"There is one thing sure," said Mrs. Partington; "the females of the present generation are a heap more independent than they need to be. Why, I saw a gal go by the other day that I know belongs to the historical class of society, with her dress all tucked up, her hair all buzzed up like if she hadn't time to comb it for a week, and one of her grandmother's night-caps, in an awful crumpled condition, on her head. Why, law, honey! when I was a gal, if one of the fellows came along when I had my clothes tucked up that way, and my head covered with a white rag, I would run for dear life to get out of sight. Well, well! the gals then were innocent, unconfiscated creatures; now they are what the French call 'blazes.'"

HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY.

(Query in Advertisements, as thus:—)

TO BE SOLD, a bargain, a most disagreeable and undesirable DETACHED COTTAGE, in a charming neighborhood. There are three excellent reception-rooms, damp and mouldy in summer and flooded in winter, seven bedrooms, two with fire-places, the smelling of mice, but all low and inconveniently small, with little windows; Good Kitchen, swarming with black beetles, scullery ditto; out-house and wash-house filled with rats, who come out even in the daytime; a Paddock of no use, all broken down; Three Acres of Garden, lousy soil; River near, and the village sewerage also. The present tenant will be glad to get out of it on any terms. He believes the Landlord would part with the lease for a fair consideration.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER I.

THE LETTER FROM BEYOND THE SEA.

ON the morning of July 21, 1846, the Daily News announced the arrival of the ship Rival at Sydney, New South Wales. As ocean steam navigation had not yet extended so far, the advent of this ship with the English mail created the usual excitement. An eager crowd beset the post-office, waiting for the delivery of the mail; and little knots at the street corners were busily discussing the latest hints at news which had been gathered from papers brought ashore by the officers or passengers.

At the lower end of King Street was a large warehouse, with an office at the upper extremity, over which was a new sign, which showed with newly-gilded letters the words:

COMPTON & BRANDON.

The general appearance of the warehouse showed that Messrs. Compton and Brandon were probably commission merchants, general agents, or something of that sort.

On the morning mentioned two men were in the inner office of this warehouse. One was an elderly gentleman, with a kind, benevolent aspect, the senior partner of the firm. The other was the junior partner, and in every respect presented a marked contrast to his companion.

He had a face of rather unusual appearance, and an air which in England is usually considered foreign. His features were regular—a straight nose, wide brow, thin lips, and square, massive chin. His complexion was olive, and his eyes were of a dark hazel color, with a peculiarity about them which is not usually seen in the eye of the Teutonic or Celtic race, but is sometimes found among the people of the south of Europe, or in the East. It is difficult to find a name for this peculiarity. It may be seen sometimes in the gipsy; sometimes in the more successful among those who call themselves "spiritual mediums," or among the more powerful mesmerizers. Such an eye belonged to Napoleon Bonaparte, whose glance at times could make the boldest and greatest among his marshals quail. What is it? Magnetism? Or the revelation of the soul? Or what?

In this man there were other things which gave him the look of the great Napoleon. The contour of feature was the same; and on his brow, broad and massive, there might be seen those grand shadows with which French artists love to glorify the Emperor. Yet in addition to this he had that same serene immobility of countenance which characterized the other, which could serve as an impenetrable mask to hide even the intensest passion.

There was also about this man a certain aristocratic air and grace of attitude, or of manner, which seemed to show lofty birth and gentle breeding, the mysterious index to good blood or high training. How such a man could have happened to fill the position of junior partner in a commission business was certainly a problem not easily solved. There he was, however, a man in appearance out of place, yet in reality able to fill that place with success; a man, in fact, whose resolute will enabled him to enforce success in any calling of life to which either outside circumstances or his own personal desires might invite him.

"The mail ought to be open by this time," said Brandon, indifferently, looking at his watch. "I am somewhat curious to see how things are looking. I noticed quotations of wool rather higher than by last mail. If the papers are correct which I saw then we ought to do very well by that last cargo."

Mr. Compton smiled.

"Well, Brandon," said he, "if it is so it will show that you are right. You anticipated a rise about this time. You know. You certainly have a remarkable forecast about the chances of business."

"I don't think there is much forecast," said Brandon, with a smile. "It was only the most ordinary calculation made from the well-known fact that the exportation this year had been slight. But there comes Hedley now," he continued, moving his head a little to one side so as to look up the street. "The letters will soon show us all."

Mr. Compton looked out in the direction which Brandon indicated and saw the clerk approaching. He then settled himself back in his chair, put his hands in his pockets, threw one leg over the other, and began whistling a tune with the air of a man who was so entirely prosperous and contented that no news whether good or evil could greatly affect his fortunes.

In a short time the clerk entered the inner office, and, laying the letters down upon the table nearest Mr. Compton, he withdrew.

Mr. Compton took up the letters one by one and read the addresses, while Brandon looked carelessly on. There were ten or twelve of them, all of which, except one, were addressed to the firm. This one Mr. Compton selected from among the others, and reaching it out in his hand said:

"This is for you, Mr. Brandon."

"For me?" repeated Brandon, with marked surprise; and taking the letter he looked at the address with eager curiosity.

The address was simply as follows:

Louis Brandon, Sydney, New South Wales.

The letters were irregular and loosely formed, as though written by a tremulous hand—such letters as old men form when the muscles have become relaxed.

Mr. Compton went on opening the letters of the firm without taking any further notice of his partner. The latter sat for some time looking at the letter without venturing to open it. He held it in both hands, and looked fixedly at that address as though from the address itself he was trying to extort some meaning.

He held it thus in both hands looking fixedly at it, with his head bent forward. Had Mr. Compton thought of taking a look at his usually impassive companion, he would have been surprised at the change which had taken place in him at the mere sight of that tremulous handwriting. For in that he had read grief, misfortune, perhaps death; and as he sat there, pausing before he dared to break the seal, the contents of the letter had already been conjectured.

Gloom therefore unutterable gathered upon his face; his features fixed themselves into such rigidity of grief that they became more expressive than if they had been distorted by passionate emotions; and over his brow collected cloud upon cloud, which deepened and darkened every instant till they overshadowed all; and his face in its statuesque fixedness resembled nothing so much as that which the artist gives to Napoleon at the crisis hour of Waterloo, when the Guard has recoiled from its last charge, and from that Imperial face in its fixed agony the soul itself seems to cry, "Lost!" "Lost!"

Yet it was only for a few minutes. Hastily tion of a lying scoundrel. May God have mercy upon me for this!

"I have not much strength, dear boy; I have to write at intervals, and by stealth, so as not to be discovered, for I am closely watched. He must never know that I have sent this to you. Frank and your mother are both sick, and my only help is your sister, my sweet Edith; she watches me, and enables me to write this in safety."

"I must tell you all without reserve before strength leaves me forever."

"That man Potts, whom you so justly hated, was and is the cause of all my suffering and of yours. You used to wonder how such a man as that, a low, vulgar knave, could gain such an influence over me and sway me as he did. I will try to explain."

"Perhaps you remember something about the lamentable death of my old friend Colonel Despard. The first that I ever heard of this man Potts was in his connection with Despard, for whom he acted partly as valet, and partly as business agent. Just before Despard left to go on his fatal voyage he wrote to me about his affairs, and stated, in conclusion, that this man Potts was going to England, that he was sorry to lose him, but recommended him very earnestly to me."

"You recollect that Colonel Despard was murdered on this voyage under very mysterious circumstances on shipboard. His Malay servant Uracao was convicted and executed. Potts distinguished himself by his zeal in avenging his master's death."

"About a year after this Potts himself came to England and visited me. He was, as you know, a rough, vulgar man; but his connection with my murdered friend, and the warm recommendations of that friend, made me receive him with the greatest kindness. Besides, he had ternative and became an outcast. My noble boy—my true-hearted son, that last look of yours, with all its reproach, is haunting my dying hours. If you were only near me now how peacefully I could die!

"My strength is failing. I can not describe the details of my ruin. Enough that the mine broke down utterly, and I as chief stockholder was responsible for all. I had to sell out every thing. The stock was worthless. The Hall and the estates all went. I had no friend to help me, for by my madness I had alienated them all. All this came upon me during the last year."

"But mark this, my son. This man Potts was not ruined. He seemed to have grown possessed of a colossal fortune. When I reproached him with being the author of my calamity, and insisted that he ought to share it with me, the scoundrel laughed in my face."

"The Hall and the estates were sold, for, unfortunately, though they have been in our family for ages, they were not entailed. A feeling of honor was the cause of this neglect. They were sold, and the purchaser was this man Potts. He must have bought them with the money that he had plundered from me."

"Now, since my eyes have been opened, I have had many thoughts; and among all that occurs to me none is more prominent than the mysterious murder of my friend. This man Potts was with him at the time. He was chief witness against the Malay. The counsel for the defense bore down hard on him, but he managed to escape, and Uracao was executed. Yet this much is evident, that Potts was largely benefited by the death of Despard. He could not have made all his money by his own savings. I believe that the man who wronged me so foully was fully capable of murder. So strong is this conviction now that I sometimes have a superstitious feeling that because I neglected all inquiry into the death of my friend, therefore he has visited me from that other life, and punished me, by making the same man the ruin of us both."

"The mine, I now believe, was a colossal sham; and all the money that I invested in stocks went directly to Potts. Good God! what madness was mine!"

"O my boy! Your mother and your brother are lying here sick; your sister attends on us all, though little more than a child. Soon I must leave them; and for those who are destined to live there is a future which I shudder to contemplate. Come home at once. Come home, whatever you are doing. Leave all business, and all prospects, and come and save them. That much you can do. Come, if it is only to take them back with you to that new land where you live, where they may forget their anguish."

"Come home, my son, and take vengeance. This, perhaps, you can not do, but you at least can try. By the time that you read these words they will be my voice from the grave; and thus I invoke you, and call you to take vengeance."

"But at least come and save your mother, your brother, and your sister. The danger is imminent. Not a friend is left. They all hold aloof, indignant at me. This miscreant has his own plans with regard to them, I doubt not; and he will disperse them or send them off to starve in some foreign land. Come and save them."

"But I warn you to be careful about yourself for their sakes. For this villain is powerful now, and hates you worse than any body. His arm may reach even to the antipodes to strike you there. Be on your guard. Watch every one. For once, from words which fell from him hastily, I gathered that he had some dark plan against you. Trust no one. Rely on yourself, and may God help you!"

"Poor boy! I have no estate to leave you now, and what I do send to you may seem to you like a mockery. Yet do not despise it. Who knows what may be possible in these days of science? Why may it not be possible to force the sea to give up its prey?"

"I send it, at any rate, for I have nothing else to send. You know that it has been in our family for centuries, and have heard how stout old Peter Leggit, with nine sailors, escaped by night through the Spanish fleet, and what suffering they endured before they reached England. He brought this, and it has been preserved ever since. A legend has grown up, as a matter of course, that the treasure will be recovered one day when the family is at its last extremity. It may not be impossible. The writer intended that something should come of it."

"If in that other world to which I am going the disembodied spirit can assist man, then be sure, O my son, I will assist you, and in the crisis of your fate I will be near, if it is only to communicate to your spirit what you ought to do."

"God bless you, dear boy, and farewell."

"Your affectionate father, RALPH BRANDON."

This letter was evidently written by fragmentary portions, as though it had been done at intervals. Some parts were written leisurely—others apparently in haste. The first half had been written evidently with the greatest ease. The writing of the last half showed weakness and tremulousness of hand; many words would have been quite illegible to one not familiar with the handwriting of the old man. Sometimes the word was written two or three times, and there were numerous blots and unmeaning lines. It grew more and more illegible toward the close. Evidently it was the work of one who was but ill able to exert even sufficient strength to hold a pen in his trembling hand.

In this letter there was folded a large piece of coarse paper, evidently a blank leaf torn from a book, brown with age, which was worn at the folds, and protected there by pieces of cotton which had been pasted upon it. The paper was subduing his feeling Brandon rose, and clutching the letter in his hand as though it were too precious to be trusted to his pocket, he quietly left the office and the warehouse and walked up the street.

He walked on rapidly until he reached a large building which bore the sign "Australian Hotel." Here he entered, and walked up stairs to a room, and locked himself in. Then when alone in his own apartments he ventured to open the letter.

The paper was poor and mean; the handwriting, like that of the address, was tremulous, and in many places quite illegible; the ink was pale; and the whole appearance of the letter seemed to indicate poverty and weakness on the part of the writer. By a very natural impulse Brandon hesitated before beginning to read, and took in all these things with a quick glance.

At last he nerved himself to the task and began to read.

This was the letter.

"BRANDON, March 10, 1846.

"MY DEAR BOY,—These are the last words which you will ever hear from your father. I am dying, my dear boy, and dying of a broken heart; but where I am dying I am afraid to tell you. That bitterness I leave for you to find out some day for yourself. In poverty unspeakable, in anguish that I pray you may never know, I turn to you after a silence of years, and my first word is to implore your forgiveness. I know my noble boy that you grant it, and it is enough for me to ask it. After asking this I can die content on that score."

"Lying as I do now at the point of death, I find myself at last freed from the follies and prejudices which have been my ruin. The clouds roll away from my mind, and I perceive what a mad fool I have been for years. Most of all I see the madness that instigated me to turn against you, and to put against the loyal love of the best of sons my own miserable pride and the accusa-many things to tell me about my poor friend, and brought the newspapers both from Manila and Calcutta which contained accounts of the trial.

"It was this man's desire to settle himself somewhere, and I gave him letters to different people. He then went off, and I did not see him for two years. At the end of that time he returned with glowing accounts of a tin mine which he was working in Cornwall. He had bought it at a low price, and the returns from working it had exceeded his most sanguine expectations. He had just organized a company, and was selling the stock. He came first to me to let me take what I wished. I carelessly took five thousand pounds' worth."

"On the following year the dividend was enormous, being nearly sixty per cent. Potts explained to me the cause, declaring that it was the richest mine in the kingdom, and assuring me that my £5000 was worth ten times that sum. His glowing accounts of the mine interested me greatly. Another year the dividend was higher, and he assured me that he expected to pay cent. per cent."

"It was then that the demon of avarice took full possession of me. Visions of millions came to me, and I determined to become the richest man in the kingdom. After this I turned every thing I had into money to invest in the mine. I raised enormous sums on my landed estate, and put all that I was worth, and more too, into the speculation. I was fascinated, not by this man, but by the wealth that he seemed to represent. I believed in him to the utmost. In vain my friends warned me. I turned from them, and quarreled with most of them. In my madness I refused to listen to the entreaties of my poor wife, and turned even against you. I can not bear to allude to those mournful days when you denounced that villain to his face before me; when I ordered you to beg his pardon or leave my roof forever; when you chose the latter al-covered with writing, in ink that was much faded, though still quite legible.

Opening this Brandon read the following:

that I had here must give way to the call of the sternest duty. In that letter which I received last night there came a summons home which I though I do not seek to look into that reason.

"Believe me," said Brandon, "I would show you the letter at once, but it is so terrible that I would rather that you should not know. It is worse than death, and I do not even yet begin to know the worst."

The old man sighed, and looked at him with deep commiseration.

"If our separation must indeed be final," said he, at last, "I will take care that you shall suffer no loss. You shall have your full share of the capital."

"I leave that entirely to you," said Brandon.

"Fortunately our business is not much scattered. A settlement can easily be made, and I will arrange it so that you shall not have any loss. Our balance-sheet was made out only last month, and it showed our firm to be worth thirty thousand pounds. Half of this is yours, and—"

"Half!" interrupted the other. "My dear friend, you mean a quarter."

The old man waved his hand.

"I said half, and I mean half."

"I will never consent."

"You must."

"Never."

"You shall. Why, think of the petty business that I was doing when you came here. I was worth about four thousand. You have built up the business to its present dimensions. Do you suppose that I don't know?"

"I can not allow you to make such a sacrifice," said Brandon.

"Stop," said Mr. Compton. "I have not said all. I attach a condition to this which I implore you not to refuse. Listen to me, and you will then be able to see."

Mr. Compton rose and looked carefully out into the office. There was no one near. He then returned, locked the door, and drawing his chair close to Brandon, began, in a low voice:

"You have your secrets and I have mine. I don't wish to know yours, but my own I am going to tell to you, not merely for the sake of sympathy, but rather for the sake of your assistance. I am going to tell you who I am, and why I came out here."

"My name is not Compton. It is Henry Lawton. All my early life was passed at York. There I married, had a son, and lived happily for years—in fact, during the childhood of my boy."

"It was that boy of mine, Edgar, that led to all my troubles. I suppose we indulged him too much. It was natural. He was our only child, and so we ruined him. He got beyond our control at last, and used to run wild about the streets of York. I did what I could to save him, but it was too late."

"He went on from bad to worse, until at last he got in with a set of miscreants who were among the worst in the country. My God! to think how my boy, once a sweet child, could have fallen so low. But he was weak, and easily led, and so he went on from bad to worse."

"I can not bear to go into particulars," said the old man, after a long pause. "I will come at once to the point. My poor, wretched boy got in with these miscreants, as I was telling you, and I did not see him from one month's end to another. At last a great burglary took place. Three were arrested. Among these two were old offenders, hardened in vice, the one named Briggs, the other Crocker; the third was my unhappy boy."

The old man was silent for some time.

"I do not think, after all, that he was guilty; but Briggs turned King's Evidence, and Crocker and my son were condemned to transportation. There was no help."

"I sold out all I had in the world, and in compliance with the entreaties of my poor wife, who nearly went mad with grief, I came out here."

I changed my name to Compton. My boy's term was for three years. I began a business out here, and as my boy behaved well he was able to get permission to hire out as a servant. I took him nominally as my servant, for no one knew that he was my son, and so we had him with us again."

"I hoped that the bitter lesson which he had learned would prove beneficial, but I did not know the strength of evil inclinations. As long as his term of imprisonment lasted he was content and behaved well; but at last, when the three years were up, he began to grow restive. Crocker was freed at about the same time, and my boy fell again under his evil influence. This lasted for about a year, when, at last, one morning a letter was brought me from him stating that he had gone to India."

"My poor wife was again nearly distracted. She thought of nothing but her boy. She made me take her and go in search of him again. So we went to India. After a long search I found him there, as I had feared, in connection with his old, vicious associates. True, they had changed their names, and were trying to pass for honest men. Crocker called himself Clark, and Briggs called himself Potts."

"Potts!" cried Brandon.

"Yes," said the other, who was too absorbed in his own thoughts to notice the surprise of Brandon. "He was in the employ of Colonel Despard, at Calcutta, and enjoyed much of his confidence."

"What year was this?" asked Brandon.

"1825," replied Mr. Compton. "Crocker," he continued, "was acting as a sort of shipping agent, and my son was his clerk. Of course, my first efforts were directed toward detaching my son from these scoundrels. I did all that I could. I offered to give him half of my property, and finally all, if he would only leave them forever and come back. The wretched boy refused. He did not appear to be altogether bad, but he had a weak nature, and could not get rid of the influence of these men."

"I staid in India a year and a half, until I found at last that there was no hope. I could find nothing to do there, and if I remained I would have to starve or go out to service. This I could not think of doing. So I prepared to come back here. But my wife refused to leave her son. She was resolved, she said, to stay by him till the last. I tried to dissuade her, but could not move her. I told her that I could not be a domestic. She said that she could do even that for the sake of her boy. And she went off at once, and got a situation as nurse with the same Colonel Despard with whom Briggs, or, as he called himself, Potts, was staying."

"What was the Christian name of this Potts?" asked Brandon, calmly.

"John—John Potts."

Brandon said nothing further, and Compton resumed.

"Thus my wife actually left me. I could not stay and be a slave. So I made her promise to write me, and told her that I would send her as much money as I could. She clung to me half broken-hearted as I left her. Our parting was a bitter one—bitter enough; but I would rather break my heart with grief than be a servant. Besides, she knew that whenever she came back my heart was open to receive her."

"I came back to my lonely life out here and lived for nearly two years. At last, in September 1828, a mail arrived from India bringing a letter from my wife, and Indian papers. The news which they brought well-nigh drove me mad."

Compton buried his face in his hands and remained silent for some time.

"You couldn't have been more than a child at that time, but perhaps you may have heard of the mysterious murder of Colonel Despard?"

He looked inquiringly at Brandon, but the latter gave no sign.

"Perhaps not," he continued—"no; you were too young, of course. Well, it was in the Vishnu, a brig in which the Colonel had embarked for Manila. The brig was laden with hogshead staves and box shooks, and the Colonel went there partly for his health, partly on business, taking with him his valet Potts."

"What became of his family?" interrupted Brandon.

"He had a son in England at school. His wife had died not long before this at one of the hill stations, where she had gone for her health. Grief may have had something to do with the Colonel's voyage, for he was very much attached to his wife."

"Mails used only to come at long intervals in those days, and this one brought the account not only of the Colonel's fate, but of the trial at

Not a word or a gesture escaped Brandon during the perusal of all this, but after he had finished he read it all through twice, and then laying down the letter he paced up and down the room. His olive skin had become of a sickly tawny hue, his eyes glowed with intense lustre, and his brow was covered with the gloomy Napoleonic clouds, but not a nerve was shaken by the shock of this dread intelligence.

Evening came and night; and the night passed, and morning came, but it found him still there pacing the room.

CHAPTER II.

A LIFE TRAGEDY.

EARLIER than usual Brandon was at the office, and waited for some time before the senior partner made his appearance. When he came in it was with a smile on his face, and a general air of congratulation to all the world.

"Well, Brandon," said he, cordially, "that last shipment has turned out finely. More than a thousand pounds. And it's all your doing. I objected, but you were right. Let me congratulate you."

Something in Brandon's face seemed to surprise the old gentleman, and he paused for a moment. "Why what's the matter, my boy?" he said, in a paternal voice. "You have not heard any bad news, I hope, in that letter—I hope it's nothing serious?"

Brandon gave a faint smile.

"Serious enough," said he, looking away with an abstracted gaze, "to put a sudden end to my Australian career."

"Oh no—oh no!" said the other, earnestly; "not so bad as that."

"I must go home at once."

"Oh well, that may be, but you will be back again. Take a leave of absence for five years if you wish, but don't quit for good. I'll do the business and won't complain, my boy. I'll keep your place comfortable for you till your return."

Brandon's stern face softened as he looked at the old man, whose features were filled with the kindest expression, and whose tone showed the affectionate interest which he felt.

"Your kindness to me, Mr. Compton," said he, very slowly, and with deep feeling, "has been beyond all words. Ever since I first came to this country you have been the truest and the best of friends. I hope you know me well enough to believe that I can never forget it. But now all this is at an end, and all the bright prospects can not neglect, and my whole life hereafter must be directed toward the fulfillment of that summons. From mid-day yesterday until dawn this morning I paced my room incessantly, laying out my plans for the future thus suddenly thrust upon me, and though I have not been able to decide upon any thing definite, yet I see plainly that nothing less than a life will enable me to accomplish my duty. The first thing for me to do is to acquaint you with this and to give up my part in the business."

Mr. Compton placed his elbow on the table near which he had seated himself, leaned his head upon his hand, and looked at the floor. From Brandon's tone he perceived that this resolution was irrevocable. The deep dejection which he felt could not be concealed. He was silent for a long time.

"God knows," said he, at last, "that I would rather have failed in business than that this should have happened."

Brandon looked away and said nothing.

"It comes upon me so suddenly," he continued. "I do not know what to think. And how can I manage these vast affairs without your assistance? For you were the one who did our business. I know that well. I had no head for it."

"You can reduce it to smaller proportions," said Brandon; "that can easily be done."

The old man sighed.

"After all," he continued, "it is not the business. It's losing you that I think of, dear boy. I'm not thinking of the business at all. My grief is altogether about your departure. I grieve, too, at the blow which must have fallen on you to make this necessary."

"The blow is a heavy one," said Brandon; "so heavy that every thing else in life must be forgotten except the one thought—how to recover from it; and perhaps, also," he added, in a lower voice, "how to return it."

Mr. Compton was silent for a long time, and with every minute the deep dejection of his face and manner increased. He folded his arms and shut his eyes in deep thought.

"My boy," said he at last, in that same paternal tone which he had used before, and in a mild, calm voice, "I suppose this thing can not be helped, and all that is left for me to do is to bear it as best I may. I will not indulge in any selfish sorrow in the presence of your greater trouble. I will rather do all in my power to coincide with your wishes. I see now that you must have a good reason for your decision, al-

"THERE'S SOME MYSTERY ABOUT IT WHICH I CAN'T FATHOM."

Manilla and the execution of the man that was condemned.

"It was a very mysterious case. In the month of July a boat arrived at Manilla which carried the crew and one passenger from the brig Vishau. One of the men, a Malay named Uracao, was in irons, and he was immediately given up to the authorities."

"Who were the others?"

"Potts, as he called himself, the Colonel's valet, Clark, three Lascars, and the Captain, an Italian named Cigole. Information was at once laid against the Malay. Potts was the chief witness. He said that he slept in the cabin while the Colonel slept in an inner state-room; that one morning early he was roused by a frightful shriek and saw Uracao rushing from the Colonel's state-room. He sprang up, chased him, and caught him just as he was about to leap overboard. His creese covered with blood was in his hand. The Colonel, when they went to look at him, had his throat cut from ear to ear. Clark swore that he was steering the vessel and saw Potts catch Uracao, and helped to hold him. The Captain, Cigole, swore that he was waked by the noise, and rushed out in time to see this. Clark had gone as mate of the vessel. Of the Lascars, two had been down below, but one was on deck and swore to have seen the same. On this testimony Uracao was condemned and executed."

"How did they happen to leave the brig?"

"They said that a great storm came up about three days' sail from Manilla, the vessel sprang a leak, and they had to take to the boat. Their testimony was very clear indeed, and there were no contradictions; but in spite of all this it was felt to be a very mysterious case, and even the exhibition of the Malay creese, carefully covered with the stains of blood, did not altogether dispel this feeling."

"Have you got the papers yet, or are there any in Sydney that contain an account of this affair?"

"I have kept them all. You may read the whole case if you care about it."

"I should like to, very much," said Brandon, with great calmness.

"When I heard of this before the mail was opened I felt an agony of fear lest my miserable boy might be implicated in some way. To my immense relief his name did not occur at all."

"You got a letter from your wife?" said Brandon, interrogatively.

"Yes," said the old man, with a sigh. "The last that I ever received from her. Here it is." And, saying this, he opened his pocket-book and took out a letter, worn and faded, and blackened by frequent readings.

Brandon took it respectfully, and read the following:

"CALOUTTA, August 15, 1828.

"MY DEAREST HENRY,—By the papers that I send you, you will see what has occurred. Our dear Edgar is well, indeed better than usual, and I would feel much cheered if it were not for the sad fate of the poor Colonel. This is the last letter that you will ever receive from me. I am going to leave this country never to return, and do not yet know where I will go. Wherever I go I will be with my darling Edgar. Do not worry about me or about him. It will be better for you to try and forget all about us, since we are from this time the same as dead to you. Good-by forever, my dearest husband; it shall be my daily prayer that God may bless you."

"Your affectionate wife, MARY."

Brandon read this in silence, and handed it back.

"A strange letter," said Compton, mournfully. "At first it gave a bitter pang to think of my Mary thus giving me up forever, so coldly, and for no reason; but afterward I began to understand why she wrote this."

"My belief is, that these villains kept my son in their clutches for some good reason, and that they had some equally good reason for keeping her. There's some mystery about it which I can't fathom. Perhaps she knew too much about the Colonel's affairs to be allowed to go free. They might have detained her by working upon her love for her son, or simply by terrifying her. She was always a timid soul, poor Mary. That letter is not her composition; there is not a word there that sounds like her, and they no doubt told her what to write, or wrote out something, and made her copy it."

"And now," said Compton, after another long pause, "I have got to the end of my story. I know nothing more about them. I have lived here ever since, at first despairing, but of late more resigned to my lot. Yet still if I have one desire in life it is to get some trace of these dear ones whom I still love as tenderly as ever. You, my dear boy, with your ability may conjecture some way. Besides, you will perhaps be traveling more or less, and may be able to hear of their fate. This is the condition that I make. I implore you by your pity for a heart-broken father to do as I say and help me. Half! why, I would give all that I have if I could get them back again."

Brandon shuddered perceptibly at the words "heart-broken father;" but he quickly recovered himself. He took Compton's hand and pressed it warmly.

"Dear friend, I will make no objection to any thing, and I promise you that all my best efforts shall be directed toward finding them out."

"Tell them to come to me, that I am rich, and can make them happy."

"I'll make them go to you if they are alive," said Brandon.

"God bless you!" ejaculated the old man, fervently.

Brandon spent the greater part of that day in making business arrangements, and in reading the papers which Compton had preserved containing an account of the Despard murder.

It was late at night before he returned to his hotel. As he went into the hall he saw a stranger sitting there in a lounging attitude reading the Sydney News.

He was a thin, small-sized man, with a foreign air, and quick, restless manner. His features were small, a heavy beard and mustache covered his face, his brow was low, and his eyes black and twinkling. A sharp, furtive glance which he gave at Brandon attracted the attention of the latter, for there was something in the glance that meant more than idle curiosity.

Even in the midst of his cares Brandon's curiosity was excited. He walked with assumed indifference up to the desk as though looking for the key of his room. Glancing at the hotel book his eye ranged down the column of names till it rested on the last one,

"Pietro Cigole."

—Cigole! the name brought singular associations. Had this man still any connection with Potts? The words of his father's letter rushed into his mind—"His arm may reach even to the antipodes to strike you. Be on your guard. Watch every one. He has some dark plan against you!"

With these thoughts in his mind Brandon went up to his room.

THE ROYAL CHART, FOR DRESSMAKING.

THE ROYAL CHART surpasses every system hitherto known for cutting and fitting ladies' and children's dresses. The distinctive merits which have gained for it so much celebrity throughout Europe, the patronage and entire confidence of the most eminent dressmakers, warrant the prediction that in America, where fashion and economy are studied, its use will become universal. The immense superiority of the Royal Chart over every other system is established beyond a question. There is a wonderful fascination in every garment cut by it. It is confidently recommended as a safe and reliable system to cut by, fitting any form with absolute certainty. Agents wanted. Address

THE BEST PAPER

FOR THE FAMILY, FOR THE FARMER,
FOR THE GARDENER, FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.
THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST, FOR THE FARM, GARDEN, AND HOUSEHOLD, including a SPECIAL INTERESTING AND INSTRUCTIVE DEPARTMENT FOR CHILDREN AND YOUTH.
Established in 1842.

A Good, Cheap, and very Valuable Paper for Every Man, Woman, and Child, IN CITY, VILLAGE, AND COUNTRY.

The Agriculturist is a large periodical of 32 to 40 pages, well printed, and filled with plain, practical, reliable original matter, including hundreds of beautiful and instructive ENGRAVINGS in every annual volume. It contains each month a Calendar of Operations to be performed on the FARM, in the ORCHARD, and GARDEN, in and around the DWELLING, etc. The HOUSEHOLD DEPARTMENT is valuable to every Housekeeper, affording many useful hints and directions calculated to lighten and facilitate in-door work.

20,000 DOLLARS and upward are expended every year by the Publishers in procuring the best, most reliable, and practical reading matter, and beautiful and instructive engravings for this paper. The cost of producing the American Agriculturist is divided among so great a host of subscribers that it amounts to but a trifle to each above the cost of the paper on which it is printed.

Tens of thousands of persons, old and young, in city and country, and in all the various trades and professions—owners of farms and those who never have owned a foot of ground—gardeners, fruit-growers, and others—have not only subscribed for the first time, but continued to be subscribers for years thereafter, and remain so to-day. No better proof than this fact is needed of its great value. The circulation to actual subscribers is doubtless larger than that of any monthly journal in the world.

30 to 50 beautiful engravings are given in each number. Every paper contains from 30 to 50 engravings, all of them by the best draughtsmen and engravers, and many of them very costly. Special attention is called to the engravings in the volume for the present year. All who are at all familiar with the difficulty and expense attendant upon the production of such pictures will, we are sure, acknowledge that the subscribers to the Agriculturist receive much for a little. And while these engravings are in the highest style of the art, they are so varied in character as to interest every member of a family, even the youngest.

1000s of HINTS, with other interesting and instructive reading matter, are provided for all.

FARMERS find here thousands of hints and suggestions about all kinds of farm-work.

MECHANICS find much that interests them in the engravings and descriptions of implements and machinery; also in directions for the culture of their garden lots, if they have them.

CITY MERCHANTS find a large amount of valuable information for the management of their country places, or which at least helps to keep bright in their minds the pleasing ideal of a beautiful place in the country, to which so many are looking forward when they shall retire from business.

COUNTRY MERCHANTS keep the paper in their stores where customers can see it, and many of them secure large clubs.

CHILDREN are delighted with the sketches and beautiful engravings found in the Boys' and Girls' Department.

EVERY BODY finds something to please, interest, and instruct; and by the constant and thorough exposure of humbugs in this paper, it is not too much to say, that thousands of dollars have been saved to the unwary from their being thus put upon their guard.

$1 50, $5 00, $12 00, $20 00.

TERMS.—The circulation of the American Agriculturist (about 150,000) is so large that it can be furnished at the low price of $1 50 a year; four copies for $5 00; ten copies for $12 00; twenty or more, $1 00 each; single numbers, 15 cents each.

NOW NOTICE OUR SPECIAL OFFER: All new Subscribers who shall, during the month of OCTOBER, send their subscription-money, and names marked new, for the year 1868, shall receive

THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST for the months of November and December, 1867, free.

This offer of TWO MONTHS FOR NOTHING, applies to ALL NEW SUBSCRIBERS RECEIVED IN OCTOBER, 1867, for the year 1868, whether single names or members of clubs. Thus: $1 50 pays for one copy of the American Agriculturist for the whole of 1868, and the subscriber receives the paper for the last two months of this year FREE. $5 will pay for FOUR subscribers for the whole of 1868, and each of them receives the paper for the last two months of this year FREE; that is, they receive the Agriculturist from November, 1867 to December, 1868 inclusive, and in the same way with the larger clubs, as above; and these names count on the Premium Lists.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIRS OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREY. Two Portraits on Steel. Large 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

"This pathetic book—glowing with household fondnesses, and plain to boldness in its resolute wish to let nothing go of the dead that can be saved—will speak to millions the things they understand best. A certain surprise will be felt on the part of some that a Queen can be so wholly a woman and a wife; but all will be glad that her Majesty makes friends of her readers, and tells them, like one who is not afraid to put her love to the test of the uttermost truth, how much she loved this man, and what good reason she had for her devotion."

HARPER'S WEEKLY, SPLENDIDLY ILLUSTRATED.

Critical Notices of the Press:
The MODEL NEWSPAPER of our country—complete in all the departments of an American Family Paper—HARPER'S WEEKLY has earned for itself a right to its title, "A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION."—New York Evening Post.

This Paper furnishes the best illustrations. Our future historians will enrich themselves out of HARPER'S WEEKLY long after writers, and printers, and publishers are turned to dust.—New York Evangelist.
HARPER'S WEEKLY may be unreservedly declared the best illustrated newspaper in America.—The Independent, New York.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY from week to week form a remarkable series of brief political essays. They are distinguished by clear and pointed statements, by good common sense, by independence and breadth of view. They are the expression of mature conviction, high principle, and strong feeling, and take their place among the best newspaper writing of the time.—North American Review, Boston, Mass.

"A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

The Publishers will commence, on November 1st, the issue of Harper's BAZAR, a Weekly Illustrated Family Journal, devoted to Fashion and Home Literature. Their aim is twofold: to supply the existing need of a Weekly Fashion Newspaper, and to combine therewith a first-class literary journal, which will be indispensable to every household.

It is the first Weekly Journal of Fashion ever published in the United States. The Publishers have made arrangements, at great cost, with the most celebrated of the Fashion Papers of Europe, especially with the famous Bazar of Berlin, which supplies the fashions to the leading journals of Paris, to furnish the same to them in advance, so that henceforth the fashions will appear in HARPER'S BAZAR simultaneously with their publication in Paris and Berlin—an advantage enjoyed by no other journal in the country.

The patrons of HARPER'S BAZAR will receive every fortnight large pattern-plates, containing from forty to fifty full-sized patterns of ladies', misses', and children's bonnets, cloaks, dresses, under-clothing, and other articles, accompanied with the necessary descriptions and directions, and occasionally an elegant colored fashion plate.

HARPER'S BAZAR, besides being the leading Fashion Journal in this country, will also aim to present before its readers the very best specimens of Household Literature. It will contain original and selected Serial Stories, Poetry, Novelties, Articles on the Topics of the Day (excluding Politics), on Books, Art, Morals, Familiar Science, Education, Amusements, Hygiene, Etiquette, Housekeeping, Gardening, with Home and Foreign Gossip. No subject of household interest will be excluded from its columns.

HARPER'S BAZAR will contain 16 folio pages, of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superfine calendered paper, and will be published weekly.

Gentlemen's Fashions.

The fashions for gentlemen have undergone no notable change. The vestons or short coats still continue to be worn, with collars rolling low, and either open or fastened by a single button on the middle of the chest. The vests are usually of the same material as the coats, and, whether single or double breasted, or with rolling or standing collars, are buttoned up nearly or quite to the throat. Pantaloons, though somewhat looser than during the two last seasons, are still very tight.

No change has been made in the material of over-coats, which are generally of warm, thick, and light moutonne, or a sort of Petersham. Peculiar shades, such as greenish and yellowish mixtures, are avoided by persons of good taste, for a conspicuous color in an over-coat, that is worn every day, soon grows common, which is not the case with simple and decided tints. Narrow black and white, and blue and white stripes continue to be worn for pantaloons. A number of light blue and black stripes are still seen, but these were worn so much in the spring that fashionable persons have grown tired of them, and are likely to cast them aside this winter. Some pretty plaids are seen; but the taste for stripes is so decided that they obtain comparatively little favor. There are also some very fine ribbed cloths, but stripes prevail over every thing. There is very little novelty in materials specially designed for vests, which will generally be made of the same stuff as the coat.

We annex illustrations of the latest Parisian fall styles:

Fig. 1.—Dress for a boy from five to six years old. Jacket, vest, and knickerbockers, all of the same stuff. Jacket cut straight behind, without a seam, if the material will admit, and confined by a button at the throat. Vest, with standing collar, almost as long as the jacket, and likewise buttoned to the throat. Knickerbockers tucked into top boots, ornamented with tassels. Trimming: simple black galloon laid flat around the jacket and vest, and down the seams of the knickerbockers.

Fig. 2.—Short veston of black English velvet, cut like a sack behind, and slightly rounding in front, with a collar, rolling high. Single-breasted vest, of the same material as the veston, buttoning to the throat. Veston and vest bound round the edge with silk braid. Nut-brown pantaloons, cut rather loose.

Fig. 3.—Morning dress with light over-coat. Veston of mixed brown and black, with four buttons. Collar rolling low. Side pockets, with lapels. Vest of the same material as the veston, with standing collar, buttoning up to the throat. Blue and white striped pantaloons, almost tight, without straps. Over-coat cut like a sack behind, and full enough in the front to button easily.

Fig. 4.—Short, double-breasted coat à la Française, of bright blue cloth, tight fitting in the back and rounding in front, and fastened by the third button from the bottom. Standing collar vest, of the same material as the coat, and buttoning to the throat. Black and white striped pantaloons, somewhat loose.

Fig. 5.—Coat à la Française, but more full-dress than the preceding one, of plain bronze cloth, and open in front. The whole proportions are less scanty, and the facings are of silk. Double-breasted vest of white pique or light cloth, buttoned over. Tight-fitting striped pantaloons, with small straps.

Fig. 6.—Lady's morning dress. Jacket of mixed bronze, bound and trimmed on the shoulders and pockets with black braid. Waist of batiste, like a gentleman's shirt, and gored skirt of pearl gray silk faye, very short, with no fullness, and trimmed with a braid of the same, a quarter of a yard from the bottom.

Fig. 7.—Suit of the same material. Coat à l'Anglaise, fastened in front with a single button. Collar rolling low, with a step. Side pockets with lapels. Sleeves rather loose. Chevalière vest, buttoning to the throat, with rolling collar. Double row of stitching round the edge of the vest and coat. Pantaloons cut tight, and just long enough to fall over the boot, without straps.

the old medieval town of Vire, the Switzerland of Normandy. The town is fraught with historical associations; its castle, the ruins of which are still standing, was besieged by Henry I. of England in 1123; John Lackland came thither thrice, in 1193, 1201, and 1203, a week after the murder of Arthur; within its walls the chivalric Du Guesclin planned the expedition which ended in freeing France from the English, and made it the rallying place for his warriors; it was captured and recaptured by the contending parties during the religious wars, and was finally dismantled by Richelieu's orders about the middle of the seventeenth century. The net-work of railroads that radiates from Paris has at length reached this remote spot; the opening of its first railway was celebrated a few weeks since, and it is safe to predict that the striking costumes of its inhabitants will soon give way to the innovations of modern fashion.

FALL COSTUMES.

A RETROSPECT.

No sunflower gilds the faded lawn;
A breathless calm the wide air fills;
A silver-threaded mist is drawn
Across the purple of the hills.

An azure vein the river flows,
With scarce a murmur through the vale,
By banks where in sweet April blows
The trembling violet, chill and pale.

The light mist veils the autumn sun;
Flown are the robin and the wren;
Afar the eager sportsman's gun
Wakes the dull echoes of the glen.

Around me stand the leafless woods
By many a narrow pathway crossed;
And over all the landscape broods
A tender sense of something lost.

Last year when ripened was the wheat;
And copse and field with song were gay;
When, soft and low, the wind blew sweet
With scent of clover and of hay—

Here, where of old my feet were used
To linger in the years before,
In silent thought I sat and mused
On all the future had in store.

To-day I turn my searching gaze
Back through the vista of those years,
And seen as through a slender haze
The shadowy past once more appears.

All round me are the leafless woods
By many a silent pathway crossed;
And in my secret heart there broods
A tender sense of something lost.

THE HOUSE QUESTION.

HEAVY taxation, and the consequent increase in the cost of living, is forcing our prodigal people at last to some consideration of the necessity of economy. There is nothing in which they have hitherto displayed their characteristic love of show and expense so much as in their houses.

Eager as the Americans always are to make a demonstration of their real or pretended success, they have found, in the obviousness of heaps of stone and brick and mortar, the means of public manifestation they sought. To a people devoted to material pursuits, and only conscious of their visible and tangible results, the big house in the fashionable and frequented thoroughfare seems a substantial and ocular proof of the prosperity with which, if genuine or not, they are desirous of dazzling the eye of the world.

Thus our citizens have generally lived in dwellings the cost or rent of which has been inordinately great in proportion to their fortunes and incomes. In Europe a man seldom lives in a house at an annual rent of more than one-tenth of the amount of his whole revenue. In the United States rent is generally in the proportion of one-third, and not seldom one-half, or even more, of the annual income. In England the annuitant or man of business who has £800, or $4000, per annum to spend takes a house at a rent of £80, or $400. In France the man of equal means is content with a dwelling at even less rent—say 1500 francs, or $300, a year. In the United States one who has $4000 a year, or only hopes to make that sum in the course of the twelvemonth, is sure to live in a mansion the yearly rent of which costs him at least $1200, and often $2000, if not more. The disproportion in these exorbitant times is occasionally still greater. A family not seldom rents a furnished house at $500 a month, making $6000 per annum, when it has but $4000 more to meet the other expenses of the year.

This is paying quite too much for a monument of brick and mortar to commemorate even a genuine, and certainly a sham success. It is needless to point out the ludicrous results of this egregious disproportion between rent and annual income. There is the obvious absurdity manifest to all of paying enormously for a house and not living in it, for in most cases the possessor spends so much for the rent that he has nothing to spare for what is necessary to make it habitable. He accordingly furnishes a show-room or two to aid in keeping up the illusion, and has nothing but bare floors and empty space every where else, inclusive even of the larder. The display of sham prosperity, too, in the big house is apt to affect the whole life, giving it an artificial character, which is ruinous to candor and honest independence. It besides provokes other expenditure, and thus leads to overstrained and dangerous enterprise in business, to bankruptcy and fraud.

Complaints are frequently uttered against landlords and builders for not constructing houses suitable for people of moderate means; but it is probably rather the fault of the latter, for the former are only seeking a market, and, like all other traders and manufacturers, strive to adapt the supply to the demand. If our aspiring citizens were content to live in small houses, and asked for them, they would certainly get them.

The inevitable tax-gatherer and the pressure of other expensive necessities are fortunately squeezing out of some of our people a sense of prudence, and with it the cry for less costly dwellings. Let the cry become general, and there will soon be in our cities suitable residences for families of moderate means, whether they be like the snug, “self-contained” citizens' boxes of London, or the populous structures of separate étages and “flats” of Paris and Edinburgh.

THE BODIES OF ANIMALS.

EVERY animal, whether large or small, is an aggregation of individual machines, infinitely more complicated than a steam-engine, which in their combined action maintain life. Thus the liver, the largest single organ in the body of all carnivorous animals as well as man, is a structure so marvelously contrived and wonderful in its functions that learned physiologists are obliged to acknowledge they have not yet succeeded in displaying its minute anatomical structure.

In all the newly-born the liver is disproportionately large, occupying a great deal of room in the abdomen; but after birth it seems to remain stationary a long while. In the mean time the other viscera in that cavity begin to develop and finally overtake the liver, and ever after maintain a harmonious relation to it.

Strange as it may appear, besides elaborating a bitter fluid very copiously, the precise use of which still defies the prying scrutiny of medical philosophers, the liver is also a sugar-making apparatus.

Every young child, for example, requires in its system a very considerable amount of sugar daily, from which is taken certain elements essential to their growth and status of health. When, therefore, they are habitually anxious for sweet things, as confectionery, etc., it is the plain language of nature that they require more than is prepared for them within their own bodies. A large part of all our food, particularly bread, potatoes, rice, fruits, etc., yield starch. When certain fluids of the mouth are mixed with the morsels swallowed and fall down into the stomach, it becomes chemically changed into a sweetish sly paste. From that mass the sugar is evolved by another vital process, and subsequently united with other substances, and then conveyed into the circulation to be carried to the remotest part of the frame to become a component part of the body.

So important is a sound liver to health that any disease which deranges its action very soon exhibits its effects on the whole system. And among the agents which most seriously interfere with its labors to the destruction of life is intemperance. It is impossible to indulge habitually in strong, fiery, alcoholic drinks without inducing disease of that great gland. If we indulge in excesses the liver ultimately exhibits symptoms of dissatisfaction by imperfectly performing its appropriate duties. Excessive stimulation of the stomach, either by concentrated fluids or highly-seasoned food, registers the abuse in the liver. And when carried too far, neither pills nor powders, however skillfully prepared, can repair the violence it has suffered. Good health is a boon never so much valued as when beyond reach. Thousands upon thousands of our countrymen cut short the golden thread of life by their own sovereign indiscretion who might have lived to venerable old age.

The delicious flavor of the peach is due to the presence of prussic acid. It is so diluted and guarded by nature as to heighten the nutritious qualities of that delicious fruit. But if all the other juices with which it is chemically commingled were evaporated, and we only had the prussic acid in its most potent concentrated form as manufactured in the laboratory, it would become a poison so deadly in character that a single drop placed on the tongue of a cat would kill her instantly.

Now, the alcohol taken with our ordinary food, made from any kind of grain, potatoes, apples, pears, the grape, etc., nourishes, and promotes health, comfort, and length of days. On the other hand, when by distillation the water with which it is associated in its original condition is driven off, leaving the alcohol intensely strong, the violence it does to the delicate walls of the stomach, taken into that terribly abused organ, the most dreadful consequences invariably follow. In one it shows its direful presence in a red nose, loss of appetite, red eyes, an enlarged liver, a swollen spleen, or dropsical effusions. Another wanders about half bereft of his senses, showing in his tattered garments, slothful habits, and empty pockets, the ruinous career of those who abuse the gifts of nature.

PUPPIES COMING IN.

OUR dames have had hitherto such a free supply of natural objects of affection that they have been enabled to dispense with the ordinary substitutes resorted to by those of less prolific countries. Animal pets, other than those of the human creation, have never greatly abounded with us, and it was rare, until now, to behold feminine tenderness expending its caresses except upon human lips. There was, it is true, occasionally to be seen an old French creole, with a turban of bandana handkerchief and a face as shriveled and yellow as the oranges she sold, billing and cooing with a green parrot or embracing a poodle, but that was all. American women used to turn away from such with disgust and keep their hugs and kisses exclusively for those of their own race.

A great change, however, as we learn on the best authority, has come over the taste of our American dames. It has taken, it seems, quite a decided canine complexion. Puppies are coming in with other fashions from Europe. Not a traveled party is now returning from London or Paris without an addition to the family in the shape of a little cur of foreign breed. They are of all varieties—the poodle, with nose of smut and tail of dust-brush; the Italian greyhound, sleek and flexible as a serpent; the little Skye-terrier, long-whiskered and unshorn as a Californian digger; the watery-eyed and silken-coated Blenheim or King Charles, and the Lilliputian “black and tan.” These represent all varieties of canine disposition, and are selected by their female admirers in accordance with their own caprices or tempers. The poodle is ordinarily grave and docile, and by his due regard to the proprieties of life commends himself to the prudish. He, however, is expensive, and to keep him in good odor demands a great supply of soap and Cologne. The Italian greyhound is vivacious, and is a favorite of course with romps; but he requires to be carefully watched, as he is apt to forget the proprieties, as, in fact, are most puppies of foreign education. The Scotch terrier is generally faithful, and suits the disappointed and broken-hearted; but he must be kept away from rats or mice, or even he will break his allegiance. The King Charles, tearful and submissive to caress, pleases the sentimental; but, though fond of luxury, can not endure much indulgence without becoming wheezy, and rheumy-eyed. As for that little cur, the “black and tan,” all that can, and what more need, be said in his favor is, that he is the fashion. He perforce, then, must suit all feminine tastes whether naturally sympathetic or not.

These last are at present all the rage in Paris, where they are readily sold for a thousand francs, or two hundred dollars in gold. The less there is of one of these diminutive quadrupeds the more he is valued. Would that, according to inexorable logic, he were reduced to nothing, and thus abolished! By some process or other the dog-breeders of France succeed in paring down the “black and tan” to an almost imperceptible smallness. Some of them weigh less than two pounds, and when of this minuteness are literally worth their weight in gold. A dame of New York, yielding to the fashion, has lately imported one from Paris, which makes its usual bed in her muff, and, as a make-shift, could squeeze itself into one of her silk stockings.

The pet cur, now so costly and so distinguished by fashion, must of course be treated with becoming respect. In a suit for recovery of a debt for board, tried the other day in the Sixth District Court of New York, the principal witness testified as follows: “The plaintiff would not board any where unless (a dog) Ned could be as sumptuously provided for as himself, and he must eat with the family; a mattress was brought for him, and he had the entire run of the house; he had broiled porter-house steaks and a cup of coffee regularly in the dining-room at the usual meal-times, generally on a side-plate, but frequently a chair was provided for Master Ned at the table, and he was a ‘boarder’ to all intents and purposes as the other members of the plaintiff’s family.”

In England the female taste for dogs has long prevailed. Steele, in the Tatler, says: “This is an evil I have for many years remarked in the fair sex; and as they are by nature very much formed for affection and dalliance, I have observed, that when by too obstinate a cruelty, or any other means, they have disappointed themselves of the proper objects of love, as husbands or children, such virgins have exactly at such a year grown fond of lap-dogs, parrots, or other animals. I know at this time a celebrated toast, whom I allow to be one of the most agreeable of her sex, that in the presence of her admirers will give a torrent of kisses to her cat, any one of which a Christian would be glad of.”

Here also, from the Tatler, is a scrap of dialogue between two “Toasts” of the time: “Nor do I believe you would be ashamed to confess that I saw you cry when your dog had the colic last week with lapping sour milk. What more could you do for your lover himself?”

“What more?” replied the lady. “There is not a man in England for whom I could lament half so much.” Then she stifled the animal with kisses, and called him Beau, Life, Dear, Monsieur, Pretty Fellow, and what not, in the hurry of her impertinence.”

A modern American traveler reports having seen descend from a carriage an English dowager—a little withered old woman, smothered in furs—followed by first little dog, second little dog, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth.” And we saw the other day, on a steamboat in our own bay, the family of the manager of the most fashionable of our Broadway theatres migrating to the country with five curs of every degree in their train.

With these foreign puppies coming in our native beaux will have to look to their laurels.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Melinda.

MY DEAR MELINDA,—Last week I wrote your cousin, whom I lately met with his young family at Mugby Junction, and as I was writing I could not help thinking of you and your friends whom I had just encountered upon the Colorado Central. You can hardly have observed an old gentleman with a shiny black hat and rusty clothes, very white in the seams and threadbare about the knees, but I hope perfectly clean, sitting in the corner seat by the door. Probably you have no glances to bestow upon such objects. But if you had had, you would have seen me. Look at the seams and knees of the next old gentleman you meet, and if they are white and thin and very smooth and shiny, it will undoubtedly be your present correspondent.

Now, Melinda, why is it that you and the other girls who travel so much, in the cars are so very selfish? It is a strong word, I know, but I have carefully considered it, and I mean selfish. Try it for yourself. When you next get into the cars what will you see? You will see two ladies enter. They will seat themselves and turn down the seat in front. Upon this they will pile bags, shawls, bundles, parasols, baskets, lap-dogs, whatever they may have, as if they had paid for four seats, and their shawls traveled by first-class tickets. And now, Melinda, mark. The car is full and a party enter to look for seats. They come slowly down the passage. They look, of course, at the shawls and lap-dog. They do not wish to insist upon a right which should be at once acknowledged as a courtesy, and they pass on. Perhaps they find a seat somewhere; perhaps they do not. But, Melinda, there is one thing of which there is no perhaps, no doubt whatever; and that is, that the sitters upon the seat have been tried by a sharp test of gentility, of true gentleness of manners, and have been found wanting. No lady gives her shawl a seat at the expense of the comfort of a passenger.

The true way and the only fair way is this: having paid for one seat and no more, let every person occupy that. Then, after the train has started, if there are seats to spare, put your lap-dog, or your basket, or bag upon it; but would you put your feet upon it?

“But why be so dreadfully precise?” I hear you ask, my Melinda; “why not use your common-sense, and make yourself comfortable until somebody comes who really wants the seat?”

Simply because when you have piled your “traps” upon it, and comfortably buried your feet under them, and are entirely adjusted to the occupation of two seats, your eyes and mind are darkened, and you do not wish to see, and therefore you do not see who does really want the seat. Ah! Melinda, what hypocritical sleep there is in cars! What deceitful reading of the newspaper! What horrible affectation of interest in your neighbor! What thousand subtleties to escape seeing the lingering passenger who has paid for a seat, and who sees it occupied by your lunch-basket or William’s rug!

The other day I was in the train which stopped at Springfield—whether in Illinois or in Massachusetts I will not say, for it might be equally true of either—I was occupying my one seat—and scarcely that; for, oh, Melinda! my companion must have been the mother of the fat child now to be seen at Barnum’s; and although the seat was divided by a low arm in the middle, my neighbor overflowed, as it were, into my part, and I sat overwhelmed and suppressed, and could catch only partial and painful glimpses of what occurred in the car. In the midst of my Purgatory my towering female companion looked down upon me, giving me the feeling of being Hop o’ my Thumb surveyed by a serene ogress from the top of her castle, and she said vaguely as if addressing not me in the suffering flesh, but the abstract genius of good-manners:

“I hope I don’t incommode you!”

I had just life enough left to gasp, "Oh no, Melinda," and tried to look as if I were smiling. But my neighbor, the ogress, had already severely dismissed me from her thoughts.

Now you will say that this shows how necessary it is to have more than one seat. Undoubtedly it often is. It is frequently a mere question of avoidupois. But then you must treat it so: you must pay for another seat; you must not make other people pay. If I were Mr. Lambert—and weighed three or four hundred pounds, instead of ninety-eight, as I do at present—I would travel accordingly. I would have a whole seat and pay for it. I would have a double bed and pay for that. I would order dinner for two and pay for that. I would not raise the question of my being a single passenger, and entitled to travel with a single ticket in a single seat. That might be the literal fact; but so much the worse for the fact. If I were Mr. Lambert I would not insist upon such literal translation in the cars. I would be freely translated, if I could; if not, I would buy one ticket for Daniel and another for Lambert, and travel as a double gentleman even if I were the most single of bachelors.

—I was saying, however, when you interrupted me, dear Melinda, that I was in the train the other day at Springfield, and saw a gentleman with his family enter. It seems to me that the feelings of a modest man under such circumstances—entering a full car, followed by Mrs. Modest Man and the descending series of little modest men, even to those in arms, and attended by the cohort of nurses and the baggage-train of a family upon the largest scale—must be indescribable. In front of me sat two ladies in the prettiest toilettes, who had, of course, turned over the seat before them and thrown a shawl and a bag or two upon it, and who had put their pretty little feet up, each reading a novel and eating a caramel. I know that they were aware of the family party moving up the passage, for the modest man entered by the door in front of them and came toward them. But the pretty women read steadily on, and their novels were amazingly absorbing at the very moment the party approached nearest. There was evidently no thought upon their part whether the car was full or not, and whether the party might not be obliged to cross from one car to another after the train was in motion, at the risk of dropping the baby, if they did not find seats in that one. The only evident thing was, that they were not going to surrender the seat in front of them unless they were compelled to do so. How glad I was to see the face of the modest man flush, and to hear him say, in the most decided tone of cold courtesy, "Is that seat engaged, Madam?"

The young woman whom he addressed put her feet down very suddenly, you may be sure; and although she looked very surly and felt very much ashamed, she began to remove her shawls and said nothing. She had not even the politeness to say, "No, it is not engaged." Indeed, after a moment she put on an air of petty indignation, as if it were very disagreeable to be disturbed by vulgar people whom one meets in cars!

It was a very simple thing, but nothing could show more selfishness or ill-breeding. Yet you may be sure those young women think that they are "ladies," and they undoubtedly permit themselves to speak of the "queer," and "common," and "vulgar folks" whom they encounter in travel. Now, Melinda, if you should ever happen to meet those two young ladies who turned over the seat, and piled their shawls upon it, and thought it such a hardship to be compelled to remove them, as if they had any right to the seat, wouldn't you please show them privately this letter, and tell them that it is meant for them?

There is another point, dear Melinda, to which I wish to call your attention and that of your young friends. It is that very bad habit of loud talking in the cars. That is a vulgarity of which any body might justly complain; and if you knew how ridiculous you appear to the quiet passengers, who are compelled to hear what you say, what fun they make of you afterward among their friends, and how lightly they esteem a young woman who does not respect herself enough to show a modest bearing in public, you would curb that rattling tongue of yours, my Melinda, and deprive those quiet passengers of fun at your expense.

I wonder if the young woman I once saw at Stamford Station was a friend of yours. The train came in from New York, and stopped, as usual, at that pretty town, where, as the sign informed us, "all trains stop to wood and water." The passengers who were to leave had alighted, and the fresh ones had taken their places. The car in which I sat was very quiet. Some were reading, some looking out of the window, and some talking in a low tone, when suddenly there was a tramp and bounce upon the platform by the door. The door was burst open as if a hurricane had shaken it, and a bevy of bright-eyed, loud-voiced girls came fluttering into the car. They chattered and rattled as if no one else were present; told us all that Susy Simpson was sweet on Abe Johnson, and a great many interesting facts about the bonnets, and collars, and dresses of other girls—interesting,

I mean, to them, but excessively amusing to us. There were two or three young men in attendance, who had evidently come to say goodbye, and some remained upon the platform outside. After standing in the passage for some time, and incessantly rattling away, and even humming as they stared about the car, the girls seated themselves. One of them flung herself into a seat by an open window, at which was the face of a young gentleman standing upon the platform.

"Dear me!" said the young woman, impatiently, but good-humoredly, "I can't see the sound here."

"No," replied the youth, in a sentimental tone, and half laughing; "but you can see me!"

"Law!" responded the young woman, in a shrill voice that fairly rang through the car, and bursting into a sort of shout of laughter, "law! yer must ha' ben a eatin' pickuls!"

My Melinda! what traveler in the car did not wince for that young woman? She was gayly dressed; she was young and blithe. If she could only have spoken in a lower key and have whispered pickuls instead of shouting them! The face of the young gentleman was hidden from me by the young woman. Perhaps he was pleased. And very possibly you think them a coarse and vulgar pair of whom no more need be said. But although you would not speak the English language in that manner nor give precisely that turn to your wit, yet you do talk very loud when you are in the car, and I entreat you to reflect that you may some day say something which you will not wish to have heard, while I am very sure that you will always say something which it will be painful to hear, simply because nonsense is disagreeable. For my part I like to be silent in a car and to have other people silent. I do not like to hear the two men upon the seat before me and the other two behind, eternally discussing the price of pork, whether their particular pork be stocks, or cotton, or dry goods, or whatever; nor am I interested to know that one has lost his appetite, and that the other never eats mashed potatoes in a restaurant. If men and women must talk, for Heaven's sake, Melinda! let them say something.

Don't be satirical, my dear, and ask me what people who write ought to do. You should have respect for your elders, and especially for those who are humbly trying to benefit you, and to smooth the passage of other people through the world, like Your sincere friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE new costumes which are being made up for the approaching season display a strange variety—a mixture of the antique and modern, the styles of the "Empire" combined with the Swiss peasant dress of to-day, the Scotch burr, the Greek sleeve, and the Sultana jacket. A tour of observation through the principal establishments has shown us a host of beautiful things, which we hasten to describe.

MORE NEW COLORS.

The catalogue of colors increases. Among the new marine greens, besides "Frog" and "Mermaid," already described, there is "Sea-Foam" and "Undine." A dark shade of brown is "Noisette," or nut-brown; another is "Egyptian," a dead brown, mummy-like and sombre; "Etna" and "Vesuvius" are redder shades, said to resemble burning lava as it pours from the crater, and a bright tint, like flame, is called "Fen." A beautiful glimmering gray, one of the chameleons, is distinguished as "Moon on the Desert." A strange idea to call the planets from the heavens, the lava from Vesuvius, and the fishes from the depths of the sea to describe the colors of a lady's dress!

MATERIALS.

A description of the magnificent Exposition robes, corded silks embroidered by hand, would be a repetition of an "oft-told tale." Only a few people are fortunate enough to possess them, as there are no duplicates, and they are sold at three hundred and fifty dollars each.

Silks brocaded in small patterns can be bought at from four to six dollars per yard. As the figures increase in size, so in proportion do the figures asked for them.

For evening dresses there are moirés in all the delicate gaslight greens; white poult de soie, French gray, and pearl-color, brocaded with clusters of rose-buds; embroidered satins, blue with a design in silver, green with gold, and amber with white. The satins are sold at fifteen dollars per yard. There are thin gauzy fabrics, striped cerise and white, or polka dots and span-gles, to be worn as tunics over trains of solid colors.

In plainer goods there is a handsome silk velour at two dollars a yard, an extra heavy reps, which is very much like Irish poplin. Norwegian poplin is a serviceable article, which is taking the place of alpaca, as it is more durable, and will bear any amount of crushing without seeming rumpled. A novelty among poplins is the Japanese—a dark ground, often tea color, strewn with Japanese figures in bright shades. By way of variety these will make pretty breakfast dresses. Elegant embroidered poplin robes are sold at seventy-five dollars. Crêpe poplin is soft and fine, with none of the harsh feel and stiffness so often found in poplins. It is in Scotch plaids, a yard and a half wide, and is sold at three dollars and a half. Broché poplin in small blocks of gold and black, or blue and brown, is a desirable article, sold at two dollars, single fold.

Impress cloths are brought out in stripes—a black or garnet ground with stripes of gilt leaves. Palm leaves and Oriental figures look well on a Bismarck ground. The price is a dollar and a half. Foulards in contrasting colors, with patterns in imitation of brocade, are pretty for house dresses. Velveteen is much used for short suits, but it is not durable, and soon looks shabby. Winsey, Jasper silk, serge, and poplin, are more desirable.

STREET DRESSES.

Handsome short dresses are made of silks in two colors. A scant gored dress with high bodice, tight sleeves and skirt just escaping the ground, has over it a shorter dress of another color made with a fourreau, low bodice, and long hanging sleeves. A mauve dress may have a black fourreau, or a black dress a mauve over-dress. We have seen a blue silk with Bismarck fourreau, and another of apple-green with both a black and a gray fourreau. An economical variety may be given to a lady's wardrobe by having different fourreaux for the same dress. The fourreaux are short and scant, requiring but little material; and if the colors are judiciously blended the variety is pleasant. A wide sash is worn with these dresses made of the silk of the over-dress trimmed with ruches of the under-skirt.

Another style of walking dress has a plain skirt simply fastened at the waist, over which is worn a gored dress; waist, sleeves, and skirt in one, reaching below the knee, and buttoned down before. When tight-fitting these pelisses are worn with a small round cape falling to the waist; when left loose they are called "Gabrielles," and are worn with a sash. Marie Antoinette fichus large enough to serve as mantles are added to walking dresses—an agreeable variety now that short sacques are so common. These are usually of the same material as the dress, but are occasionally made of black silk to be worn with any dress. The lappets with which they are tied at the back are long and rounded. Bias ruffles two inches wide are worn on the lower skirt of short dresses. They should be neatly bound, and are usually in uneven numbers—three, five, or seven.

A pretty model for a short suit is an under-dress of Mazarin blue silk, with high corsage, coat sleeves, and narrow gored skirt trimmed with five narrow bias ruffles. The upper skirt, or fourreau, of steel-gray silk, is cut in twelve large vandykes at the bottom. The bodice is low and square, the sleeves long and flowing. A gray silk jacket without sleeves accompanies this dress. It has a small pointed hood lined with blue. A wide sash with blue ruffles is tied at the back.

Another style is of poplin—purple, mottled with white and black. This has but one skirt, trimmed with folds of satin arranged in vandykes. A short gored paletot has square tabs under the arms, on which are pockets large enough to be useful. Wide sleeves and a reversed collar complete the costume.

Still another, of blue serge, has a skirt just long enough to escape the floor, gored without plaits, and trimmed with alternate rows of wide and narrow black braid simulating an upper skirt. The short loose sacque has a most unique addenda resembling a cape in front, but hanging over the shoulders and down behind in streamers a yard and a half long, tied negligently and looking graceful and unstudied.

INDOOR TOILETS.

House dresses, if made with trains, must be very short in front and at the sides, as nothing more completely destroys the effect of a train than holding the skirt up in front, nor can anything be more awkward than for a lady to continually trip herself by stepping on her dress. If long dresses are worn in the street they can be stylishly fastened up in the blanchisseuse fashion, so as to have precisely the effect of a short dress. The redingote style is introduced in dresses intended entirely for the house. These have surplice waists lapped on the breast and worn with a belt. The skirt also crosses over and has two rows of large buttons down the front. Chemisettes worn with these waists and with the "Pompadours" are now left open instead of closed, and are made of cluny and guipure lace.

MORNING DRESSES.

Marseilles and muslin for morning wear have disappeared, but we find white dresses in thicker materials, such as alpaca, foulard, and mohair. Satin folds edged with white fringe, cluny lace over colored ribbon, or black guipure and jet, trim them handsomely. Elegant white robes-de-chambre are embroidered in Turkish designs in brilliant colors. Palm leaves of velvet, and Japanese figures are also used by way of ornament. Roman scarfs of gay colors are worn with these. Cashmere robes are brought out in new patterns, the border extending up each width describing the gores.

A low bodice, or corselet of black gros grain, with epaulets and long lappets at the back, trimmed with cross-cut folds studded with jet, is prettily worn over woolen dresses in plain silk.

TRIMMING.

High bodices are very much trimmed on the neck and shoulders. Velvet ribbon or folds of silk or satin form a kind of collar or necklace, in points graduating longer toward the back. Jet or silk pendants are attached to each point. Lower down on the bodice a peasant-waist is simulated by the trimming. Crocheted fringe is arranged about the shoulders as a berth. Wide belts à l'Africaine have deep fringe or silk van-dykes and silk pendants to correspond with the collar or berth.

Folds for trimming are now sewn on in the centre instead of at the top of the band. Beaded braid and narrow pipings of the dress material are used to conceal the sewing. Points and scallops are bound or corded with white satin.

Steel-bead fringe trims black dresses very prettily.

JACKETS.

Sleeveless jackets of scarlet cloth, cut rounding in front in the Zouave style, and pointed at the back, are worn over white waists. The trimming is of narrow strips of white fur or embroidery in jardiniere patterns. Bullion ornaments that look like small coins are strung together, overlapping each other, and are placed on either side of the front.

The jaunty sailor's jacket is piquant and becoming. It is made of white serge, trimmed with blue folds. A wide square collar either lies on the shoulders, or when raised fastens closely around the neck. The jacket may be made of blue serge trimmed with white.

CAPS.

Caps, or rather coiffures, a most graceful accessory to morning toilets, are now made so coquettishly that the youngest married lady need not be frightened at the idea of wearing a cap. These fancy lappets display instead of concealing fine hair, as they occupy no more space on the head than the bands of ribbon so long worn. A Marie Stuart point forms the front, while the ends fall over the chignon.

MODELS.

A very elegant home dress of gray poplin has a bodice like a tight-fitting basque, crossed in front above the belt, leaving the neck an open surplice. The skirt of the basque is short behind and pointed in front; plain tight sleeves, with open sleeves à la juive. The long plain skirt is open in the redingote fashion, lapped and fastened with two rows of large buttons. A velvet applique in a guipure pattern constitutes the trimming. Another, a dinner dress of gros grain, a church purple (bluer than the royal tint), is gored in the Princesse style. The skirt is trimmed with a wide band of velvet of the same shade, cut in points and edged with a double row of narrow black guipure lace. The corsage is square at the neck, and bordered by a band of velvet framed in lace. Greek sleeves, very wide, and trimmed en suite. A Peplum of velvet with lace border and sash, chemisette, and under-sleeves of black guipure.

A carriage dress of Bismarck silk has a close-fitting body, straight sleeves, and long gored skirt. A vine of oak-leaves is embroidered in shaded brown silk round the skirt at some distance from the bottom, to simulate a double skirt. The corsage, made very high, is embroidered about the throat with a corresponding but of course smaller pattern than that on the skirt, and lower down the vine clammers over the shoulders. The wristbands are also embroidered.

An evening dress of pale green satin, of the shade known as "Pistache," has a low square body, with wide flowing sleeves. Folds of white satin edged with blonde lace are placed en tablier on the skirt and body. The sleeves are lined with white and trimmed with folds. Very long train, chemisette, and sash of real blonde. Pearl jewelry.

BONNETS.

Black and gold is a favorite combination for fall bonnets. Fur will be much used later in the season. Grèbe bonnets are already worn. These are in the Fanchon shape, and are tied with gay velvet strings. The much-talked-of toquet is only a more elegant name for the "pork pie" hat. Colored veils to match the bonnet are worn over the chignon instead of the face. Crinoline straw, both black and white, is a favorite material for traveling and plain bonnets. Fanchons of black tulle with gold ornaments are popular for autumn wear.

A Marie Antoinette of black velvet has puffs of satin around the square front. The diadem has heavy gold balls pendent. Strings of bias velvet-a quarter of a yard wide lined with satin and fringed with gold.

A toquet of white felt is encircled by a white velvet scarf fringed at the ends with pearl beads, and fastened at the side by a pearl aigrette.

A Catalane of blue velvet has a wreath of white velvet leaves, veined with gilt. Blonde lace an inch wide falls from the rim.

A Hungarian toquet of black velvet is bordered with chinehilla.

A Mousquetaire of French gray velvet and cerise satin is turned up at the ears. A massive gold diadem adorns the front. Lace strings cover the chignon, and are fastened loosely with a gilt spray.

An evening hat, a Trianon, is of white satin with a wreath of leaves and small white buds overshadowing the face, with a single full-blown rose in the centre. A long white tulle veil falling behind is crossed on the breast and fastened with a cluster of leaves and buds.

WRAPPINGS.

The variety in cloaks, shawls, and wraps generally is most bewildering. Next week we will devote more space to the discussion of this important article of a lady's wardrobe. A Mignon of light tan-colored cloth is half fitting, the skirt cut in deep squares and trimmed with braid and fringe. The "Gerolstein," a most graceful garment, is longer and looser than the Mignon. The "Dagmar" and "Africaine" of velvet are heavily trimmed with lace, with open sleeves. The Traveler is much shorter behind than before. The Japanese is just what the name would suggest. The Impatrice and Marie Antoinette are elegant novelties, of which we shall talk hereafter.

SKIRT READY FOR LOOPING UP.

BREAKFAST CAP.

SKIRT LOOPED UP.

Dress looped up à la blanchisseuse.

THE accompanying arrangement for looping up trailed dresses is both simple and convenient, and is far superior to any means for the purpose yet adopted. By this means the long robe is at once converted into a graceful walking-dress, and the whole contour of the bottom is preserved. It is only necessary to lay the front in a pleat and fasten the side breadths behind by a button and loop, or hook and loop, as seen in the first illustration; after which the back breadth is drawn up through the opening, and suffered to fall over in a puff, as seen in the second figure.

Breakfast Cap, with Braid Trimming.

BREAKFAST CAP of muslin, trimmed in front and around the edge with lace an inch wide and narrow black velvet ribbon, not more than a quarter of an inch in width. The braid is formed of three strands, one of black velvet ribbon, three-quarters of an inch wide, and two of bias folds of muslin, two and a half inches wide. A rosette of narrow velvet ribbon on the top, as seen in the engraving, completes the trimming.

Promenade Dresses.

Fig. 1.—Gored dress, with double skirt of pearl gray poplin, trimmed with black guipure insertion and jet nails, laid on the waist in imitation of a bodice. The upper skirt is looped up on the right side with a rosette of lace; and the belt is fastened with a similar rosette. The belt and sash are of the same material as the dress, and are edged with narrow lace.

Fig. 2.—Promenade costume of black silk. The paletot, under-skirt, and over-skirt, are scalloped on the bottom, and edged with a bias fold of black silk. The paletot and over-skirt are trimmed besides with jet buttons and rosettes of silk. Bonnet of lilac silk, trimmed with soutache and cord, of a darker shade than the dress, in the manner seen in the illustration. Bonnet of light brown silk, with braided trimming of a darker shade.

Fall Costumes.

For illustration see page 25.

Fig. 1.—Mignon, of drap-velours, cut round the bottom in deep notches, which are encircled with two bias folds of satin of the same shade, and finished on the bottom with jet pendants. Trimming of drap-velours, bound with satin, on the top and bottom of the sleeves and down the middle of the back. Bonnet of beaded crape, trimmed round the edge with velvet loops, fastened with a bead, and with bands of black lace insertion falling behind over the chignon. Dress of satin-striped pou-de-soie, trimmed on the bottom with a band of velvet of the same color as the stripes, cut at the top in sharp points, which are bound with silk of a lighter shade than the velvet. High-necked waist, with a corselet-ceinture, of velvet like the trimming on the bottom of the skirt, and cut in points at the top in like manner. Coat-sleeves, trimmed with velvet.

Fig. 2.—Hernani, of white cloth, cut the same at the bottom in the front and the back, and edged and trimmed with scarlet silk galloon. The slope under the arm, eight inches in length, is covered by two long lappets, edged with galloon, and finished at the ends with pendants. Japanese sleeves, with very long points. Hat of black English straw, with pheasant's plumes. Dress of pou-de-soie.

Fig. 3.—Rachel, of velvet, with braided trimming of satin. The braids down the middle are finished at the end with jet ornaments. Velvet bonnet, cut in points behind, and trimmed with passementerie, with marguerite and foliage on the side. Under-strings, covered with a bar of Chantilly lace. Under-skirt of black faye. Over-skirt of violet faye, scalloped round the bottom, and bound with mauve silk. This skirt, cut as usual in the Empire style, that is, very scant, and with bias seams, is cut open on the hips, and caught together at the bottom by crossing the ends.

Fig. 4.—Magician, of velvet, cut in short points at the bottom, which are bound with satin, with a bead passementerie heading. Sleeves very long, half open, and scalloped on the bottom like the body. Bonnet of black lace, with long lace barbs. Under-skirt of black faye, with a deep flounce round the bottom. Over-skirt of Bismarck faye, looped up with black lappels, bound with Bismarck.

Fig. 5.—Gerolstein, of blue-black cloth, trimmed with bias folds of black satin and passementerie jet fringe. Close sleeves. Fan-choon of violet crape, with a ruche of Chantilly lace round the edge. Dress of black gros grain, trimmed round the bottom with three bias folds of velvet.

Fig. 6.—Africaine, of velvet. This is composed of a paletot, over which falls a shawl, accompanied with a small square piece at the top. Sleeves with long points, reaching half-way down the skirt. Bonnet of pink crape, with barbs of the same. Under-skirt of dark green pou-de-soie, with light green over-skirt.

Cradle with Canopy and Cover.

Mahogany cradle with canopy and cover of rose-colored damask. The lambrequins on the sides are covered with muslin, embroidered in application. Ruches and rosettes of rose-colored ribbon, an inch wide, and silk tassels of the same color, arranged as in the illustration, complete the trimming of the canopy and cover.

Children's Costumes.

Fig. 1.—Boy 13 years old. Gray pantaloons; jacket of dark-blue cloth.

Fig. 2.—Girl 3 years old. Blue poplin skirt. High-necked waist of white cashmere, embroidered with blue.

Fig. 3.—Girl 8 years old. Under-skirt of red and white striped delaine. Over-skirt of white alpaca, looped up on each side with a rosette of scarlet ribbon.

Fig. 4.—Boy 7 years old. Under-skirt, frock, and jacket of white merino, scalloped with red worsted, with a large dot in each scallop.

Fig. 5.—Boy 9 years old. Knickerbockers, blouse and gaiters of brown cloth.

Fig. 6.—Boy 6 years old. Knickerbockers, vest and jacket of gray cloth, trimmed with silk braid.

Gored Petticoat.

For pattern see Supplement, No. 1, Figs. 1-5.

Petticoat of gored cretonne, laid in a single pleat at the top, and cut at the bottom in deep scallops, bound with red worsted braid. A second row of scallops, a little way above the first, complete the trimming. Cut the front and back breadths from Figs. 1 and 4, two side breadths each from Figs. 2 and 3; and the belt, double, from Fig. 5. Sew up the breadths to correspond with the figures on the pattern; face the bottom about four inches wide, scallop the edge according to the pattern, Fig. 1, and bind it with scarlet worsted braid, about an inch wide. Put on the trimming as shown in the illustration, hem the slit from 8 to X, lay a box pleat in the top, from * to 8, and put on the belt to correspond with the figures on the pattern. The belt is corded at the top, and stitched at the bottom on the petticoat. Finish with hooks and eyes, or buttons.

Waist of White Cashmere.

For pattern see Supplement, No. 11, Figs. 6-10.

This waist has been very popular of late. The right side of the front, instead of being straight as usual, is cut bias from the middle, and folds over the left side. The trimming consists of bias folds, loops and points of blue silk. Cut both fronts from Fig. 6, the right according to the pattern, and the left only to the dotted line, allowing for a hem an inch wide on the edge. Cut the side pieces from Fig. 7, the back from Fig. 8, and the sleeves from Fig. 9, taking care in the last to observe the slope under the arm. Fig. 10 gives the pattern of the small points which complete the trimming; these are cut of blue silk, double, and laid in pleats from X to •. Hem the front on the wrong side, with the exception of the bias edge, which is turned over on the right side and covered by the trimming. Make the bosom pleats, join the front and back to correspond with the figures on the pattern, cord the neck, hem the bottom narrow, and sew on the trimming, as shown in the illustration, setting the points on the upper fold, and the loops, of double silk, about half an inch wide and an inch long, on the lower one, both loops and points being sewed on with a cashmere cord. Make the sleeves, trimming the bottom as seen in the illustration, lay a pleat in the top from X to •, sew them in the arm-holes from 15 to 18, and cover the seam with a bias fold, with a cashmere piping on both sides, and trimmed with loops at the bottom. Pleat white guipure edging, an inch wide, in the neck, and finish the belt with a rosette of blue silk.

Chemisette and Standing Collar.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VII, Figs. 20-22.

This collar is made of two rows of Valenciennes edging, pleated on a binding, one half an inch wide, and the other a little broader. The chemisette is of nansook, and is laid in a pleat down the front, which is broad at the bottom and is hemmed over at the top. Figs. 20-22 give the pattern of the chemisette, with the figures according to which the binding is put on.

CHILDREN'S COSTUMES.

TO A LADY.

By C. H. WEBB.

Oh, lady! gladly would I wreath
A garland pure and sweet,
And bring Earth's fairest flowers to breathe
Their fragrance at thy feet;
Or, better still, a wreath of song
I'd twine with magic art,
That, haply, every thought ere long
Might blossom near thy heart.

Yet scarce one trembling line to frame
My faltering fingers dare—
The lips that even breathe thy name
Should be as pure as prayer.
All wet with heart-dews fresh with love,
I'll lay my offering at thy feet,
And pray the angel ones above
To wreath thee one more pure, more sweet.

A CLEAR TITLE.

MARGARET WICKHAM met the last fringes in a worsted shawl that fell over her lap in a mass of scarlet beauty.

There was nothing remarkable about Margaret's face save its content and womanliness. Query—Are they not the most remarkable things one ever sees in a woman's face?

A volume of Tennyson's poems lay on the table beside her, and there were pencil-marks on the margin of the open page. In my opinion a man can say more with penciled annotations than with his own tongue, and in nine cases out of ten can say it more delicately and effectively too.

Margaret Wickman blushed over the penciled paragraph:

"None like her, none.
Just now the dry-tongued laurel's pattering talk,
Seemed her light-foot along the garden-walk,
And shook my soul to think she comes once more;
But even then I heard her close the door.
The gates of Heaven are closed, and she is gone."

The blush told of appropriation, and the smile that followed told of pleasure in the appropriation.

A woman's walk on the pavement below caused Margaret to glance up. It was Kate Hilyard coming down the street, dressed in her everlasting black alpaca, as the girls called it. Margaret, seeing who it was, drew back, but not quick enough to elude Kate Hilyard's sharp eyes.

"How do you do, Maggie?" she called, in a tone peculiarly clear and ringing. It was a voice that could climb to high tones without break or quiver.

Margaret Wickham made herself plainly visible. "How do you do?" she responded.

"I am almost melted!" answered Kate Hilyard. "How provokingly cool you look! I should think your room might be built after the manner of a refrigerator. It's such a nice, cool place!"

What could Margaret do, being a polite young lady, but say "Come up?"

Of course Kate Hilyard went up. Blocks off she had made up her mind that Margaret should ask her.

It was, as Kate had said, a nice, cool place, full of tastily-arranged furniture and pretty ornaments. Margaret herself, in a white muslin newly starched, looked fresh as a lily.

"Look here upon this picture and on this!" exclaimed Kate as she entered, glancing from her worn alpaca to Margaret's fresh white dress. "Look on honest poverty, and then on easy opulence! See Lazarus, slightly modified by sex and health, and Dives toned down to a gentle woman clad in purple and fine linen!"

Margaret Wickham was annoyed, but she said politely, "Pray be seated, and take this fan. I will ring for ice-water. Teaching must be hard work this warm weather."

Kate really did look worn and weary, and Margaret's womanly sympathies were aroused. Kate was a clever girl, too, and sometimes she liked her very much. "Lay off your bonnet," she added, "and stay to tea."

That was another of Kate's intentions hours before, and she laid off her bonnet.

"What an exquisite shawl!" she exclaimed. "I never saw any thing so beautiful. Wouldn't it be becoming to me? Oh dear, what a misfortune it is to be poor! Tennyson, eh? Will Morrison brought it to you last night, did he not? I thought he came from this direction when he came to our house. We had a grand game of chess, but I always win. I should know this book was Will Morrison's by the pencil-marks. He always marks the tender passages."

"It is Mr. Morrison's book," said Margaret, a little coldly, averting her face. The penciled passages were of no account, if it was a habit of universal application. Besides, he had given Kate Hilyard the previous evening, and herself only the volume of poems. She began to wish her visitor had not come. It was odd that she should always be trying to make Kate comfortable, and somehow the girl always made her miserable.

After tea Kate sat looking out of the window. Suddenly she started up, saying, "Let me try on your shawl, Maggie! Isn't it superb? I declare I look quite elegant in spite of the dinginess of the old alpaca. Suppose I go down in the parlor and show off your shawl to your mother. Pa used to teach me how to wear a shawl as Eastern women wore them. He said American women carried their shawls very awkwardly."

If this be true Kate Hilyard had no claim to the name of American woman. Nothing could be more graceful than the artistic folds and exquisite sweep of the worsted shawl. She was indeed elegant in spite of the dinginess of the old alpaca. Margaret Wickham saw it as the tall, slender girl took a graceful attitude in the bay-window, where the cool breeze just stirred the curls that shaded her forehead, and the setting sun shed some of its golden glory on her beautiful brown hair.

At the moment heavy footsteps sounded in the porch, and Will Morrison stood in the door, introducing his friend Mr. Colgate.

The stranger was not a young man. His age could never be counted among the twenties again. A face somewhat worn—a tired, reflective face told that.

Will Morrison crossed over to Kate Hilyard, and Margaret talked to Mr. Colgate. Because she was a conscientious girl and polite from nature and habit she talked, and not because she had the slightest interest in Mr. Colgate. Margaret was a good conversationalist in general. Her thoughts were often new, and her language always well chosen; but that night she talked like an automaton, with her eyes always wandering to the bay-window where Will Morrison smiled at the lively chatting of the woman in the scarlet shawl.

The stranger's eyes followed hers ever and anon. "I think Miss Hilyard is an artist," he commented in a pause in the conversation. "She understands how to produce high lights and grand effects. She wears her shawl like an actress."

Margaret frowned at the mention of the shawl. It was as bad as Jove's stolen thunders. She didn't care for the shawl, but she disliked being circumvented and thrown in the shade.

"Miss Hilyard is—" She paused. To herself she said, "a traitor;" but before she finished her sentence she made a change of base—"Miss Hilyard has very fine points of character."

The stranger looked at Margaret with a searching glance and turned away with a smile. Margaret was annoyed by it. Mr. Colgate had the manner of one who studies character, and he had read something in hers that amused him. Margaret decided unequivocally that she did not like Mr. Colgate.

Will Morrison came to her just then and asked her if the magnolias were in bloom. She did not know, and he proposed that they should go and see, leaving Mr. Colgate with Kate Hilyard.

"Remember you promised to sing the 'Night-ingle's Song,'" he said to Kate as he passed out.

Margaret Wickham colored. Kate Hilyard was the beginning and end of his thoughts: and she had believed herself to hold that position. But Margaret was too much a woman to show her heart save by the tell-tale color on her cheek; and she walked with Will Morrison in the pale moonlight, with pleasant chat of all the everyday affairs that interested them both.

Under the magnolia-trees they paused. Will Morrison broke off the fragrant blossoms and turned to Margaret. "This is just the place for you," he said; "with the calm moonlight, and fragrant blossoms, and peace, and holy quiet in the air."

The shadows died out of Margaret's face, and it glowed in the moonlight with its old content and womanliness.

"Sweets to the sweet," continued Will Morrison, placing magnolia blossoms in Margaret's hair and hands. "I am always content with you, Maggie. My life would have no lack if it included you forever."

Margaret waited, but Will Morrison had finished. The shadows crept up in her face again. Such words are vain without a leading question; and Will Morrison's were without petition.

"Thank you," she said, coldly. "But I am forgetting my duty as hostess. Let us return to the house."

"I wanted Schuyler Colgate to meet Kate Hilyard," said Will Morrison. "He is very clever—a man among a thousand, and I knew Kate would interest him. She never looked better than she does to-night. I think she must have made her toilet with the express purpose of captivating my invincible friend."

"She did not know you were coming, of course," suggested Margaret.

"Oh yes!" answered Will Morrison. "I told her we would call, and she said she was coming here to spend the evening."

Up into Margaret Wickham's eyes flashed smoldering fires of indignation. She had thought her invitation voluntary and independent, but she saw now that she had returned Kate Hilyard's lead and played into her hand.

Will Morrison, arranging a sheet of music at the piano, broke into Kate Hilyard's tête-à-tête with Mr. Colgate with the query, "What wait we for but Miss Hilyard's music?"

"Excuse me, please!" pleaded Kate.

She was evidently in earnest, and deemed the invitation an interruption.

"I beg that you will sing," urged Mr. Colgate. "If you sing as well as you talk it must be a pleasure to listen."

Kate smiled consciously and went to the piano. She knew that she sang well—better than she talked. Without glancing at the song Will Morrison had chosen she selected "Love not" with an arch glance at Mr. Colgate.

That gentleman laughed and drew back into the shadow.

Margaret Wickham, noting the glances, said within herself, they are telegraphic signs indicating that lines of sympathy have been established between the outposts. She sat down in the window and looked out. She did not hear the song. She was thinking of the singer and her inability to cope with her. "I wouldn't care for the new people," thought Margaret, "if she did not dazzle, and bewilder, and cheat the old." She was so busy with her own thoughts that she did not hear Mr. Colgate until he had addressed her twice. Then she looked up startled, and found him at her side smiling in a way that signified amusement and comprehension.

Mr. Colgate's manner more than any manner in the world said, "I am master of my position and yours." Margaret Wickham was not mistress of her own, as her confused blushes testified, when she asked for a repetition of Mr. Colgate's remark.

"Have you known Miss Hilyard long?"

"For years."

"She has very fine points of character."

Mr. Colgate was quoting her own remark, but Margaret never felt so much like eating her own words as at that moment. With an effort she conquered her inclination, and responded affirmatively.

"Miss Hilyard sings finely," continued Mr. Colgate.

"Yes. Few voices retain such clearness on high notes. I never heard her superior off the stage."

Margaret spoke heartily. It was the penance her quick sense of justice demanded for the unkindness of her thoughts.

Mr. Colgate bowed.

Margaret would have said the bow signified merely acquiescence in her remark; but, looking suddenly up into Mr. Colgate's face, she saw in it a reverence to her. It was strange, but she drew back in the window comforted and calmed, while Mr. Colgate looked out over the veranda, his face more than ever reflective and absorbed. He came out of his rapt mood when the singing ceased.

"What do you think of the sentiment of the last song?" asked Miss Hilyard, crossing over to the corner where Margaret and Mr. Colgate stood.

"The last song!"

Mr. Colgate said it in a helpless way that showed he had heard but one.

Kate Hilyard pouted as she said,

"If you should forget the singer,
You should not forget the song."

"The singer made me oblivious to the song," replied Mr. Colgate, and his peace was made.

"How do you like Miss Hilyard?" asked Will Morrison on the way home.

"Immensely! What an odd chance throws those two girls together!"

"Those two!" exclaimed Will Morrison.

"They are very intimate."

"Humph!" ejaculated Mr. Colgate.

"It's a fact!" answered Will Morrison.

"Kate Hilyard is always quoting Maggie Wickham, and I have heard Margaret say a hundred times she admired Kate's abilities and voice. I never heard her praise any person so much as Kate Hilyard."

"If Miss Wickham had been a heathen, what a devotee she would have made!" mused Mr. Colgate, half aloud. "She is a woman to cut off the offending right hand and foot, and pluck out the offending right eye for conscience' sake."

"I didn't think you would like Margaret," said Will Morrison. "She is somewhat cold and reserved to strangers. It takes time to appreciate her."

"Without doubt!" answered Mr. Colgate dryly, but when the door had closed on Will Morrison he looked after him with an odd expression in his deep gray eyes. "What a confounded fool!" he muttered.

Kate Hilyard saw Margaret Wickham in a worsted store the next day. It may have been fancy, but Margaret certainly had become suddenly absorbed in the study of a pattern when Kate entered. If it was a ruse Kate had no respect for it, and broke upon her study with the question, "What do you think of Mr. Colgate?"

"I hardly know," answered Margaret meditatively.

"Isn't he odd?" exclaimed Kate. "He is quite different from the men we are in the habit of meeting, and very different from the men who are likely to come to a little town like this. Are you going up the street?"

"No, I am going home."

"Well, I'll walk along. What do you think? Mr. Colgate is going to spend the summer here."

"Who told you?"

"Will Morrison. After a year's coaxing on Will's part Mr. Colgate comes here to spend a few days, and concludes to spend the season. That's the way with people of his stamp; they do every thing or nothing. I rather like it, though. It's a little bit after my own style."

Margaret made no reply, and Kate went on: "I wonder what kind of a husband a man like Mr. Colgate would make. It's my opinion Will Morrison would make a better one. Very clever people are apt to be full of notions, and terribly set in their ways. I declare, we are at your gate! The way always seems so short when I walk with you, Maggie. I never get half talked out."

Margaret did not take the hint. "I couldn't," she said to her mother, as she laid aside her bonnet and shawl. "I had such a wretched headache, and I get so weary of her talk about husbands, and—"

She never finished her sentence. Her mother, seeing her hesitation and blushes, said within herself, "It is some man Kate talks about. I hope it isn't Will Morrison."

That Will Morrison would marry Margaret Wickham was a generally-received opinion in the town where they lived.

"It's the most natural thing in the world and the most appropriate," said the gossiping landlady to Mr. Colgate a few days after. "You see the Wickhams and the Morrisons are the oldest families any where about, and it stands to reason they should be eminently fitted for each other."

Mr. Colgate said something very like "Bah!" as he walked to the window and looked out. A moment after he said, meditatively, "I suppose if Mr. Morrison should marry Miss Hilyard it would be as bad as if royalty should outrage some divine right assumed by itself, and believed in by the people."

"Mr. Morrison marry Kate Hilyard!" exclaimed the old lady. "That will never happen. He and Margaret have been as good as engaged for years. Oh no! Kate isn't the girl for a Morrison. She will most likely marry some stranger who will be taken with her airs and graces."

Mr. Colgate laughed as he drew on his gloves, and went out.

"Gone to Hilyard's, I declare!" soliloquized the simple-hearted woman, looking after him. "How did I ever come to say so much? I declare I don't know. Mr. Colgate has such a way with him! He don't ask questions, but he finds out a great deal. Ah, that man is deep as the sea!"

The young folks of Quincy were going to Laurel Island on a sailing party. Kate Hilyard told Margaret Wickham of it on her way from school; Mr. Colgate had told her.

"I wonder who will escort us," mused Kate. I suppose one of us will go with Will Morrison, and the other with his friend. Mr. Colgate is a character. He is like diamond; he impresses every thing, and himself receives no impression; he has a look on his face sometimes that says, 'You are mine, and all things are mine; I am my own.' He could hold a woman's love as magnet holds steel. I wonder why he stops in Quincy. He is not a man to kill time merely. I have been learning 'Il Bacio' to play for him. If I meet him going home I'll make him go hear it."

Margaret Wickham looked after Kate Hilyard with an odd expression on her face. "Does she mean to entrap Mr. Colgate?" she pondered. "I should as soon think of setting snares for a sphinx."

Five minutes after Mr. Colgate passed Margaret's window and bowed. He must have met Kate Hilyard, and he had not gone to hear 'Il Bacio'.

"If it had been Will Morrison she would have made him go," mused Margaret. "But this man is diamond, or granite, or ice."

"Is the stormy petrel gone?" asked her mother, putting her head in the door.

"The what?" asked Margaret.

"The stormy petrel," repeated her mother.

"Kate Hilyard's presence generally betokens a tempest in your mental conditions. Ah! fair skies and smooth sailing, I see. I infer she did not talk of marriage, and—"

Margaret blushed guiltily. Was it her silence on the subject of Will Morrison that left her undisturbed, or a dim consciousness that Kate Hilyard and Mr. Colgate were Greek and Greek, and Mr. Colgate was the stronger Greek of the two?

Margaret Wickham went on the sailing party with Will Morrison. Kate Hilyard had no especial escort, and was in very ill-humor. In the afternoon her stormy mood cleared away, and she came out in one of her brilliant states of being. Margaret always felt annihilated when Kate assumed one of these conditions. They were like two electrical bodies, positively and negatively charged. Will Morrison went over to the enemy, and Margaret chatted with the girls. If she was a weak woman to suffer keenly, she was a strong woman to hide it as she did.

Kate Hilyard had beguiled Will Morrison into a long stroll after laurels, and had set him to helping her twine them into wreaths on their return. Suddenly she broke into the song "Comin' through the rye," and every body listened. For the time, she was actress, cantatrice, enchantress, every thing an artful, fascinating woman can be. When she sang,

"Among the train there is a swain,
I dearly love myself,"

every eye followed hers to Will Morrison, and when she sang with melancholy deprecation,

"If a body kiss a body, Need a body cry?"

all followed her magnetism and looked at Margaret Wickham.

But Margaret did not cry or frown; only her lips were white, and crimson spots flamed on either cheek.

Every body said, "Kate Hilyard is playing the highest in hand;" and some sporting gentlemen whispered among themselves, "I'll bet on Kate Hilyard. She's a stunner."

Suddenly there was a change in the atmosphere. Kate Hilyard indicated it, as if she had been a barometer. In the last chorus a great change came over her face, and she fixed her gaze on the calm, reflective man who had just arrived and stood behind Margaret Wickham as she sang,

"Among the train there is a swain
I dearly love myself;
And what's his name, and where's his home,
I dianna choose to tell!

Mr. Colgate!"

Every body laughed; and Dr. Lane whispered to his neighbor, "The girl is like a leech. She has let Will Morrison go, and is fastening on the new-comer."

"Mr. Colgate!" exclaimed Kate, blushing in pretty deprecation of her speech. "I want some more laurels."

"I know a bank whereon the wild thyme grows," etc.

I've wearied these gentlemen in my service. May I ask you, as a gallant helper of distressed females, to bear me company while I go for more laurels?"

Mr. Colgate measured the girl from head to foot. "Enough laurels for to-day!" he said, in an under-tone. "And I want to show Miss Wickham a pretty sketching-place in my boat."

Kate Hilyard colored and turned to Will Morrison. With a glance she drew him to her side, and they disappeared behind the trees.

Margaret Wickham—white-lipped and crimson-cheeked—had arisen when Mr. Colgate spoke and taken the arm he offered her. A moment before she had felt herself helpless, realizing to the fullest extent her inability to cope with Kate Hilyard; but now she smiled gratefully, for a stronger than her enemy had come, and the enemy had retired wounded from the field.

The party had all left the island when Mr. Colgate and Margaret Wickham returned. Floating idly about was another boat that steered for them when they came in sight. Will Morrison was rowing, and Kate Hilyard managed the rudder.

"Mr. Morrison will claim you. Shall I give you up?" asked Mr. Colgate.

"No," said Margaret, quickly.

"It's all nonsense, and quite impracticable," said Mr. Colgate to Will Morrison's proposition to exchange passengers. "The ladies would probably upset the boat, and there would be a pretty kettle of fish literally and truly."

"I am not afraid, and Mr. Morrison brought Miss Wickham," said Kate Hilyard earnestly. "I made this laurel wreath to crown you, Mr. Colgate."

Mr. Colgate took the wreath. "Thank you," he said; "but it is not safe to change. I will take care of Miss Wickham."

Under her laurel wreath Kate Hilyard's brow was piled with frowning wrinkles, and Margaret Wickham smiling her thanks was victor, though uncrowned.

The next morning Will Morrison called on Margaret Wickham. He was sorry for any apparent neglect on the previous day. He was willing to say so, and be forgiven.

Margaret was calm and very polite. Had she been angry Will Morrison would have had more hope, and spoken less earnestly. "Of course, Maggie, I want no woman for my wife but you."

"It can never be," said Margaret, quietly.

"And you don't mean to say this is the end?" exclaimed Will Morrison, incredulously.

"No," said Margaret, "I think the beginning of the end came some time ago; I hardly know when." She went back to the night under the magnolia-trees. "About the time Mr. Colgate came," she said to herself.

Quincy stagnated for a week. The sailing party seemed to have exhausted the energies of the place. Margaret Wickham kept the house, and saw no one. Kate Hilyard taught school, and avoided every body. Will Morrison hunted, and smoked, and swore. Mr. Colgate surveyed and reflected.

When Saturday came Kate Hilyard went off in a boat. Floating lazily on the waters she looked down, on her worn alpaca, and pronounced herself miserable. Her hand dabbling in the water came in contact with something cold. She started, for she was nervous, and drew it from the water. It was a laurel wreath, the one she had given Mr. Colgate. Her face grew dark. "Bah!" she said, "men are stupid, and life is vexation."

On the shore she saw Will Morrison launching his boat. "Bah!" she said again, and her eyes fell on her old alpaca.

When she looked up again she was smiling. "There is comfort in silk dresses," she said. "Mr. Morrison," she exclaimed, as that gentleman's boat glided near, "I am delighted to see you. It's a waste of labor for us each to row a boat. Get into mine, and let's have co-operative labor."

"For a lifetime," said Will Morrison.

Margaret Wickham saw Will Morrison and Kate Hilyard pass that day. Kate had his arm. Five minutes after she put on her hat and went out walking. In the street she met Mr. Colgate.

"I was going to your house to bid you good-by," he said. "Now I will walk with you, if you please. This road is dusty; shall we not take the lake road?"

"I want to see a plant in the park," said Margaret, keeping on her way.

"The other road is much pleasanter," urged Mr. Colgate, loitering.

"But I like this," persisted Margaret.

"Really, Miss Wickham, you had better not," remonstrated Mr. Colgate.

He said no more, when Margaret laughed, and kept on.

In the garden a lady and gentleman loitered among the flowers. The lady had the gentleman's arm.

"Come this way," said Mr. Colgate, indicating a side path.

"There is a plant yonder I wish to see," said Margaret.

Mr. Colgate frowned. "Miss Wickham—" he began.

Margaret moved on. Mr. Colgate followed.

The lady and gentleman turned, and they were face to face with Kate Hilyard and Will Morrison.

Both colored, but Margaret's face was calm and smiling. Women recover from confusion sooner than men, and Kate paused. "What are you looking at, Maggie?" she asked, with an affectation of carelessness.

Margaret explained. "It's a pretty thing for hanging baskets," she said; "you must have it when you go to housekeeping."

"Will you come to see us?" asked Will Morrison, in a low tone.

"Certainly," answered Margaret, "I shall come very often."

When they had passed on Margaret looked up to see Mr. Colgate regarding her curiously. She laughed, and pointed to the edge of a little lake. There was a mother-hen full of dismay to see her brood of ducks sailing in the water.

Mr. Colgate joined in her laughter. "It takes hens a long time to appreciate the nature of ducks—almost as long as it takes men and women to understand each other," he said.

After Mr. Colgate left Margaret that night

she sat rapt in deep meditation a long time. At length she arose with a sigh. "Kate is right," she said. "He is like diamond. He impresses every thing, and receives no impression."

Margaret Wickham went back to her old ways and calm content after that night. She wondered at herself. Kate Hilyard and Will Morrison did not grieve her. One day, as she looked at the toys that had made up so much of her childish life, and which lay unthought of on an upper shelf, she said within herself, "My old regard is little more. The woman has outgrown her childish love as well as toys."

One day Will Morrison's wife called to see her. "I wonder what has become of Mr. Colgate," said Kate, suddenly, in a pause in the conversation. "I never understood his stopping here last summer. I believe he fancied one of us. If it was you, why don't he come after you? I think it must have been me."

Margaret's mother, coming in after Kate left, and seeing her daughter gazing abstractedly out of the window, asked, "Stormy Petrel?"

"No," answered Margaret, arising with a smile; "only a mosquito. Its bite is vexatious, and its song is aggravating—that is all." She seemed to brush away an imaginary insect in the air, and dismissed her mood.

"On parle du soleil, On voit les rayons."

she thought that day; for, walking through the streets of Quincy, she came face to face with Mr. Colgate.

"I have come to survey, and see how the land lies," he said, in explanation of his presence.

Will Morrison told his wife Mr. Colgate's reason for coming to Quincy.

"Humph!" ejaculated that amiable lady. "The land he is looking for is unclaimed yet. He wants to read his title clear to Maggie Wickham. Well, Maggie isn't so young as she might be. She will take up with almost any body."

"But she didn't take up with any body," replied her husband, savagely. "It isn't Maggie's first offer, as I know to my sorrow."

There was storm and tempest in Will Morrison's home that night, but in the widow Wickham's parlors were light, and love, and peace beyond words, for Mr. Colgate was reading his title clear to Margaret Wickham.

PERSONAL.

Mrs. S. S. Cox has come into possession of a handsome fortune by the death of Alvah Buckingham, one of the oldest, most esteemed, and most opulent gentlemen of Ohio.

—Mr. J. S. ELDRIDGE, the new President of the Erie Railway, was not long since a lawyer in moderate practice in Vermont; but, possessing superior business capacity, became the manager of the Ogdensburg Railroad, and recently of the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Road. It was he who managed to obtain $300,000 from the Massachusetts Legislature last year in aid of the B., H., & E. Road.

—Mr. FORREST, it is rumored, is about to wed Miss Lillie, who has been acting with him in this city. She is twenty, an orphan, reared by Mr. Forrest from infancy, and is passionately attached to him. Originally he adopted her as his daughter, but it seems that he proposes to change the "programme."

—MADAME PAREPA ROSA's history may be compressed into five chapters:

CHAPTER I.—Born in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1839.

CHAPTER II.—Her father a Wallachian Count named Euryppon Parepa; not a millionaire.

CHAPTER III.—The Count taught music—heavenly art—in London in order to procure the desiderated clothes, meats, and such, and CHAPTER IV.—Married Miss Seguin.

CHAPTER V.—Miss Parepa wedded to Charles Rose.

—We learn from a lapidary that Madame DE LA GRANGE is the possessor of more diamonds than any lady in America, their gold value being about $200,000. Pleasant employment thus to transmute her notes into coin.

—The Rev. W. H. COOKE, who has just been appointed an assistant minister of Trinity Church, is well-known in musical circles as one of the finest tenors New York has produced. Tempting offers were made to him to devote himself to Italian Opera, but he preferred another and higher field. For some time his beautiful and powerful voice delighted the congregation of Calvary Church. It is not a disagreeable thing to be an assistant minister of Trinity Church. The senior assistants receive $7000 per annum, with an extra allowance of $3000 per annum during these very high-priced-meat-and-vegetable times. The junior assistants, $4000. The salaries of all the ministers of Trinity have lately been advanced.

—Bishop NEELY, of Maine, has for a couple of months been doing occasional duty for his brother prelates of Vermont, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, while they were doing the Pan-Anglican Council. But Bishop N. did a neat thing at the meeting of the Episcopal Missionary Society held in this city a few days since. He made a modest, touching, eloquent appeal to the Board for Missionary help in his diocese, and was complimented by a vote of $1500 on the spot. Bishop Neely is one of the youngest of the Episcopal Bishops, but an immense worker, of superior administrative ability, sound judgment, and in every way adapted to the duties of his office.

—The linguistic BERRITT has returned from England and proceeded to his native heath at New Britain, Connecticut, where he proposes to parse the remainder of his erudite existence.

—MR. PRABODY's presents form a noteworthy part of the attractions at the South Danvers Institute. The portrait of the Queen is there: the gold box in which the freedom of the city of London was conferred upon him; the gold medal presented to him by the Congress of the United States; and the address, on vellum, illuminated in gold and colors, presented by the London Workingmen's Association.

—The late Dr. ANTON'S manuscript was probably the most perfect ever put into the hands of a compositor. The late N. P. Willis was peremptory in reference to his copy. On one occasion his partner, General Morris, having thought best to alter a word or two in an article was next day remanded by a sharp word, one of the few ever spoken him by Mr. W., and a request that no word or punctuation mark of his should ever again be altered. On the other side, Mr. Dickens has lately said that he could gratefully acknowledge that he never went through the pages of any book he had written without something being presented to him by a proof-reader, something overlooked, some slight inconsistency, some little lapse he had made; in short, without having set down in black and white some indication of having been followed by a trained mind, and not merely by a skillful eye.

—Bishop CLARK, of Rhode Island, told the Pan-Anglicans that, in his judgment, the exclusion of the laity from the councils of the Church was the great defect of the Church of England. The Methodists are rapidly arriving at the same conclusion.

—Queen EMMA, during a part of her residence in England, was the guest of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who says he has met few English ladies who could compare with her in knowledge of the English language and literature.

—EDWIN BOOTH has touched deeply the feminine heart of Baltimore. A critic of that city thus expatiates: "If a man wishes to be the first love of a young lady he must go elsewhere than to Baltimore; here the pure flame of each virgin heart is first offered up to Edwin Booth. When that touching duty is performed the feminine heart is ready to receive matrimonial bids."

—MR. AUGUST BELMONT, who came to this city thirty years ago, was born in Germany, graduated well from the collegiate institute; was apprenticed to the Frankfurt Rothschilds, went thence to Naples, and thence to New York; is short in stature; dresses neatly; is lame from a wound received many years ago in a duel; married a daughter of Commodore Petry; has a fine picture-gallery, and nine children. Mrs. Belmont possesses a superb collection of jewels. A pearl necklace, one of the chief beauties of the collection, is of unsurpassed brilliancy. Every pearl in it is of the first purity, having been gathered, one by one, from every part of the globe, during the last fourteen years. Noted European jewelers are constantly on the lookout for pearls worthy of this matchless necklace.

—EARL P. MASON, Esq., of Providence, presented to his daughter on the day of her nuptials, some three weeks since, $100,000, and to his new son-in-law, $25,000 to pay the expenses of a two-year tour in Europe. $25,000 worth of presents were made on the wedding-day by sympathizing friends. Mr. Mason's son, who was recently married to a Louisville lady, received a present of $100,000 from the paternal bank account. Excellent parent!

—MR. WILLIAM E. M'MASTER, of this State, climbed Mont Blanc on the 31st of August, the first time the feat has been accomplished this season. Mr. M'Master is a portrait painter—one of the "old (M') Masters."

—Bishop COLEMAN is to be made the subject of special action by the Pan-Anglican Council. Though he was born in England no one can deny that South Africa is his Natal home.

—MRS. FANNY KEMBLE arrived here a few days ago from London, and has gone to Philadelphia to see her children. Mr. Pierce Butler, from whom she was divorced, died a few months since. Her first appearance in this city was in 1832—thirty-five years ago—at the old Park Theatre. Of the actors who appeared with her a few are still alive—among them Henry and Thomas Placide, Mrs. Vernon, and Peter Richings.

—MR. JAY COOKE, the banker, has advanced and noble views of hospitality, as well as an original and delightful way of getting people together at his fine island retreat in Lake Erie. A Sandusky editor has been shown the banker's printed cards by means of which his friends travel, at his expense, to and from this Gibraltar Island to their homes in the east. Every month the cards are sent in with the bills attached, and the rich man settles up the travelling expenses. That is the American way of doing things!

—The widow of General MIRAMON is en route for Austria, of which empire she has been made a princess, as a reward for the devotion of her husband and herself to Maximilian.

—STEPHEN SALISBURY is the name of the gentleman who has honored himself by giving $50,000 to the Free Institute of Science in Worcester, Massachusetts.

—The $15,000 per annum call, tendered by the wardens and vestry of Grace Church in this city to the Rev. Dr. BROOKE, of Holy Trinity Church, Philadelphia, has been declined. They simply said, "Think of that, Master Brooke!" but it seems he likes a more rural parish, and so remains in Philadelphia.

—Lord LYTON has nearly ready for publication three volumes of miscellaneous works, consisting of critical papers on Lamb, Gray, Goldsmith, Pitt, Fox, and other literary and political celebrities.

—The notable men of England are thus paraphrased, as to chirography, by a gentleman who has studied up the subject: Lord DEXY writes a very neat, lady-like, running hand; Lord PALMERSTON wrote boldly, with large, round letters and thick up-strokes; Mr. DISRAELI writes a large and angular running hand; Lord RUSSELL writes like a lady, but with small and ill-formed letters, very much such a hand as that of the late Sir ROBERT PEEL; Lord LYTON slovenly and carelessly, and in an illegible manner; Lord HORTON an upright scrawl; Mr. GLADSTONE an Oxford hand; Mr. BRIGHT in small, neat, scholar-like characters; Lord LYNCHBURST wrote a fine, large, bold, and legible hand; while that of Lord BROUGHAM is fine, large, and bold, but wonderfully difficult to decipher—apparently an expression of the impetuosity of the writer's character.

—MRS. CARLYLE, wife of the eminent T. C., is a pleasant, lively creature, well educated, has beautiful eyes and fingers, and is fond of silks, etc.

—LADY BULWER has become copious in form, has radiant, deep blue eyes and raven hair.

—MRS. CORA MOWATT RITCHIE is, it is said, about to return to the stage. So also is Mrs. George Wood (Eliza Logan), and Mrs. Crowe (Miss Bateman).

—MISS MAGGIE MITCHELL is about to "change her local habitation and her name," and become Mrs. Edward Kent. Does she propose to say, with Cordelia:

"O thou good Kent, how shall I live and work To match thy goodness?"

—The Queen has completed her second book, and it will soon be given to the public. It describes, in her own fresh and feminine style, a series of journeys, chiefly made by the royal party in Scotland. The public will learn from this book something authentic about the Prince Consort's gillie, who has recently attained a sort of grotesque notoriety. Of the Queen's first book the Harpers have published nearly 20,000 copies, and the call is still for more.

—WOODBURY LANGDON, who died recently in Paris, was the great-nephew of the Woodbury who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time of the Revolution. His grandfather, Langdon, was the last colonial Governor of New Hampshire, and was conspicuous during that period. Washington Irving pronounced him (Woodbury Langdon), when a mere boy, "a gentleman of the old school." In Paris he had for ten years devoted himself to painting, and with such success that he was admitted, in 1865 and 1866, to the annual exhibition, when 2000 French artists and others were refused. He was a grandson of John Jacob Astor, but too liberal in his tastes and habits to please the old German gentleman. Although extremely refined, he never cared to enter Parisian society; and it was curious to see this handsome, lucky grandson of fortune living in that city of luxury, and with his wife and son joining regularly in the almost Methodist service of the American chapel. He was a true gentleman.

—During a recent speech at Bellefontaine Senator SHERMAN said that women should not vote, because they are now well represented by their husbands, brothers, and lovers. Said he, "We have the reins, but the women guide and show us the way to go, as the old song said which I used to sing when a boy." A damsel seated at the Court House window said, "Give us the song." But the Senator replied, "I don't remember it, or I would sing it."

Coat-Sleeve with Points.

For pattern see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 11-13.

SLEEVE of black silk, trimmed with three bias folds of the same, edged on both sides with satin piping, and finished with satin points, as shown in the illustration. Fig. 11 gives the sleeve, and Figs. 12 and 13 the points. The last are of double stuff, and are set under the piping of the fold.

Bell Sleeve.

For pattern see Supplement, No. IV., Fig. 14.

BELL sleeve of lilac cretonne, trimmed with violet worsted braid, in the manner shown in the illustration. Fig. 14 gives the pattern of the sleeve. The under-sleeve is of puffed lace and lace insertion.

Half-Flowing Sleeve.

See illustration, page 21.
For pattern see Supplement, No. V., Fig. 15.

SLEEVE of pearl silk, trimmed as shown in the illustration with bias fold of brown silk and passementerie drop fringe. The close sleeve is trimmed simply with a bias fold. Fig. 15 gives the flowing sleeve; the close sleeve is cut from No. III., Fig. 11.

Fichu with Belt.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 16-18.

THIS fichu is of black embroidered lace, and of black watered ribbon one inch and a half in width, studded on either edge with white beads, and is bordered with black and white lace, two inches wide. White pendants complete the trimming. Cut both fronts from Fig. 16, allowing an inch on the left side for a hem up the front, and the back from Fig. 17. Fig. 18 gives the belt, of black watered ribbon, to which are attached five lappets, Fig. 19, of narrow ribbon and lace, finished at the end with a pendant. The ribbon that forms the middle of each lappet is two inches longer than the others. The middle lappet is set on the belt to correspond with the figures on the pattern, the others being placed a little less than an inch apart. The back and fronts are next joined together, the neck hemmed narrow and finished with narrow ribbon, and the trimming put on, as shown in the illustration. The lace is pleated around the fichu, and headed with narrow watered ribbon. The figures on the pattern show where the belt is put on; this is finished with a rosette of watered ribbon, with a white button in the centre. The fichu is confined at the throat by a button and button-hole.

Guipure Collar.

See illustration, page 26.
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 20-22.

THIS collar is well adapted to the new style of dresses, cut heart-shaped in front. It consists of two rows of guipure lace, one black and one white, the latter a little more than an inch in width, and the former somewhat narrower, which are pleated on the neck of a nanook chemisette. Cut the chemisette by Figs. 20-22, taking care in cutting the front to observe the dotted line in Fig. 20 indicating the heart-shaped slit. The neck of the dress must, of course, be made to fit the chemisette.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 23 and 24.

THIS bodice is made of a combination of black watered ribbon an inch and two inches in length, and bead edging. The broad ribbon is used for the belt, to which are attached two lappets of ribbon of the same width in front, and five lappets of the narrow ribbon in the back, all edged with bead-lace and finished at the bottom with long jet pendants. The top of the bodice is finished with a trimming of jet beads and black silk soutache. Figs. 23 and 24 represent half of the bodice, which is closed in front by jet buttons.

Fanchon Bonnet.

For pattern see Supplement, No. IX., Fig. 25.

THIS bonnet is of pearl crape in the engraving. It can also be made of corded silk or velvet. The trimming consists of a diadem of pearl-gray berries and leaves laid over the front of the bonnet, and extending well down on either side. Strings of crape and narrow ribbon complete the trimming. Fig. 25 gives one-half of the bonnet shape. Cut this first of stiff muslin, allowing about one-fourth of an inch for the turning down, wire it around the edge and through the middle, as shown in the pattern, and cover it two or three times with the crape, pleating the latter lastly over it. Trim the back of the bonnet with pearl-gray ribbon, three-fourths of an inch wide and three yards long, the ends of which serve as strings, and cover this with a scarf of crape, with a wide hem, three yards long and five-eighths of a yard wide, laid in three pleats as shown in the illustration so as to make it about two inches wide. Lastly, put a flat bow of crape and leaves on the top, and fasten a band of silk and crape inside the front of the bonnet as a support, which reaches from the middle to * on each side, in Fig. 25.

Cap of Tatting.

See illustration, page 26.
For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 26 and 27.

THIS cap is formed of an oblong piece of tatting, bordered with tatting edging, with bars of the same material, and trimmed with large and small rosettes of blue velvet ribbon. Figs. 26 and 27 give the parts of the cap, which is set on double stiff muslin, to correspond with the figures on Fig. 27, and finished with a barb about five-eighths of a yard long. A narrow velvet ribbon is run through the edge of the lace, and serves to hold the barb in place.

WHITE CASHMERE WAIST.—FRONT.
For pattern see Supplement, No. II.—Figs. 6-10.

WHITE CASHMERE WAIST.—BACK.
For pattern see Supplement, No. II.—Figs. 9-10.

A NIGHT IN A FIRST-CLASS RAILWAY CARRIAGE.

A GOOD many years ago I was traveling with my husband to Italy. It was our wedding-tour. Since then many things have changed. As I look in the glass it may be that my face has not so much color as it had then, but the memory of that journey remains as fresh as if we had only set out yesterday.

I went the same route the other day, and I tried hard to kindle the embers of my lost enthusiasm, but I might as well hope to change my steady sober self into the happy laughing girl of twenty years ago.

It was, as I said before, our wedding-tour, and we had loitered so long and so pleasantly on the way, that although it was summer when we started, winter was fast closing in before we could make up our minds to quit Paris and follow out our original plan of wintering in Italy. An uncle of my husband's was living in Marseilles, and that was to be our first resting-place. It was Christmas-eve before our last purchases were finally made, and we and our belongings were whizzing down in an express train to Marseilles. I can perfectly recall my feelings on the morning of the 24th December, in the year 18—. It was bitterly cold when we left Paris, snowing and hailing heavily at intervals, and all the bright weather we had been enjoying for weeks, gone. I felt gloomy and depressed, and as if a new chapter in my life were about to begin. I was very sorry to leave Paris, and felt very nervous at meeting relations quite new to me, and being moreover not a little spoiled by the exclusive devotion of my husband, I felt slightly aggrieved and decidedly jealous at the evident pleasure with which he was looking forward to meeting his own people. He grew animated in his description of his favorite cousin Emily, and expressed a strong desire that we should be like sisters, and as for Charley, he was the handsomest and nicest fellow in the world, and so on, until the shyness of my answers, and the general sulkiness of my manner damped his ardor, and my having recourse to the usual feminine cloak for ill-humor, a headache, finally reduced him to silence. The winter's day slowly wore away. We tried to get through the weary hours by all the usual traveling artifices. We read assiduously the little green volumes of fiction popular along the French line, we ate and drank at the regulation stations, and we took the regulation little snatches of uncomfortable sleep. So the hours went by, and it was almost quite dark when we came puffing and whizzing into the grand Lyons station, about seven o'clock.

Hitherto we had been free from fellow-passengers, much to my enjoyment; but here we were joined by a lady. Somehow she impressed me unfavorably. She was much wrapped up in shawls, and her traveling hood was closely drawn over her face. Her dark eyes gleamed fitfully from under it with an unnatural brightness. Her mouth had a cold, sarcastic expression, and a soupeon of a mustache disfigured her upper lip. When she spoke, in answer to some slight civility of my husband's, her voice was hard and repulsive. My husband made several efforts to enter into conversation, but she received them so coldly that we left her to herself. Still she kept a furtive and cat-like watch upon us, which had an irritating effect upon my nerves. After a time my husband fell asleep, but do what I would I could not, although worn out with fatigue, follow his example.

I was in that excited state of mind when trifles assume an unnatural importance, and, although to some it may seem almost laughable, yet I am sure a nervous reader will understand me when I say that the unbroken stillness of the carriage, the regular breathing of my husband, the unceasing swing, swing of the lamp above my head, and above all, the presence of our fellow-passenger in the corner, became to me perfectly intolerable. At last, I resolutely shut my eyes, and after a time fell into a kind of semi-unconsciousness.

While in this state it seemed to me that our opposite neighbor performed the most extraordinary antics. I thought she lay at the bottom of the carriage and dragged herself slowly and stealthily toward us. She got gradually nearer and nearer; her face came quite close to mine; her breath was hot on my cheek; her hand was on my mouth; I gave a loud, piercing shriek, and opened my eyes. The elderly lady was in her place by the window, looking a little flurried and agitated, but that was to be accounted for by my startling her. My husband was much alarmed, and could not account for the nervous tremor which seemed to have seized upon me. I clung close to him, and whispered the cause of my fright.

As I spoke in English, I thought myself secure, but I felt her cold eyes upon me, and my husband's assurances that it was only a dream failed to calm me. She was most anxious in her inquiries about me. She had been looking at me asleep, she said, and saw that I was struggling with a nightmare or bad dream; at the first station I ought to have some strengthening tisane or coffee. After this she became quite lively and chatty, but her conversation was to me more unpleasant than her silence. She kept up an unceasing fire of questions as to where we were coming from—where we were going to. She was herself an officer's widow in Lyons, and was going to see her son at Marseilles. It provoked me exceedingly to see that my husband considered her an intelligent and rather agreeable companion. He told her all our plans, and they got on together very pleasantly.

Later on we came into a large station. "Here," said our fellow-traveler, after consulting with great attention the Railway Guide, "we are to wait twenty minutes. I would recommend that Monsieur would alight and get Madame a cup of good strong coffee, and the same for me, if Monsieur would have the kindness."

I felt the most curious dislike to be left alone, but I was ashamed to give utterance to such a childish fear, and my husband was too anxious to get me the coffee to listen to my assurances that I did not want it. I strained my head out of the window, but soon lost sight of him in the darkness. I thought I felt the premonitory jerk of the train, and I looked round anxiously. The bell rang out loudly, and I started to my feet in an agony. "Sit down," said my companion, quietly, "that is nothing." While she was speaking the train moved slowly out of the station. I made a frantic rush to the window, but I was held back and replaced in my seat by my friend, who, while she kept on soothing and reassuring me in her croaky voice, held me so tight that I could not possibly move. When we were fairly off she fell back in her seat, screaming and clapping her hands in delight, while I shrank back in horror and amazement.

I was in a perfect tumult of agitation. Here were all my fears realized; this dreadful mad woman would be alone with me for the whole night, for we made no further stop till we reached Marseilles. She had no sympathy for me, and no doubt she was laughing at me in her sleeve.

I hastily wiped away the tears that had forced themselves to my eyes, and tried to recover from agitation. "That's right," said the odious voice beside me—for she had moved her seat next to me. "Cheer up, and don't cry it out. Never you mind, a few years more, and you will be only too glad to dispense with the presence of ce cher mari on your little excursions." Amazed at her impertinent manner, I said coldly, "that she was unacquainted with English women, or she would not make such a remark."

"Am I?" she said, wagging her head, and looking at me with a diabolical sneer. "Am I? Well, then, my dear, let that be; I am perhaps better acquainted with Englishmen, and let my experience teach you innocence, my dear young lady. Your dear Henri, as you call ce cher petit mari, will soon give a bargain of your pretty airs and graces, your little nervous shrieks and tender clings. Ah, your English husbands, they are the nice lot! I could tell you stories, my little love, that would rise the hair up of your virtuous head; and as for ce cher Henri, he is no better than another. Ha, ha!"

Here she broke into an odious chuckling laugh that thrilled my blood.

"Well, there, then; shall it go to sleep like a good child, or shall I tell it a few stories of the Englishmen I have known?" Much alarmed at her manner and language, I faintly answered that I thought I should like to go to sleep.

"Very good; well, then, to sleep with you; but first baby shall drink something to settle its nerves; it is a cordial, and I think it will be better than the coffee Monsieur went in search of. Ha, ha! How green of him to swallow my little invention of the twenty minutes; but the English are so bête. My little angel, I was determined to secure a tête-à-tête with you. Here, now, drink."

Afraid to refuse this dreadful mad woman, I drank some of the cordial she offered; it had an odd taste, and seeing that she was busy replacing the bottle in her bag, I hastily threw the rest out of the window next, and handed her back the glass. She was much pleased by my obedience, and took great pains in settling me comfortably, and wrapping cloaks around me. For some time I kept watching her; I was determined not to go asleep, and I kept my wakeful eyes like sentries on her in her corner following her, while she seemed absorbed in some calculation with pencil and paper.

Thoughts crossed rapidly through my mind. What should I do when I got to Marseilles? How should I find out our uncle? for I had forgotten his address. Would that dreadful creature murder me if I fell asleep for a few minutes? What could have been her object in getting my husband out of the carriage? She was evidently mad and possessed of all the cunning of insanity. My eyelids grew sore in my effort to keep them open and on guard. I would close them for five minutes only to rest them. I feel calmer; she is still in the corner, all safe. My eyelids are getting heavier and heavier; resistance is vain, and sleep gets possession of me.

How long I slept I didn't know, but by degrees I began to dream that I was in prison, and under the sentence for death; and that when I came to the scaffold the executioner had the features of the French lady. Then it changed, and I was at Marseilles, and saw my husband; but he did not seem to know me; and then I called to him; he turned, and showed me the face of my odious fellow-passenger. At this I awoke.

The train was whizzing along. The lamp was swinging above, and the air in the carriage was very dense and confined. I was so confused, and felt my head so heavy, that I lay for some minutes, not well knowing where I was. Then I slowly raised my head. Has my hateful tormentor gone? She is not in her corner, thank goodness; but who is that figure with its back to me, bending over my husband's carpet-bag, turning over all the contents? Am I getting mad? Is it my husband? No, it is too tall. I am still sleeping. I shut my eyes and open them again. No, it is still there. It has on my husband's traveling coat and cap. I am the victim of some horrible delusion. My tongue cleaves to my mouth. I would give worlds the French woman were here, or that something would break the horrid stillness. Presently the man turned slowly round. Good Heavens! it was the face of the French woman; her gleaming eyes, her sarcastic mouth. Cautiously he is tying on a black beard, which he adjusts carefully. Then he lets down the window, and throws a bundle out.

I see it all. Our companion has been a man disguised as a woman. Overcome with horror, I gasp in very agony of mind. Immediately the wretch turns to my side of the carriage, and our eyes meet. "Diabliesse! Treacherous cat!" he cries, "So you have been awake and watching me. You spy on me, do you? Twice you have circumsented me; your pretty little shriek prevented the chloroform doing its work on your fool of a husband, and now you shall pay the penalty. This pistol will make quick work of you; and your body thrown out in this dark night will tell no tales. You will pass for some unfortunate who has committed suicide, and you will make a pretty article for the newspapers." In my agony I fell on my knees and implored mercy of this ruffian, offering him money—jewels to spare my life. He listened gloomily, then after a few minutes he said:

"There, that's enough; get up. I will spare you on one condition; and, remember, you have no one to blame but your own internal curiosity; only for that feminine propensity you need never have known but that the French woman got out and I got in during your sleep. But you must peep and spy, curse you. But you can be of some service, so listen; but first swear never to reveal what has happened this night, and, secondly, swear solemnly to follow implicitly my instructions."

Trembling in every limb, I gave the required assurance.

"Now, get up, little fool, and listen to me. But first, to show you I was not idle while you reposed, here is plenty of money for any little trip we may take, and I will look to you to find me more from your store of pretty things."

So speaking, he showed me Henry's pocket-book, filled with gold and notes from his traveling-case. Obeying his directions, I unlocked my dressing-case, and, while he disposed of its contents in various little bags about his person, he proceeded to unfold his plans. He would, he said, make little or no alteration in my husband's arrangements, with which he so kindly acquainted him. He would certainly dispense with the visit to ce cher oncle, and avail himself of the excellent Henri's purse, wife, and passport to push on to Civita Vecchia. Once landed on Italian ground, he would dispatch me back to my friends and sorrowing husband in the most convenient manner, and I could account for my little adventure in any way most pleasing to myself, and compatible with strict adherence to my oath.

"Never," I cried, "will I submit to such an indignity; I would rather die first."

"It is a pity you did not think that when I was disposed to oblige you. Now, your oath having satisfied me, you are safe from me; but suicide is still open to you, only it is an unpleasant death; it would get me rather well out of the difficulty. No, no, madame, be reasonable, and do not drive me to extremities. I will be civil and quiet, and during the time that I shall be called upon to play the part of your husband you will have nothing to complain of from any undue attention on my part. I hate your baby-face sniveling women. There, go back to your corner, and don't disturb me with your crocodile tears. I think, first, your dress wants a little alteration. Take off your jaunty coquettish hat and cloak, and put on these more respectable garments, belonging to your esteemed fellow-traveler. I kept them expressly for you."

So saying, he threw me over the horrid hood and cloak that had been worn by the French lady. When my transformation was effected, he surveyed me with much satisfaction, and remarked with an odious chuckle that I was a disgrace to a dashing fellow like him, and that not even ce cher Henri would know me now.

He then produced a bottle, from which he continued to drink unremittingly; while I, in my corner, afraid to move or stir, endured such misery as does not often fall to the lot of mortals. It seemed to me that I lived centuries in that wretched night, and I don't think the quiet happiness of years has effaced the impression.

In the gray of the morning we came into Marseilles. I think a criminal under execution must feel something like what I did as the train came into the terminus on that Christmas morning. If I could have broken my oath, it was physically impossible, as for the time I had lost the power of speech. Even my tormentor seemed to be struck with the change in me, and spoke more gently. He let me sit still while he collected all our traveling things. Oh the agony I felt at seeing Henry's things in his hands!

The instant the train stopped he seized me by the wrist, and held me tight, while he assisted me to alight with great politeness. He whispered "Remember" in my ear, and then, drawing my arm through his, hurried me into a cab, saying to the cabman "We have no luggage," gave the direction to drive off. I was just about frantically shrieking for help, reckless alike of life or my oath, when a young gentleman came running up in the opposite direction. "Tell me, coachman," said he, eagerly, "has the Paris train come in?"

"Yes, monsieur."

"Oh, then," he said, turning to my companion, "perhaps you can tell me did you happen to see a young English lady? Her husband, my cousin, left her by a mere accident at one of the stations. The train went off suddenly. He telegraphed to me to meet her, and—"

With a wild, piercing shriek interrupted him. My companion uttered a fearful oath under his breath, and then, with the most consummate politeness said—

"Monsieur, this is the lady of whom you speak. She has been under my protection since I joined her at — station; I am only too happy to leave her in safe hands. At great personal inconvenience to myself, I was about conveying her to her friends. I am a doctor, and I can not conceal from you that the lady's nerves are terribly shaken. I found her in a high state of excitement, and, in fact, for the greater part of the night she has been raving, and fancying all kinds of delusions. I should not be surprised that a severe illness was the result." Then, with a profound bow, and an "Adieu, madame; remember that at any dangerous symptom you may expect a visit from me," he left us.

For many weeks I lay unconscious, struggling with all the horrors of brain-fever. During my slow recovery I had time to prize the cousin Emily, of whom I had felt a foolish jealousy upon that eventful morning, and my appreciation of cousin Charles is equal to that my husband feels for him. With a delicacy and tact for which I felt most grateful, they never alluded to the events of that dreadful night.

MODES OF PROPOSING.

THERE seem to be other ways of getting a wife besides advertising for one.

A young lady in England it is said, the heiress of some property, had occasion from time to time to consult a lawyer, who was one of the trustees of the property, though not much older than herself, on matters of business. The lawyer, wholly engrossed with his profession, listened to her politely at these interviews, answered her briefly, and that was all.

At length she came to him one day to consult him about an offer of marriage which had been made to her. He heard her story, his attention being half occupied all the time by some papers on the desk before him that he was arranging. As soon as she had finished he paused a moment from his work, put himself into an attitude of reflection, and said, musingly:

"Well! Yes! Marriage is certainly an important subject, and every body must think of it at some time or other, I suppose, though I have never thought of it particularly in my own case."

Then turning to the young lady he asked her if she was particularly interested in the young gentleman who had proposed to her. She said she was not.

"Well then," said he, "if you have a fancy for being married, here am I. If you think you could be comfortable and happy with me, I am at your service. Think of it."

The lady said that she would think of it, and retired, while the lawyer returned to the work of arranging his papers.

A month afterward they were married. On the subject of the fate of the disappointed suitor history is silent.

The above is an English story. The next is a French one.

A young lady, wealthy, beautiful, and accomplished, went to Paris to see the Exposition and the other wonders of the place. She had no male protector. As it is understood that you can procure any thing you wish for in Paris, she determined to provide herself with one.

A week or two after this an intelligent and handsome young salesman in one of the principal "magazines" had his attention attracted by a very charming young lady who came in several days in succession to make purchases, and always came to his counter, where she usually held more conversation with him than the business strictly required. At length one day when she had made some purchases she asked him if he would do her the favor to come himself with the messenger who should bring the articles to her apartment, as she wished to see him on some private business; and she gave him her address.

When he came she received him as a friend, and told him in the course of the interview that she had come to Paris to see the Exposition, but she had no male protector, in consequence of which she was greatly restricted in her movements and subjected to much inconvenience. What she proposed to him was that he should enter into her service as her brother during the two months of her stay. She had selected him, she said, after some considerable quiet observation about the town among the gentlemen to whom she thought that such a proposal could properly be made. If he accepted her offer she said she would make him ample compensation for the loss of his situation, and for the time that would be required for him to find another.

The gentleman said he would accept. "It is to be understood, however," added the lady, "that the very first instance in which you depart in the slightest degree from your rôle, which is that of my brother, even by so much as paying me a compliment, all is over between us."

The gentleman said he agreed to the condition.

The contract was faithfully fulfilled on both sides. For two months the lady enjoyed the countenance and protection of her temporary brother, who came every morning to attend her in her visits to the Exposition, and to the various public monuments of Paris, and in the evening to the opera and the theatres. He was a young man of fine personal appearance and agreeable manners, and he faithfully confined his attentions within the limits prescribed by his employer. At the end of the time the lady expressed herself well satisfied with the manner in which he had performed his duties, and took her leave of him—putting into his hands at the same time a packet which he, on subsequently opening, found to contain notes of the Bank of France to an amount sufficient to indemnify him ten times over for the temporary loss of his usual employment.

The next day the lady left Paris by the morning train for Brest, where she was to take passage by the steamer for her native land. We can not unfortunately determine from this circumstance what her native land was, inasmuch as not only the American steamers but also those bound to other destinations sail from Brest, and take passengers thence to all parts of the civilized world.

On the morning of the day following, as the lady was entering the carriage that was to take her to the quay, she received a package by express from Paris. On opening it she found that it contained a casket of jewelry, consisting of diamonds of great value. They were from her "brother." He had invested the whole sum which she had given him in this way.

She was so touched with the delicacy which her companion had manifested in returning the value in this form instead of refusing to receive it when it was offered to him, and with the feeling on his part toward herself which his action denoted, that she gave up her voyage, returned to Paris, and sought the gentleman again to thank him for his present.

In about a month afterward they too were married.

These two stories are both in some measure characteristic of the manners and usages of the respective countries in which they are said to have occurred.

The two following are Yankee stories, and they are equally characteristic of their origin:

A young Boston merchant, who had come into the city when he was eighteen, and had devoted himself strictly and faithfully to his duties, found himself at the age of thirty-two in possession of a large and fast-increasing capital, at the head of a very prosperous and lucrative business, and in the receipt by means of it of an ample income, but with no wife. He first bought and furnished a house in a handsome part of the town, and then began to cast about for the means of finding a lady to place at the head of it.

There were plenty of frivolous and fashionable women about him, whose idea of a husband was a gentleman to work all day in his counting-room in order to furnish them with money for their dresses, and with a house containing suitable parlors for their balls and parties. But these were not his kind. He wished for a wife who had some idea of duty to be performed. He concluded that he must seek one among those who had been trained to the performance of duty.

"New Hampshire is a good State," said he to himself, musing.

So he went from his store round the corner to the counting-room of a commission-merchant, who acted as agent for the sale of goods manufactured by a large company at Dover, and asked for a letter of introduction to the superintendent of the mills, vouching for his respectability.

The merchant immediately wrote a letter as follows: "The bearer of this is Mr. A. B., a gentleman thoroughly responsible, and worthy of entire confidence in every respect."

Armed with this missive, he went to Dover, presented his letter to the superintendent, and asked permission to go through the mills, and observe the different operations. The permission was granted, and he commenced going the rounds. After a time he came into an immense hall, where several hundred girls, of all ages from eighteen to twenty-five, were engaged in weaving—or, rather, in watching and supervising the weaving done by the looms. They were all active, healthy, and intelligent. Many of them were extremely beautiful, and they were, without exception, easy and graceful in their movements. No awkwardness can live among the looms and spinning-machines of a cotton-mill.

"The finest assortment," said the gentleman to himself, "that I ever saw. If a man can not suit himself here it is of no use for him to look any farther."

So he proceeded at once to make an examination of "the goods." He first, from a seat near the foreman's desk, surveyed the room, and observed the countenances, bearing, and general demeanor of the various operatives. Then he walked about the room, and held a little conversation with one and another here and there. Finally he took his selection. He made some inquiries of the foreman in regard to the character of the one whom he had chosen. Receiving very favorable answers, he asked, incidentally as it were, what was her name and where she came from, and obtained the desired information.

He took the next train which went into that part of the country, and stopped at the village in question. At the tavern he fell into conversation with the landlady about village affairs, and from her obtained much additional information. The girl was the daughter of a farmer, respectable, though in humble circumstances, was well-educated, as all New Hampshire girls are, and bore an excellent character. He went to the farmer's house, and, after a long conversation, for which negotiations for the purchase of apples formed the pretext, but of which the real object was to give the father and mother an opportunity to become a little acquainted with him, he bade them good-by, after arranging to have the apples—three barrels of them—packed and sent to Boston.

To make a long story short, the gentleman went back that same afternoon to Dover, called at the young woman's boarding-house, and asked to see her on business; and he so far succeeded in his negotiations with her as to induce her to close her engagement at the mill, and go home to consult her father and mother on the "business" in question.

In about a month they were married. The gentleman's friends think that he has got a charming and most excellent wife, though they can not imagine how he found her in that out-of-the-way village in New Hampshire. They live very happily together in Boston, and she attends faithfully to all her duties as wife and mother, having been trained to the performance of duty from her childhood. It would be a betrayal of confidence for us to give the street and number where they live.

In all the preceding cases the matches were made in a very business-like and matter-of-fact way. There is one story remaining to be told, which is of a much more romantic and sentimental character, so that those readers who do not fancy romantic tales may perhaps as well pass over the remainder of this article.

A student who had completed his studies, and was commencing his professional life under very favorable auspices, was on his way home late in the autumn to make a little visit to the paternal roof. It was in old times, when the only mode of conveyance for travelers was the stage-coach. Among his fellow-passengers in the coach was a young lady of very agreeable person and manners, who first attracted his notice by her kind consideration for an aged woman, who was assisted into the coach at a way-side inn. In the course of the day the gentleman became pretty well acquainted with the young lady, whose name he ascertained was Mary W—. He began to feel a strong interest in her, and it would seem from the result that the interest was in some degree reciprocal. In the course of the conversations that they held together in the stage, and also in walking up certain long hills, where such of the passengers as were so disposed got out to relieve the horses, they learned mutually many particulars of each other's parentage and history, so that as the day passed on they began to feel somewhat like old friends.

During the afternoon a rain-storm came on. The roads became wet and heavy, and the progress made was slow. The sky was overcast, and darkness supervened at a very early hour, while the stage was yet several miles from the village where it was to stop. As the wheels went on plowing through the mud and ruts the passengers became uneasy, for the driver had no lights. The young lady, however, evinced so much calmness and composure as greatly to increase the interest which the student felt for her. The danger was real, as the event proved, for just as the coach reached the top of a hill the wheels on one side went off the edge of the road into a ditch, and the coach overturned.

The student called out to the passengers to lie as still as possible, so as to get out quietly, one by one, from the openings in the side of the coach which was uppermost. He was himself near the door on that side, and was the first to escape. He then assisted the others by feeling, for it was so utterly dark that nothing could be seen. The young lady came next last. The road was so wet and muddy, he said, that she could not step in it, and she must let him carry her to the bank on the other side. She consented.

So he took her in his arms and began to carry her across the muddy road, feeling his way in the utter darkness, made more intense by the trees of a forest that bordered the road. She yielded herself so readily to his grasp, and reclined her head so confidently upon his shoulder, that he was encouraged to whisper in her ear, "Mary, are you engaged to be married?" She answered, "No." "Are you willing to be my wife?" She answered, "Yes." He sealed the promise with the usual little ceremony, and then placed his prize upon a flat stone by the road-side, the white surface of which reflected the sky sufficiently to make its form just visible, after which he went back to assist the other passengers.

I believe that this couple were not married within the month, but they were duly united at the proper time. The lady afterward often told her friends that she always had the most agreeable associations with the idea of the upsetting of a stage-coach, though they could not imagine why.

We can not absolutely guarantee the truth of all these stories, but must leave our readers to exercise their own judgment and discretion in regard to their credibility.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Friday Eve.—"What is the matter?" I asked of my husband, at the dinner-table this evening, as he took a newspaper from his pocket, and began to look over its columns with an uncommonly sad expression of countenance. "Has any thing troubled you?"

"Yes," he answered, "I have seen to-day something which has grieved and distressed me deeply."

"What is it, my dear?"

"I have seen a melancholy instance of a woman leaving the domestic hearth, and the sweet cares and placid anxieties of household life, and thrusting herself forward under the public gaze, intruding her thoughts and feelings, the arrangements of her household, nay, her very name, openly before the common people."

"What did she do?" I asked, anxiously. One rarely sees Mr. Typeset appear so much troubled.

"She forsook the sphere of woman," said my husband; "which should be, so our Conservative Convention orators, and sound philosophers and journalists declare, enwrapped in privacy. She wandered from her home. She forgot that if women crowd into public employments, and send their thoughts abroad, men must, in self-defense, retaliate; must spend some of their hours at home, and make some effort to make the household circle happy."

"I wish to goodness they ever would," said I, in an under-tone. Then, louder—"But tell me, Mr. T., what are you talking about? Was it any body I know?"

"It was somebody whom I know. It was my own wife; whose name and thoughts I have seen paraded before the public eye in the columns of a weekly newspaper. I have seen her diary published, as if she were a French Secretary of State, who has been dead thirty years; or an ex-President of the United States who hasn't."

"Oh, Mr. Typeset!" I shouted, clapping my hands, "did they really print it? How did they get it?"

And I jumped up, and ran to his end of the table, and leaned over his shoulder and grasped at the paper to see what it had in it.

It was the first Number of the Bazar.

The movement was instinctive, and not so very discourteous, under the circumstances, but it was unfortunate, for it gave Mr. Typeset a chance to pursue his nonsense.

"Behold," said he, "the development of this pestiferous doctrine! A woman who suffers herself to write for the press proceeds to robbery of her husband by violence, and will doubtless be led on, from step to step, to assassination, cruelty to animals, crowding in the cars, and even inattention to contribution boxes."

"Nonsense—robbery by violence!" said I. "I only took hold of the paper."

"You put your arm on my shoulder, and that is violence. You've got your arm on my shoulder now. Any touching of a person to take away his property is violence and robbery."

"Mr. Typeset," said I, standing up very straight, "before we were married you did not object to having both my arms on your shoulders."

"True, my dear," said he, "neither do I now. I take back all I said. Here is your paper."

And he looked as if he were going to kiss me; but he was eating beef-steak and I—well I—evaded.

The Bazar was instantly cut into sheets and divided among the whole party of us. Tot got the loose sheet of patterns and began tracing the zigzag lines with the finger, like an infant Columbus studying a voyage of discovery on a new map of the world. Sonny was at once wrapped up in the outside leaf, with the pictures of young men's dress styles. Sissy devoted herself to the promenade dresses. I seized the sheet that had the Diary, of course. Mr. Typeset had the inside sheet with the patterns of underclothing; mysterious enough to him, I dare say, but every woman who has a family to care for knows the value of these things.

"But, Mr. Typeset," said I, after a few minutes' reading, "how did they get it?"

"I gave it to them," said he.

"No; for how did you get it? I have had it every day."

"I copied it."

"When?"

"While you were asleep, my dear."

Monday.—"The most recent mania," said Mr. Typeset, this morning, reading from his paper, "is that developed among the girls out West for collecting buttons. It seems that a theory has been advanced to the effect that if a young lady gets one hundred buttons given her, by the gentlemen, the fortunate man who gives her the hundredth will be her husband. One editor says that in his section nearly all the girls have each her long string of buttons, and as we go along the street, we are every now and then saluted with: 'Mister, please give me a button.' We can't help being good-looking, but we don't want to get the one hundred and one-th button on some strings we have seen."

"That is a curious theory, Mr. Typeset," I observed.

"Yes, it is, indeed, my dear," said my husband.

"Do you think it is true?" I asked.

"I presume it must be, it is stated in a newspaper."

"But do you believe it, Mr. Typeset?"

"Why, my dear, I think the simplicity and consistency of the hypothesis does rather carry conviction to my mind."

"And does it apply to married men?"

"Undoubtedly. The button gatherers may be second wives, you know. But why do you ask?"

"Because, Mr. Typeset, I have noticed that an extraordinary number of buttons have been missing from your clothing lately."

"My dear," said my husband, "let us not pursue the subject."

When will some efficient steps be taken to secure safety and comfort in our city railroad cars? Again and again, during a few weeks past, have passengers or persons on foot been thrown off, run over, or involved in collisions, with a fatal result in several instances, and with severe and painful wounds and injuries in others. The daily papers teem with accounts of robberies and other crimes, for the perpetration of which the cars seem to be sought by hardened offenders as safe and convenient places for their vocations. And even when one escapes these perils there are sources of discomfort which a moderate expenditure and a reasonable degree of care and attention might prevent. What with crowding, which is of course worst at the hours one is most sure to want to ride, dirty seats and floors, excessively close companionship of rude, unwholesome, and sometimes even intoxicated persons, and the intrusion of market baskets, washer-women's hampers, servant girls' trunks, and workmen's tools, and the nuisance of smoking on the platform, the cars are not a fit way for a woman who's got any feelings about her to go back and forth. I rode down town to Canal Street this morning, and I declare I was frightened at the crowd, till I grew so sick I didn't care. Either the cars we've got should be cleaned up and run decently, or there should be some other way to ride provided for people who want a comfortable ride and are willing to pay for it.

Thursday Eve.—"Papa!" said Sonny, at the breakfast-table this morning, "do you believe this?"

The boy takes after his father in one thing—he will read newspapers all breakfast-time. There they were: one of them bowed down over the New York Morning Glory, the other leaning over the Trumpet, and the Daily Visitor lying between them, ready for whoever got through first, each devouring a paragraph with every mouthful, and poor me eating my breakfast all alone, with nobody to help me to butter even. I declare I wish there was not a paper published till ten o'clock!

"Believe what?"

"This about this musical invention."

[Reading from his paper.]—"Somebody tells of a musical invention lately perfected by a—not Yankee, but Southerner—residing in this city. This instrument is a wooden box, so constructed that it can be readily attached to the key-board of any piano-forte or organ. Into this box is introduced a roll of sheet-music (on which the musical composition to be performed is perforated instead of being printed), when a series of 'axial bars' underneath the box strike the keys of the piano-forte and perform the most delicate and difficult, as well as the most simple music, producing at pleasure effects of execution which no living artist would think of attempting; performing, for instance, a chromatic scale in octaves, thirds, and tenths over the key-board with a rapidity which causes the whole scale to sound like the snap of a whip, though every note is clearly heard. It can also be made to produce the same effects as if four, six, eight or more hands were performing. Its powers are not limited to one set of tunes, since it can always perform 'at sight,' without hesitation or previous study, any musical composition, even the most difficult."

"Do you believe it, papa?"

"I don't know; this is an age of inventions. Almost every day there is a new one announced."

"But not such wonderful ones as this."

"I don't know. I should not be surprised if I could find as wonderful a one in my paper."

So Mr. Typeset turned over his leaves in search of an astonishing invention.

"Here," said he, "listen to this."

[Reading.]—"We were visited a few weeks ago by an odd looking, nondescript genius who laboriously struggled into the publication office, bearing a heavy box strapped upon his shoulders, which (the box, not the shoulders) he swung off and deposited upon the floor."

"'Captain,' said he, to the junior partner, 'can't I sell you one of my machines to-day?'"

"'What is your machine?'"

"'Ain't you heard of it. It's the patent double action news-chopper.'"

"'News-chopper?'"

"'News-chopper. Fact. Just the thing for a newspaper office. Indispensable. Can't be done without. See how it works. Got a few old newspapers handy?'"

"'He was supplied with a dozen newspapers.'"

"'There! See this slit in the back? Spread your papers out. Slide them in till the nippers catch hold. Open these doors in front. See the stops?—pointing to projecting handles bearing labels—'Pull one of these—Foreign News—Scientific Items—Political Intelligence—any you like, say Foreign News. Open that little drawer. Turn this crank, and see what comes out.'"

"'He applied himself to the crank, and, sure enough, out came a string of paragraphs.'"

Here Mr. Typeset rattled off a parcel of stuff like this:

"'John Brown, not Virginia's John Brown, but Victoria's, is going to marry a Scotch girl. The Queen has promised them a house at Balmoral.'"

"'The Sultan has made the Queen a present of seven Arabian horses; and the Queen has given the Sultan's son an album of portraits of the royal family.'"

"'The house in which the French Emperor lived in London has been decorated with a tablet—NAPOLÉON III. lived here, 1848.'"

"'Buckingham Palace is to be repaired.'"

"'A telegram from India brings news of the death of the son of King Sam.'"

"'Who is King Sam?' said we, not recollecting any potentate of that name except Uncle Sam.

"'King Sam' said the inventor, doubtfully, and opening a door in the machine, and inspecting the interior works. 'Oh! I see, a pin slipped off just then. Pins will slip sometimes. Son of the King of Siam, that's the idea.'"

"'But now,' he continued, hastening to another topic, 'just notice the beautiful double action. Press this handle, you have all your news cut for one side; press that, all cut for t'other. See here! Draw the 'Political Intelligence' stop. Put on the conservative action; every thing comes out with a fine conservative tone. Put that off, and put on the radical action; all the news comes infused with a high radical spirit. You just let me put a few electric rears through the machine, and see how they come out.'"

"'Papa, I don't believe a word of it.'"

[Mr. Typeset, continuing.]—"We assured the inventor that we did not doubt the results would be remarkable, but we could not purchase, as the method was not in our style; but, we added, he might probably find purchasers at the offices of some of the evening journals."

"'He was last seen starting in the direction of Nassau Street. From the wonderful increase in the number of evening papers recently we are led to believe he must have sold a good many machines.'"

"'Papa, I don't believe a word of it; you're making it all up,' said my young gentleman, snatching the sheet to see for himself. 'Pshaw! you've got nothing but some bits of items.'"

FACETIE.

A BARGAIN.

LITTLE FRANK. "Great Cæsar, mother, what a big apple!"

MOTHER. "It's wicked, Franky, to say 'Great Cæsar.' I've often reproved you for using this bad word, which you have learned from the boys in the street, but you keep on repeating it. Now I will tell you what I will do. I will give you five cents not to say 'Great Cæsar' any more."

"It's a bargain, mother," cried the little four-year-old; and the money was paid.

Two or three days afterward little Frank came running into the house from his play on the street, eyes glistening, and his cheeks red with excitement. "Mother, mother, I've learned a new word from the boys. It's 'Great Peter.' Give me five cents, and I'll quit saying that too."

NOTES TO PERSONS ABOUT TO BE PHOTOGRAPHED.

As men, women, and children are thinking of being photographed daily, hourly, and, we may add, minutely, the following hints and helps as regards costume, attitude, deportment, and facial expression may prove of service:

1. Be sure to put on your best clothes; this will not only give you a better appearance, but will prevent your bad habits being made known to the world.

2. Black and other dark colors are the most favorable for photographing purposes. Some persons are done brown, and others appear to have a fit of the blues.

3. If you are neither in the army nor navy you will be scarcely justified in appearing in naval or military uniform. A sheriff's officer may, however, be taken in what costume he pleases—his numerous services entitle him to this privilege.

4. If you were never known to look into a book in your life it will be as well to be drawn with one in your hand, for this will serve to remind your friends that you can read, if you don't.

5. Persons about to be photographed should be prepared to go any lengths, for there is the full-length, the half-length, and the quarter-length. If you adopt the first-named put your best foot foremost, so that you may stand well with society.

6. If you are inclined to be nervous call philosophy to your aid by remembering that all mortals should prepare themselves to be taken off suddenly.

7. It will be as well, perhaps, not to be photographed during what may be termed the "pimply season." This would be decidedly rash, and cause the photograph to turn out a bad spec.

8. If you are taken in a sitting position sit bolt erect, so that critics may exclaim, "There is an upright individual!"

9. There are what are termed striking attitudes, and attitudes of repose; these do not necessarily relate either to pugilism or sleep, but are intended to convey an idea of the position you customarily take up in the affairs of life.

10. Endeavor to put on a lively expression of countenance, and to accomplish this conjure up pleasant images. Ladies should think of gentlemen, gentlemen of ladies, girls of wax dolls, and boys of bread and treacle.

11. If these hints are attended to nothing more need be said, the likeness will speak for itself.

If I were in the sun and you out of it what would the sun become?—Sin.

Why is a pig in the drawing-room like a house on fire?—Because the sooner it is put out the better.

LOVE LYRIC.

Yes! thou art lovely as I see thee now;
The shade of sadness brooding on thy brow
Adds to thy beauty—evident sunshine there
Plays in the tangle of thy silky hair,
And gives a gleam, a radiance of the skies,
To the sweet depths of those appealing eyes.
Say, shall I sing in songs all silver-sweet,
Thy winsomeness of white and thy fleet?
Shall I extol thy slim and graceful neck,
Collared and confined, and pure of spot or speck,
White only? No. I'll gaze on thee and tell
Mine own heart truly that I love thee well.
Life, reft of love and thee, would be a clog,
My own, my ever-beautiful, my—dog!

A young lady, on leaving a concert recently, expressed her delight at the excellent music, and said that she was particularly pleased with "that piece from the 'Twelfth Massachusetts,'" meaning Mozart's "Twelfth Mass."

"Harry, you ought not to throw away nice bread like that; you may want it some day." "Well, mother, would I stand any better chance of getting it then if I should eat it now?"

"Doctor, what is a certain cure for a bald cranium?" "Amputation—decapitation—cutting it off, Sir."

WHAT A FALL WAS THERE!—A modern tourist calls the Niagara River the "pride of rivers." That pride certainly has a tremendous fall.

WIT AND HUMOR.—It is easy to say ill-natured things, and thus get a reputation for smartness; but genuine humor doesn't flow from a bitter fountain. It is gentle and genial, comes from a bright and loving spirit, and refreshes while it excites to mirth and laughter. Less brilliant than wit, it is more agreeable; while the one offends by its severity, the other makes a man ashamed of his follies without exciting his resentment.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER III.

"A MAN OVERBOARD!"

IN so small a town as Sydney then was Brandon could hope to learn all that could be learned about Cigole. By casual inquiries he learned that the Italian had come out in the Rival, and had given out that he was agent for a London house in the wool business. He had bought up a considerable quantity which he was preparing to ship.

Brandon could not help feeling that there was some ruse about this. Yet he thought, on the other hand, why should he flout his name so boldly before the world? If he is in reality following me why should he not drop his name? But then, again, why should he? Perhaps he thinks that I can not possibly know any thing about his name. Why should I? I was a child when Despard was murdered. It may be merely a similarity of names.

Brandon from time to time had opportunities of hearing more about Cigole, yet always the man seemed absorbed in business.

He wondered to himself whether he had better confide his suspicions to Mr. Compton or not. Yet why should he? The old man would become excited, and feel all sorts of wild hopes about discovering his wife and son. Could it be possible that the Italian after so many years could now afford any clew whatever? Certainly it was not very probable.

On the whole Brandon thought that this man, whoever he was or whatever his purpose might be, would be encountered best by himself singly. If Mr. Compton took part he would at once awaken Cigole's fears by his clumsiness.

Brandon felt quite certain that Mr. Compton would not know any thing about Cigole's presence in Sydney unless he himself told him. For the old man was so filled with trouble at the loss of his partner that he could think of nothing else, and all his thoughts were taken up with closing up the concern so as to send forward remittances of money to London as soon as possible. Mr. Compton had arranged for him to draw £2000 on his arrival at London, and three months afterward £3000—£10,000 would be remitted during the following year.

Brandon had come to the conclusion to tell Mr. Compton about Cigole before he left, so that if the man remained in the country he might be bribed or otherwise induced to tell what he knew; yet thinking it possible that Cigole had designed to return in the same ship with him, he waited to see how things would turn out. As he could not help associating Cigole in his mind with Potts, so he thought that whichever way he turned this man would try to follow him. His anticipations proved correct. He had taken passage in the ship Java, and two days before the vessel left he learned that Cigole had taken his passage in her also, having put on board a considerable quantity of wool. On the whole Brandon felt gratified to hear this, for the close association of a long sea voyage would give him opportunities to test this man, and probe him to the bottom. The thought of danger arising to himself did not enter his mind. He believed that Cigole meant mischief, but had too much confidence in his own powers to fear it.

On the 5th of August the ship Java was ready, and Mr. Compton stood on the quarter-deck to bid good-by to Brandon.

"God bless you, dear boy! You will find the money coming promptly, and Smithers & Co.'s house is one of the strongest in London. I have brought you a parting gift," said he, in a low voice. He drew from his pocket a pistol, which in those days was less known than now—indeed, this was the first of its kind which had reached Australia, and Mr. Compton had paid a fabulous price for it. "Here," said he, "take this to remember me by. They call it a revolver. Here is a box of patent cartridges that go with it. It is from me to you. And mind," he continued, while there came over his face a vengeful look which Brandon had never seen there before—"mind, if ever you see John Potts, give him one of those patent cartridges, and tell him it is the last gift of a broken-hearted father."

Brandon's face turned ghastly, and his lips seemed to freeze into a smile of deadly meaning.

"God bless you!" cried Compton, "I see by your face that you will do it. Good-by."

He wrung Brandon's hand hard and left the ship.

About six feet away stood Cigole, looking over the stern and smoking a cigar. He was near enough to hear what had been said, but he did not appear to have heard it. Throwing his cigar into the water, he plunged his hands into his pockets, and began whistling a lively air.

"Aha, Capitano," said he, in a foreign accent, "I have brought my wool off at last."

Brandon paced the deck silently yet watchfully.

The good ship Java went out with a fine breeze, which continued for some days, until at last nothing could be seen but the wide ocean. In those few days Brandon had settled himself comfortably on board, and had learned pretty well the kind of life which he would have to lead for the next six months or so. The captain was a quiet, amiable sort of a person, without much force of character; the mate was more energetic and somewhat passionate; the crew consisted of the average order of men. There was no chance, certainly, for one of those conspiracies such as Mr. Compton had hinted at as having taken place on the Vishnu; for in his account of that affair he evidently believed that Uracao had been made a scape-goat for the sins of the others.

Brandon was soon on the best of terms with the officers of the ship. As to Cigole it was different. The fact of their being the only passengers on board might of itself have been a sufficient cause to draw them together; but Brandon found it difficult to pass beyond the extreme limits of formal intercourse. Brandon himself considered that his purposes would be best served by close association with this man; he hoped that in the course of such association he might draw something from Cigole. But Cigole baffled him constantly. He was as polite and courteous as all Italians are; he had an abundance of remarks all ready about the state of the weather, the prospects of the voyage, or the health of the seamen; but beyond these topics it was difficult to induce him to go. Brandon stifled the resentment which he felt toward this man, in his efforts to break down the barriers of formality which he kept up, and sought to draw him out on the subject of the wool trade. Yet here he was baffled. Cigole always took up the air of a man who was speaking to a rival in business, and pretended to be very cautious and guarded in his remarks about wool, as though he feared that Brandon would interfere with his prospects. This sort of thing was kept up with such great delicacy of management on Cigole's part that Brandon himself would have been completely deceived, and would have come to consider him as nothing more than a speculator in wool, had it not been for a certain deep instinct within him, which made him regard this man as one who was actuated by something far deeper than mere regards for a successful speculation.

Cigole managed to baffle the most dextrous efforts and the most delicate contrivances of Brandon. He would acknowledge that he was an Italian, and had been in all parts of Italy, but carefully refrained from telling where he was born. He asserted that this was the first time that he had been in the Eastern seas. He remarked once, casually, that Cigole was a very common name among Italians. He said that he had no acquaintances at all in England, and was only going there now because he heard that there was a good market for wool. At another time he spoke as though much of his life had been passed in Marseilles, and hinted that he was a partner of a commercial house there.

Cigole never made any advances, and never even met half-way those which Brandon made. He was never off his guard for one instant. Polite, smiling, furtive, never looking Brandon fairly in the face, he usually spoke with a profusion of bows, gestures, and commonplaces, adopting, in fact, that part which is always at once both the easiest and the safest to play—the non-committal, pure and perfect.

It was cunning, but low cunning after all, and Brandon perceived that, for one who had some purpose to accomplish with but a common soul to sustain him, this was the most ordinary way to do it. A villain of profounder cunning or of larger spirit would have pursued a different path. He would have conversed freely and with apparent unreserve; he would have yielded to all friendly advances, and made them himself; he would have shown the highest art by concealing art, in accordance with the hackneyed proverb, "Ars est celare artem."

Brandon despised him as an ordinary villain, and hardly thought it worth his while to take any particular notice of him, except to watch him in a general way. But Cigole, on the contrary, was very different. His eyes, which never met those of Brandon fairly, were constantly watching him. When moving about the quarter-deck or when sitting in the cabin he usually had the air of a man who was pretending to be intent on something else, but in reality watching Brandon's acts or listening to his words. To any other man the knowledge of this would have been in the highest degree irksome. But to Brandon it was gratifying, since it confirmed his suspicions. He saw this man, whose constant efforts were directed toward not committing himself by word, doing that very thing by his attitude, his gesture, and the furtive glance of his eye. Brandon, too, had his part, but it was infinitely greater than that of Cigole, and the purpose that now animated his life was unintelligible to this man who watched him. But Cigole's whole soul was apparent to Brandon; and by his small arts, his low cunning, his sly observation, and many other peculiarities, he exhibited that which is seen in its perfection in the ordinary spy of despotic countries, such as used to abound most in Rome and Naples in the good old days.

For the common spy of Europe may deceive the English or American traveler; but the Frenchman, the German, the Spaniard, or the Italian, always recognizes him.

So Brandon's superior penetration discovered the true character of Cigole.

He believed that this man was the same Cigole who had figured in the affair of the Vishnu; that he had been sent out by Potts to do some injury to himself, and that he was capable of any crime. Yet he could not see how he could do any thing. He certainly could not incite the simple-minded captain and the honest mate to conspiracy. He was too great a coward to attempt any violence. So Brandon concluded that he had simply come to watch him so as to learn his character, and carry back to Potts all the knowledge that he might gain.

This was his conclusion after a close association of one month with Cigole. Yet he made up his mind not to lose sight of this man. To him he appeared only an agent in villainy, and therefore unworthy of vengeance; yet he might be made use of as an aid in that vengeance. He therefore wished to have a clew by which he might afterward find him.

"You and I," said he one day, in conversation, "are both in the same trade. If I ever get to England I may wish some time to see you. Where can I find you?"

Cigole looked in twenty different directions, and hesitated for some time.

"Well," said he at last, "I do not think that you will wish to see me—" and he hesitated; "but," he resumed, with an evil smile, "if you should by any possibility wish to do so, you can find out where I am by inquiring of Giovanni Cavallo, 16 Red Lion Street, London."

"Perhaps I may not wish to," said Brandon, coolly, "and perhaps I may. At any rate, if I do, I will remember to inquire of Giovanni Cavallo, 16 Red Lion Street, London."

He spoke with deep emphasis on the address. Cigole looked uncomfortable, as though he had at last made the mistake which he dreaded, and had committed himself.

So the time passed.

After the first few days the weather had become quite stormy. Strong head-winds, accompanied often by very heavy rains, had to be encountered. In spite of this the ship had a very good passage northward, and met with no particular obstacle until her course was turned toward the Indian Ocean. Then all the winds were dead against her, and for weeks a succession of long tacks far to the north and to the south brought her but a short distance onward. Every day made the wind more violent and the storm worse. And now the season of the equinox was approaching, when the monsoons change, and all the winds that sweep over these seas alter their courses. For weeks before and after this season the winds are all unsettled, and it seems as if the elements were let loose. From the first week in September this became manifest, and every day brought them face to face with sterner difficulties. Twice before the captain had been to Australia; and for years he had been in the China trade; so that he knew these seas well; but he said that he had never known the equinoctial storms begin so early, and rage with such violence.

Opposed by such difficulties as these the ship made but a slow passage—the best routes had not yet been discovered—and it was the middle of September before they entered the Indian Ocean. The weather then became suddenly calm, and they drifted along beyond the latitude of the western extremity of Java, about a hundred miles south of the Straits of Sunda. Here they began to encounter the China fleet which steers through this strait, for every day one or more sails were visible.

Here they were borne on helplessly by the ocean currents, which at this place are numerous and distracted. The streams that flow through the many isles of the Indian Archipelago, uniting with the greater southern streams, here meet and blend, causing great difficulties to navigation, and often baffling even the most experienced seaman. Yet it was not all left to the currents, for frequently and suddenly the storms came up; and the weather, ever changeable, kept the sailors constantly on the alert.

Yet between the storms the calms were frequent, and sometimes long continued, though of such a sort as required watchfulness. For out of the midst of dead calms the storm would suddenly rise in its might, and all the care which experience could suggest was not always able to avert disaster.

"I don't like this weather, Mr. Brandon. It's the worst that we could have, especially just here."

"Why just here?"

"Why, we're opposite the Straits of Sunda, the worst place about these parts."

"What for?"

"Pirates. The Malays, you know. We're not over well prepared to meet them, I'm afraid. If they come we'll have to fight them the best way we can; and these calms are the worst thing for us, because the Malay proas can get along in the lightest wind, or with oars, when we can't move at all."

"Are the Malays any worse than usual now?" asked Brandon.

"Well, no worse than they've been for the last ten years. Zangorri is the worst of them all."

"Zangorri! I've heard of him."

"I should think you had. Why, there never was a pirate in these seas that did so much damage. No mortal knows the ships that devil has captured and burned."

"I hope you have arms for the seamen, at any rate."

"Oh, we have one howitzer, and small-arms for the men, and we will have to get along the best way we can with these; but the owners ought never to send us here without a better equipment."

"I suppose they think it would cost too much."

"Yes; that's it. They think only about the profits, and trust to luck for our safety. Well, I only hope we'll get safely out of this place—that's all."

And the captain walked off much more excited than usual.

They drifted on through days of calm, which were succeeded by fierce but short-lived storms, and then followed by calms. Their course lay sometimes north, sometimes south, sometimes nowhere. Thus the time passed, until at length, about the middle of September, they came in sight of a long, low island of sand.

"I've heard of that sand-bank before," said the captain, who showed some surprise at seeing it; "but I didn't believe it was here. It's not down in the charts. Here we are three hundred and fifty miles southwest of the Straits of Sunda, and the chart makes this place all open water. Well, seein's believin'; and after this I'll swear that there is such a thing as Coffin Island."

"Is that the name?"

"That's the name an old sea-captain gave it, and tried to get the Admiralty to put it on the charts, but they wouldn't. But this is it, and no mistake."

"Why did he call it Coffin Island?"

"Well, he thought that rock looked like a coffin, and it's dangerous enough when a fog comes to deserve that name."

Brandon looked earnestly at the island which the captain mentioned, and which they were slowly approaching.

It lay toward the north, while the ship's course, if it had any in that calm, was southwest. It was not more than six miles away, and appeared to be about five miles long. At the nearest extremity a black rock arose to a height of about fifty feet, which appeared to be about five hundred feet long, and was of such a shape that the imagination might easily see a resemblance to a coffin. At the farthest extremity of the island was a low mound. The rest of the island was flat, low, and sandy, with no trace of vegetation perceptible from the ship, except a line of dingy green under the rock, which looked like grass.

The ship drifted slowly on.

Meanwhile the captain, in anticipation of a storm, had caused all the sails to be taken in, and stood anxiously watching the sky toward the southwest.

There a dense mass of clouds lay piled along the horizon, gloomy, lowering, menacing; frowning over the calm seas as though they would soon destroy that calm, and fling forth all the fury of the winds. These clouds seemed to have started up from the sea, so sudden had been their appearance; and now, as they gathered themselves together, their forms distended, and heightened, and reached forward vast arms into the sky, striving to climb there, rolling upward voluminous cloud masses which swiftly ascended toward the zenith. So quick was the progress of these clouds that they did not seem to come from the banks below; but it was rather as though all the air suddenly condensed its moisture and made it visible in these dark masses.

As yet there was no wind, and the water was as smooth as glass; but over the wide surface, as far as the eye could reach, the long swell of the ocean had changed into vast rolling undulations, to the motion of which the ship yielded, slowly ascending and descending as the waters rose and fell, while the yards creaked, and the rigging twanged to the strain upon them.

Every moment the sky grew darker, and as gloom gathered above so it increased below, till all the sea spread out a smooth ebony mass. Darkness settled down, and the sun's face was thus obscured, and a preternatural gloom gathered upon the face of nature. Overhead vast black clouds went sweeping past, covering all things, faster and faster, till at last far down in the northern sky the heavens were all obscured.

But amidst all this there was as yet not a breath of wind. Far above the wind careered in a narrow current, which did not touch the surface of the sea but only bore onward the clouds. The agitation of the sky above contrasted with the stillness below made the latter not consoling but rather fearful, for this could be none other than that treacherous stillness which precedes the sudden outburst of the hurricane.

For that sudden outburst all were now looking, expecting it every moment. On the side of the ship where the wind was expected the captain was standing, looking anxiously at the black clouds on the horizon, and all the crew were gazing there in sympathy with him. From that quarter the wind would burst, and it was for this assault that all the preparations had been made.

For some time Brandon had watched the collecting clouds, but at length he turned away, and seemed to find a supreme fascination in the sand-bank. He stood at the stern of the ship, looking fixedly toward the rock, his arms folded, and his thoughts all absorbed in that one thing. A low railing ran round the quarter-deck. The helmsman stood in a sheltered place which rose only two feet above the deck. The captain stood by the companion-way, looking south at the storm; the mate was near the captain, and all were intent and absorbed in their expectation of a sudden squall.

Close by the rudder-post stood Cigole, looking with all the rest at the gathering storm. His face was only half turned, and as usual he watched this with only a furtive glance, for at times his stealthy eyes turned toward Brandon; and he alone of all on board did not seem to be absorbed by some overmastering thought.

Suddenly a faint, fluttering ripple appeared to the southward; it came quickly; it seemed to flash over the waters; with the speed of the wind it moved on, till a quick fresh blast struck the ship and sighed through the rigging. Then a faint breathing of wind succeeded; but far away there rose a low moan like that which arises from some vast cataract at a great distance, whose roar, subdued by distance, sounds faintly, yet warningly, to the ear.

At this first touch of the tempest, and the menacing voice of its approach, not a word was spoken, but all stood mute. Brandon alone appeared not to have noticed it. He still stood with folded arms and absorbed air, gazing at the island.

The roar of the waters in the distance grew louder, and in the direction from which it came the dark water was all white with foam, and the boiling flood advanced nearer in myriad-numbered waves, which seemed now like an army rushing to the charge, tossing on high its crested heads and its countless foam-plumes, and threatening to bear down all before it.

At last the tornado struck.

At the fierce blast of the storm the ship rolled far over, the masts creaked and groaned, the waves rushed up and dashed against the side.

"HE PUSHED HIM HEADLONG OVER THE RAIL AND HELPLESSLY INTO THE SEA."

At that instant Cigole darted quickly toward Brandon, and the moment that the vessel yielded to the blow of the storm he fell violently against him. Before Brandon had noticed the storm or had time to steady himself he had pushed him headlong over the rail and helplessly into the sea—

"—liquidas project in undas Precipitem."

Cigole clung to the rail, and instantly shrieked out:

"Man overboard!"

The startling cry rang through the ship. The captain turned round with a face of agony.

"Man overboard!" shouted Cigole again.

"Help! It's Brandon!"

"Brandon!" cried the captain. "He's lost! O God!"

He took up a hen-coop from its fastenings and flung it into the sea, and a couple of pails after it.

He then looked aloft and to the south with eyes of despair. He could do nothing. For now the storm was upon them, and the ship was plunging furiously through the waters with the speed of a race-horse at the touch of the gale. On the lee-side lay the sand-bank, now only three miles away, whose unknown shallows made their present position perilous in the extreme. The ship could not turn to try and save the lost passenger; it was only by keeping straight on that there was any hope of avoiding that lee-shore.

All on board shared the captain's despair, for all saw that nothing could be done. The ship was at the mercy of the hurricane. To turn was impossible. If they could save their own lives now it would be as much as they could do.

Away went the ship—away, farther and farther, every moment leaving at a greater distance the lost man who struggled in the waters.

At last they had passed the danger, the island was left behind, and the wide sea lay all around.

But by this time the storm was at its height; the ship could not maintain its proper course, but, yielding to the gale, fled to the northwest far out of its right direction.

CHAPTER IV.

SINKING IN DEEP WATERS.

BRANDON, overwhelmed by the rush of waters, half suffocated, and struggling in the rush of the waves, shrieked out a few despairing cries for help, and sought to keep his head above water as best he could. But his cries were borne off by the fierce winds, and the ship as it careered madly before the blast was soon out of hearing.

He was a first-rate swimmer, but in a sea like this it needed all his strength and all his skill to save himself from impending death. Encumbered by his clothes it was still more difficult, yet so fierce was the rush of wind and wave that he dared not stop for a moment in his struggles in order to divest himself of his clothing.

At first, by a mere blind instinct, he tried to swim after the ship, as though by any possibility he could ever reach her again, but the hurricane was against him, and he was forced sideways far out of the course which he was trying to take. At last the full possession of his senses was restored, and following the ship no longer, he turned toward the direction where that sand island lay which had been the cause of his disaster. At first it was hidden from view by the swell of waves that rose in front, but soon rising upon the crest of one of these he perceived far away the dark form of the coffin-shaped rock. Here then before him lay the island, and toward this both wind and wave impelled him.

But the rock was far to the right, and it might be that the island did not extend far enough to meet him as he neared it. It was about five miles in length, but in his efforts he might not be able to reach even the western extremity. Still there was nothing else to do but to try. Resolutely, therefore, though half despairingly, he put forth his best strength, and struggled manfully to win the shore.

That lone and barren sand-bank, after all, offered but a feeble chance for life. Even if he did reach it, which was doubtful, what could he do? Starvation instead of drowning would be his fate. More than once it occurred to him that it would be better then and there to give up all efforts and let himself go. But then there came the thought of those dear ones who waited for him in England, the thought of the villain who had thrown him from the ship, and the greater villain who had sent him out on his murderous errand. He could not bear the idea that they should triumph over him so easily and so quickly. His vengeance should not be taken from him; it had been baffled, but it still nerved his arm.

A half hour's struggle, which seemed like many hours, had brought him much nearer to the island, but his strength was almost exhausted. His clothes, caught in the rush of the waves, and clinging to him, confined the free action of his limbs, and lent an additional weight. Another half hour's exertion might possibly bring him to the shore, but that exertion hardly seemed possible. It was but with difficulty now that he could strike out. Often the rush of the waves from behind would overwhelm him, and it was only by convulsive efforts that he was able to surmount the raging billows and regain his breath.

Efforts like these, however, were too exhaustive to be long continued. Nature failed, and already a wild despair came over him. For a quarter of an hour longer he had continued his exertions; and now the island was so near that a quarter of an hour more might bring him to it. But even that exertion of strength was now no longer possible. Faintly and feebly, and with failing limbs and fiercely throbbing heart, he toiled on, until at last any further effort seemed impossible. Before him was the mound which he had noticed from the ship. He was at the western extremity of the island. He saw that he was being carried in such a direction that even if he did struggle on he might be borne helplessly past the island and out into the open sea. Already he could look past the island, and see the wide expanse of white foaming waves which threatened to engulf him. The sight weakened what little strength was left, and made his efforts even feeble.

Despairingly he looked around, not knowing what he sought, but seeking still for something, he knew not what. In that last look of despair his eyes caught sight of something which at once gave him renewed hope. It was not far away. Borne along by the waves it was but a few yards distant, and a little behind him. It was the hen-coop which the Captain of the Java had thrown overboard so as to give Brandon a chance for life. That last chance was now thrown in his way, for the hen-coop had followed the same course with himself, and had been swept along not very far from him.

Brandon was nerved to new efforts by the sight of this. He turned and exerted the last remnants of his strength in order to reach this means of safety. It was near enough to be accessible. A few vigorous strokes, a few struggles with the waves, and his hands clutched the bars with the grasp of a drowning man.

It was a large hen-coop, capable of keeping several men afloat. Brandon clung to this and at last had rest. Every minute of respite from such struggles as he had carried on restored his strength to a greater degree. He could now keep his head high out of the water and avoid the engulfing fury of the waves behind. Now at last he could take a better survey of the prospect before him, and see more plainly whither he was going.

The sand-bank lay before him; the mound at the western extremity was in front of him, not very far away. The rock which lay at the eastern end was now at a great distance, for he had been swept by the current abreast of the island, and was even now in danger of being carried past it. Still there was hope, for wind and wave were blowing directly toward the island, and there was a chance of his being carried full upon its shore. Yet the chance was a slender one, for the set of the tide rather carried him beyond the line of the western extremity.

Every minute brought him nearer, and soon his fate would be decided. Nearer and nearer he came, still clinging to the hen-coop, and making no efforts whatever, but reserving and collecting together all his strength, so as to put it forth at the final hour of need.

But as he came nearer the island appeared to move more and more out of the line of his approach. Under these circumstances his only chance was to float as near as possible, and then make a last effort to reach the land.

Nearer and nearer he came. At last he was close by it, but the extreme point of the island lay to the right more than twenty yards. This was the crisis of his fate, for now if he floated on any longer he would be carried farther away.

The shore was here low but steep, the waters appeared to be deep, and a heavy surf dashed upon the island, and threw up its spray far over the mound. He was so near that he could distinguish the pebbles on the beach, and could see beyond the mound a long, flat surface with thin grass growing.

Beyond this point was another a hundred yards away, but farther out of his reach, and affording no hope whatever. Between the two points there was an inlet into the island showing a little cove; but the surf just here became wilder, and long rollers careered one past another over the intervening space. It was a hopeless prospect. Yet it was his last chance.

Brandon made up his mind. He let go the hen-coop, and summoning up all his strength he struck out for the shore. But this time the wind and sea were against him, bearing him past the point, and the waves dashed over him more quickly and furiously than before. He was swept past the point before he had made half a dozen strokes; he was borne on still struggling; and now on his left lay the rollers which he had seen. In spite of all his efforts he was farther away from the island than when he had left the hen-coop. Yet all hope and all life depended upon the issue of this last effort. The fifteen or twenty minutes of rest and of breathing-space which he had gained had been of immense advantage, and he struggled with all the force which could be inspired by the nearness of safety. Yet, after all, human efforts can not withstand the fury of the elements, and here against this strong sea the strongest swimmer could not hope to contend successfully.

"Never I ween was swimmer
In such an evil case."

He swam toward the shore, but the wind striking him from one side, and urging on the sea, drove him sideways. Some progress was made, but the force of the waters was fearful, and for every foot that he moved forward he was carried six feet to leeward. He himself saw this, and calculating his chances he perceived with despair that he was already beyond the first point, and that at the present rate there was no possibility of gaining the farther point.

Already the waves leaped exultingly about him, dashing over him now more wildly, since he was exposed more than before to their full sweep. Already the rollers lay close beside him on his left. Then it seemed as though he would be engulfed. Turning his head backward with a last faint thought of trying to regain the hen-coop, so as to prolong life somewhat, he saw it far away out of his reach. Then all hope left him.

He was now at the outermost line of rollers. At the moment that he turned his head a huge wave raised him up and bore him forward. He struggled still, even in that time of despair, and fought with his enemies. They bore him onward, however, none the less helplessly, and descending carried him with them.

But now at last, as he descended with that wave, hope came back, and all his despair vanished.

For as the wave flung him downward his feet touched bottom, and he stood for a moment erect, on solid, hard sand, in water that scarcely reached above his knees. It was for a moment only that he stood, however, for the sweep of the water bore him down, and he fell forward. Before he could regain himself another wave came and hurled him farther forward.

By a violent effort he staggered to his feet. In an instant he comprehended his position. At this western end the island descended gently into the water, and the shoal which it formed extended for miles away. It was this shoal that caused the long rollers that came over them so vehemently, and in such marked contrast with the more abrupt waves of the sea behind.

In an instant he had comprehended this, and had taken his course of action.

Now he had foothold. Now the ground beneath lent its aid to his endeavor; he was no longer altogether at the mercy of the water. He bounded forward toward the shore in such a direction that he could approach it without opposing himself entirely to the waves. The point that stretched out was now within his reach. The waves rolled past it, but by moving in an oblique direction he could gain it.

Again and again the high rollers came forward, hurling him up as they caught him in their embrace, and then casting him down again. As he was caught up from the bottom he sustained himself on the moving mass, and supported himself on the crest of the wave, but as soon as his feet touched bottom again he sprang forward toward the point which now became every minute more accessible. Wave after wave came, each more furious, each more ravenous than the preceding, as though hounding one another on to make sure of their prey. But now that the hope of life was strong, and safety had grown almost assured, the deathlike weakness which but shortly before had assailed him gave way to new-born strength and unconquerable resolve.

At length he reached a place where the rollers were of less dimensions. His progress became more rapid, until at length the water became exceedingly shallow, being not more than a foot in depth. Here the first point, where the mound was, protected it from the wind and sea. This was the cove which he had noticed. The water was all white with foam, but offered scarcely any resistance to him. He had but to wade onward to the shore.

That shore was at last attained. He staggered up a few paces upon the sandy declivity, and then fell down exhausted upon the ground.

He could not move. It was late; night came on, but he lay where he had fallen, until at last he fell into a sound sleep.

THE FLOWER-GARDEN.

THE present season is usually a busy one. The beautiful summer flowers, which have fulfilled their mission and are dying away, should be removed at once, especially annuals, as the saving of seeds from such flowers (with but few exceptions) ought not to be attempted in well-kept gardens, for the reason that the plants themselves, when allowed to run to seed, become very unsightly, and in but few instances is sufficient care taken to keep the varieties pure; and when we take into consideration the fact that the seeds themselves can be purchased for a mere trifle, it hardly repays the trouble. The vacancies caused by the removal of such plants should now be filled by herbaceous plants and spring flowering bulbs; these will add greatly to the beauty of a garden next spring. In planting bulbs, if the soil is at all worn out, a few spadefuls of the earth where they are to be planted should be removed, and its place supplied with a like amount of good compost. Such plants as are worth keeping over in the house, if not already attended to, should now be taken from the ground and carefully potted. In gardens where it is desirable to grow bulbs in any quantity the planting of them should now be attended to. Beds for the reception of hyacinths, tulips, and crocus, if not yet prepared, should be proceeded with immediately. The soil best adapted to the growth of these bulbs should be light, rich, and sandy. Those whose gardens do not afford a soil like this may provide such a one, which should be composed of leaf-mould, decomposed cow manure, and sharp sand. Fill the beds appropriated to this purpose with a foot in depth or more of the compost, and when planting the bulbs should be surrounded with a quantity of sand. The bulbs of hyacinths and tulips should be inserted about four inches in the ground, and six, eight, or ten inches apart, according to circumstances. All bulbous or tuberous rooted plants that require protection in winter in a cellar, such as tuberose, dahlias, gladiolas, etc., should now be taken up and well dried; and then packed in dry sand and put away for the winter in a cool and dry part of the cellar.

At this season, when the glories of the flower-garden are departing, our lady readers may be reminded that the experiment of crystallizing flowers, etc., is simple and beautiful, and can be pursued without difficulty. Dissolve eighteen ounces of pure alum in a quart of soft spring water (observing proportion for a greater or less quantity), by boiling it gently in a close tinned vessel, over a moderate fire, keeping it stirred with a wooden spatula, until the solution is complete. When the liquor is almost cold, suspend the object to be crystallized by means of a small thread or twine from a lath or small stick laid horizontally across the aperture of a deep glass or earthen jar, as being best adapted for the purpose, into which the solution must be poured. The respective articles should remain in the solution twenty-four hours. When they are taken out, they are to be carefully suspended in the shade until perfectly dry. When the subjects to be crystallized are put into the solution while it is quite cold, the crystals are apt to be formed too large; on the other hand, should it be too hot, the crystals will be small in proportion. The best temperature is about 95 degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer.

TOWN TALK.

These are not "melancholy days," Mr. Poet, tenderly as you have sung of them. They are the golden glory of the year, when, as the grape purples on the trellis, as the maize bursts in ruddy beauty from the husk, as the pumpkin turns up its orange-tinted cheek to the sun, as the yellow pipkin hangs goldenly from the bough, as the nuts drop pattering in the woods, as the scarlet and yellow leaves come sailing through the air, as all the hills burst into kaleidoscope splendor, as the streams sparkle in the dazzling brilliancy of an autumnal sun, the blood stirs briskly, the eye dilates with pleasure, and the heart leaps in exciting sympathy with nature. Not the pallor of winter, nor the pale tints of spring, nor the crude greenness of summer, can compare in beauty with "Applied autumn, golden-checked and tan," its swarthy brow crowned with Indian opulence of color.

But the town, too, has its autumnal splendors. The russet and the scarlet of the woods appear in the toilets; for fashion, in this interregnum between the pale tints of summer and the dark stuffs of winter, eagerly arrays itself in all the many-hued aspects of our autumnal forests. The shop-windows, the promenades, the equipages, all the carnival life of the streets, have at this season their ripest gayety and splendor. The brilliancy of the air, the clouded brilliancy of the sun, the stir and animation of the streets, marshal into the promenade all the beauty, the youth, the gay dressers, the happy spirits who long to enjoy and to contribute enjoyment, until one is fairly dazzled with the glittering panorama. Fifth Avenue or Broadway at promenade hours is indeed a sight to see.

—What adds to the gayety of the town at this season is the unusual array of operatic and dramatic attractions. There is the Italian Opera, with Parepa, and Peralta, and Ronconi; and the new sensation, the French Comic Opera Company, presenting us Offenbach's popular "Duchess of Gerolstein;" and Ristori the Magnificent, in "Marie Antoinette," the great historical play of the century; and Janauschek, the German tragedienne; and a new scenic sensation, being the pictorial idealization of Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream;" and Wallace's elegant comedy theatre; and, besides all these, a host of other ballets, concerts, panoramas, museums, circuses, lectures, and what not, far too tedious to mention, and some of them, we fear, too tedious or too objectionable to see.

—These are the current sensations. The greatest is to come. Charles Dickens will soon begin his readings, and become the great talked about. The color of his hair, the carriage of his head, the quality of his voice, the expression of his features, the style of his dress, the taste of his jewelry (for he is said to have a weakness that way), will for a time supply the dinner debate, the tea-table chat, and the drawing-room gossip.

—There is one reason why Dickens should be thrice welcomed. We need missionaries in the art of reading and public speaking. The elocution that is taught in our schools, elaborated in the school-readers, and practiced in the pulpit and in the lecture-room, is an abomination that has tried our Christian patience too long. Thackeray gave us a good model of delivery for the lecturer, and Dickens, if reports be true, will show us how elocution can be made a fascinating and beautiful art, rather than the aggressive horror it usually is. To understand how to employ emphasis, inflection, so that all the nicer shades of meaning and expression in a sentence may be conveyed, is an accomplishment that is as rare as it is agreeable. The ordinary idea of elocution is to be vehement, spasmodic, sonorous; to be full of sound; to try tricks with the voice; to toss the arms about as the voice is tossed about; to be painfully and vehemently effective. Quite different from this is the elocution of Charles Dickens. Under his plastic skill the voice personifies character, portrays emotion, and illustrates humor with insinuating and subtle delivery. Good reading is like sculpture; the sentences are chiseled, and the meaning stands out in relief. It is like painting, for there is glow and color, and a pictorial illumination which animates and delights the duldest listener.

—A sort of pioneer to Mr. Dickens is Mr. Arthur Sketchley, the creator and personifier of a somewhat noted garrulous and whimsical cockney lady called Mrs. Brown. Mrs. Brown has for a long time amused the Londoners, and so Mr. Sketchley now relates her adventures, vicissitudes, and sayings to half-puzzled and wholly-entertained American audiences. Mrs. Brown's "Going to the Play" is about the best series of comic adventures our public have listened to.

But what is noticeable about the lecture, or entertainment, is the manner of delivery. Mr. Sketchley is not a good elocutionist, and his utterance is vexatiously indistinct. But he takes a chair before his audience, and rattles off his address in a familiar, easy, yet elegant manner, pretty much as if he were relating a story at a dinner-party. There is no declamation, there is no acting, the peculiarities of the character being neatly and humorously suggested rather than personified; and the entire delivery is marked by a tasteful suppression. This is the most recent manner of English public speakers. To declaim, to be loud or vehement, to use much gesture or action, is considered vulgar. Eloquence, so-called, is voted a bore. In Parliament it will not be tolerated, and unless a man talks before that body, rather than declaims, he will not be listened to. Are not our English friends a little in advance of us in this particular?

—Among the changes of taste apparent is a revival of the love of color. The world is getting back to an appreciation of medieval splendor. For a long time the chromatic scale has been looked upon as in a measure carnal and sinful. Now, however, it is beginning to be understood that the soul of the picturesque is color, and that the beautiful is not in drab like a Quaker. We now cover our furniture in red and in green instead of in black. We paint our walls in fresco. We wear red-hearted coral for our jewelry. Black trousers, coats, and vests have ceased to be the sign of sombre respectability. We have a passion for illumination in books. Black prints give place to delicate chromos. Our vases and all our interior ornaments are resplendent with brilliant hues. We employ gold, and red, and orange, and green in a hundred things that once were required to be dun and dull. Even our architecture begins to put on color.

—In our churches the revived taste for color is conspicuously apparent. St. George's Church (Rev. Dr. Tyng's), which was destroyed by fire two years ago, has just been opened after its reconstruction. It is a surprise and a revelation. Its walls are all in chrome yellow, with diaper designs in buff and gold. The chancel is in blue panels, with gilt stars, the arch of the apsis in blue and crimson, and green and gold. The windows are surrounded with many-tinted mosaics. The gallery panels are in blue and white, with gold borders. The roof is supported by a network of beams, painted in brown, and picked out with gold. The ceiling of the roof is in blue, blazoned with golden devices. The roof, indeed, is a "thing of beauty" worth a pilgrimage to see. All the aisles are paved with colored tiles. The pulpit, desk, and chancel are on a marble platform, the centre in tinted designs.

Christ Church, on Fifth Avenue, has just reopened, with similar polychromatic decoration. This is a revived taste, it must be remembered. Many old English churches were once decorated in this way, but the outraged Puritans whitewashed the walls, and so hid the abomination from sight.

Have just Published:

CIRCE; OR, THREE ACTS IN THE LIFE OF AN ARTIST. A Novel. By BABINGTON WHITE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

The book is a good and clever one, remarkably readable, and above the average of ordinary works of fiction.—Globe.

A romance that, once commenced, will not be readily laid aside till the last page is perused. The interest is wonderfully well sustained.—Eva.

The story is written with cleverness, and will be read with considerable interest.—Observer.

Not only readable, but interesting in an eminent degree.—Court Circular.

The story itself is charming.—Cosmopolitan.

A more powerfully written novel, with a more simple and well constructed story, has no lately come before us. We here lay down "Circe," confessing that its perusal has enthralled us.—Morning Advertiser.

This novel is one of the best of the day.—News of the World.

Those who have not yet read "Circe" have a great pleasure to come. It is one of the most brilliant productions of modern times, written with a rare elegance and power, and telling a plain unvarnished story, in a manner which leads the reader on with deep interest and pleasant suspense till the last page. There is also much scholarship shown, but scholarship deprived of pedantry, and a moral deduced which is worthy of being widely disseminated and taken to heart.—Court Journal.

This is an extraordinary book. It is a story of character, not of incident, and it is fraught with a terrible moral.—Edinburgh Daily Review.

Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of 50 cents.

CASTE. A Novel. By the author of "Mr. Arle." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Well planned, and powerfully written.—Boston Traveller.

Very entertaining and instructive.—Commercial Advertiser.

"A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

The Publishers have just commenced the issue of HARPER'S BAZAR, a Weekly Illustrated Family Journal, devoted to Fashion and Home Literature. Their aim is twofold: to supply the existing need of a Weekly Fashion Newspaper, and to combine therewith a first-class literary journal, which will be indispensable to every household.

It is the first Weekly Journal of Fashion ever published in the United States. The Publishers have made arrangements, at great cost, with the most celebrated of the Fashion Papers of Europe, especially with the famous Bazar of Berlin, which supplies the fashions to the leading journals of Paris, to furnish the same to them in advance, so that henceforth the fashions will appear in HARPER'S BAZAR simultaneously with their publication in Paris and Berlin—an advantage enjoyed by no other journal in the country.

The patrons of HARPER'S BAZAR will receive every fortnight large pattern-plates, containing from forty to fifty full-sized patterns of ladies', misses', and children's bonnets, cloaks, dresses, under-clothing, and other articles, accompanied with the necessary descriptions and directions, and occasionally an elegant colored fashion plate.

HARPER'S BAZAR, besides being the leading Fashion Journal in this country, will also aim to present before its readers the very best specimens of Household Literature. It will contain original and selected Serial Stories, Poetry, Novels, Articles on the Topics of the Day (excluding Politics), on Books, Art, Morals, Familiar Science, Education, Amusements, Hygiene, Etiquette, Housekeeping, Gardening, with Home and Foreign Gossip. No subject of household interest will be excluded from its columns.

HARPER'S BAZAR will contain 16 folio pages, of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superfine calendered paper, and will be published weekly.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the World."

HARPER'S New MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

We can account for its success only by the simple fact that it meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructive variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A Complete Pictorial History of the Times."

"The best, cheapest, and most successful Family Paper in the Union."

HARPER'S WEEKLY, SPLENDIDLY ILLUSTRATED.

The Model Newspaper of our country—complete in all the departments of an American Family Paper—HARPER'S WEEKLY has earned for itself a right to its title, "A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION."—New York Evening Post.

This Paper furnishes the best illustrations. Our future historians will enrich themselves out of HARPER'S WEEKLY long after writers, and printers, and publishers are turned to dust.—New York Evangelist.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY from week to week form a remarkable series of brief political essays. They are distinguished by clear and pointed statements, by good common sense, by independence and breadth of view. They are the expression of mature conviction, high principle, and strong feeling, and take their place among the best newspaper writing of the time.—North American Review, Boston, Mass.

The Publishers have perfected a system of mailing by which they can supply the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR promptly to those who prefer to receive their periodicals directly from the Office of Publication. Postmasters and others desirous of getting up Clubs will be supplied with a Show-Bill on application.

The postage on HARPER'S WEEKLY is 20 cents a year, on the BAZAR 20 cents, and on the MAGAZINE 24 cents, which must be paid at the subscriber's post-office.

ALEC FORBES OF HOWGLEN.
A Novel. By GEORGE MACDONALD, M.A., Author of "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," "Guild Court," &c. 8vo., Paper, 75 cents.

No account of this book would give any idea of the profound interest that pervades it from the first page to the last.—Athenaeum.

A more beautifully written story never came from even this author's pen.—Illustrated News.

A really noble book.—Edinburgh Courier.

It is the production of a man of cultivated mind, of sterling sense, of keen appreciation of humor, of tender sympathies, of truly poetic feeling. It will win its way by slow and sure degrees, appealing to thoughtful readers by its purity of tone, the elevation of its teachings, the touching simplicity of its narration.—The Round Table.

Coffees roasted and ground daily.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT

AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,

(Post-Office Box 5643),

New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory, they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club.

The answer is simply this:

Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars.

Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail.

We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more.

The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by Drafts on New York, by Post-Office Money Orders, or by Express, as may suit the convenience of the Club.

Or, if the amount ordered shall exceed Thirty Dollars, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club.

Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees

FALL CLOAKS.—[SEE PAGE 81.]

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. I.—No. 3.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1867.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1867, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Winter Cloaks.

Fig. 1.—Andrea of dark olive-green velours, cut in deep vandykes, which are richly trimmed with passementerie gimp and heavy fringe. The same trimming forms a square lappet on the back, and the gimp passes over the shoulder and down the upper part of the sleeve. The sleeves are almost tight.

Fig. 2.—Altesse of black velvet, entirely open in front. A loose jacket of moire antique is worn beneath; this is confined by a belt, with long ends, richly trimmed with passementerie gimp and heavy tassels. The cloak is scalloped on the bottom, and trimmed with passementerie gimp and lace. Sleeves tight, with a deep frill of lace set in at the shoulder.

Fig. 3.—Sultan, of black velvet, without sleeves; tight fitting at the waist, and confined by a rich sash of black moire antique, the long ends of which fall under the left arm. The fronts, which are left half open, are longer than the two lappets behind. The trimming is very rich; it is composed of a flounce of deep lace, surmounted by another similar flounce of narrower lace, with a heading of bead gimp. The last flounce follows the contour of the lappets, and also forms a frill at the top of the sleeves.

Fig. 4.—Nabob of black velvet, shawl-shaped, with the ends crossed in front; sleeves loose. Trimming of guipure lace, with a heading of rich bead gimp around the edge and on the bottom of the sleeves, running up to the elbow.

Fig. 5.—Matinee of dark-chestnut heather-cloth, longer in front and pointed behind. Sleeves tight. Trimming, a double row of fringe, with heading of bead gimp, the lower row ending in balls. Simulated hood, trimmed with bead gimp and heavy tassels.

Walking Dresses.

See illustration, page 36.

Fig. 1.—Costume of gray poplin. About three inches from the bottom, a shirr is run in the skirt and a cord passed through, which draws it up in gathers. Braided trimming of black velvet. The paletot is trimmed with bias folds of the same stuff. Bonnet of gray silk.

Fig. 2.—Costume of lilac alpaca, with braided trimming of black velvet, like that of the preceding figure. Skirt looped up on each side with braid and rosette

Figs. 1 and 2. Paletot for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old. For pattern see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 16-23.—Fig. 3. Paletot for Boy from 4 to 6 Years old. For pattern see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 37-41.—Fig. 4. Paletot for Girl from 6 to 8 Years old. For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 33-36.—Fig. 5. Paletot for Girl from 5 to 7 Years old. For pattern see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 42-48.—Fig. 6. Pelerine for Girl from 4 to 6 Years old. For pattern see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 86-90.—Figs. 7 and 8. Paletot for Girl from 8 to 10 Years old. For pattern see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 76-80.—Figs. 9 and 10. Paletot for Boy from 8 to 10 Years old. For pattern see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 81-85.—Fig. 11. Paletot for Girl from 13 to 15 Years old. For pattern see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 73-75.

WINTER CLOAKS FOR CHILDREN.

of velvet. Bonnet of lilac silk, with braided trimming.

Figs. 3 and 4.—Costume of black silk, with a broad trimming of black persane on the bottom of the skirt; the peplum and ends are also of the same material. The waist and peplum are fastened with jet buttons. Silk fringe and bead gimp complete the trimming. The bonnet in Fig. 3 is of white silk. Fig. 4 has a toque of rice straw, with a white rose at the side.

MOTHER.

Not one word of human diction
Is more eloquently dear
Than that word, in every household,
So familiar to the ear.
'Tis a title taught by angels,
As they journey to and fro,
To express a tie of kindred Heaven-hallowed here below.

Often hath my spirit striven,
Since its earthen task began,
To revive its child emotions
In the bosom of the man;
But life's cold, unfriendly shadows
Seemed to chill the old delight,
Till my mother's voice awoke them,
As in boyhood's morning bright.

As I gaze along the vista
Of the ceaseless march of years
I behold her love-light beaming
Through each day of joys or fears;
And when yet I am the saddest,
Tones of hers can soothe the pain
Gentle mother, dear and patient,
May thy influence long remain!

Mates of thine are growing aged,
But thou art not old to me;
Every winsome charm remaineth
That I knew in infancy:
Airy shapes that sometimes hover
Round my pillow while I rest,
Bear thy features, darling mother,
And my sleep is fully blest.

EDUCATE THE EYE.

OF all the inlets of knowledge the "eye-gate," as old John Bunyan terms the human eye, is one of the highest importance, and may by proper care and attention be made the means of conveying not only the most useful information but the greatest delight. Yet how rarely from this source are drawn the instruction and pleasure it so readily yields. The eye, however, requires cultivation, especially in infancy and childhood; but this is no difficult matter, for it demands neither science on the part of the teacher nor effort on that of the pupil.

Delight in form and color is instinctive with the infant, and almost all the parent has to do is to present to it such visible objects as are in accordance with good taste. The child itself is not very discriminating, and may at the earliest age be as much pleased with an old scrubbing-brush or a gnawed bone as with the most artistic joujou of Paris. The least refined mother, however, is conscious of the difference, and it behooves her not to satisfy herself with the reflection, "What matters it, if baby is pleased?" but to exercise what taste she may possess in the selection even of the children's playthings, for these, when graceful in form and harmonious in color, are great aids to education.

The decoration of the walls of the nursery and other rooms with properly chosen pictures is also an obvious way of educating the child's eye. Good engravings are, of course, better than bad pictures, and they, moreover, can be obtained at a price within the means of most parents. The carefully illustrated papers and magazines offer a ready and economical supply of what is essential. By an easy process the large pictures may be separated from the printed matter, and when pasted on card-board can be hung up in nursery or play-room. Some discrimination, of course, must be exercised in the selection. The bold and well-proportioned representations of form, and pictures illustrating the practice of the domestic affections, or some good deed or heroic action, should be chosen.

Pictures or engravings of the right sort will not only improve the taste by their fitness of design and grace of execution, but may be made the means of directly inculcating the duties of life. The graphic representation of a domestic scene involving some act of humanity, generosity, or tenderness, constantly hung before the eye of the child, will do more toward endowing him with such virtues than all the labored moralizing of his parents. The picture is teaching constantly by example, and has the advantage, moreover, of attracting by that subtle power of art to which the most infantile is not insensible. Precept heaped upon precept, by parent or teacher, is not half so effective; and, presented as it must be in the abstract form of a moral or intellectual principle, is seldom intelligible and never inviting to the objective mind of childhood.

Our teachers seem determined that "Wisdom" shall be, "at one entrance quite shut out"—that of the eye. Look at the bare walls of our school-rooms and college-halls, with their great staring surfaces of whitewash, relieved only by a huge patch of blackboard, the crevices of decay, and the stains of neglect. Our public institutions of learning should be adorned with appropriate frescoes by the best artists, or their walls hung at least with good pictures or engravings. These would not only be direct sources of the highest instruction, but would give such an inviting aspect to the places of study, that our sons and daughters who now go so "unwillingly to school" would hasten to them with delight.

EAR-BORING.

IT would be as difficult, probably, to dissuade our dames from making holes in their ears and hanging trinkets to them as it would be to induce a female Hottentot to forego the national fashion of piercing the cartilage of her flattened nose and suspending from it a ring, large and heavy as an iron cable-link, or a Feejee Islander from tearing with a jagged fish-bone a rent in the nether lip big and ugly as her voracious mouth. The practice, however, of so-called civilized women is no less barbaric than that of these savage females.

The woman of ancient Greece, true to the instinctive sense of beauty and cultivated grace of her race, trusted to the developments of her natural charms for attractive force, and scorned all adornments which were not inherent in her own person. Fancy those beautiful ear-pulps of the Venus of Milo, just peeping from below her wavy garland of hair, bored through and through, and dragged out from their cozy shelter by heavy pendants of gold, silver, or what not. Who would not be struck agast at such a sacrilege of art and nature?

Yet so fixed is the attachment of modern women to this ugly and barbaric practice that they not only persist themselves in wearing earrings, but enjoin it almost as a duty upon their daughters to do likewise. No sooner has the offspring of fashion, Miss Arabella Augusta, or plain Maggie of the common world—for the habit is universal—completed her first decade than she is taken to some jeweler or surgeon (for there are even surgeons found thus to degrade their noble art) to have her ears bored. The little ones seldom go unwillingly, so early are they disposed to offer themselves as sacrifices to that exacting deity, Fashion. In fact, we know of one impatient little hussy who, unwilling to bide her mother's time, actually dropped the stocking she was darning, and with the great needle deliberately pierced holes in her ears, and left in each a string of yarn to fester and complete the mutilation.

The ordinary process of ear-boring is simple, and seldom either very painful or dangerous, although there are cases recorded of erysipelas and death having followed. The operator, be he jeweler or surgeon, holds a cork firmly against one side of the lobe of the ear, while from the other side he transfixes it with a needle or an awl, as a saddler punches a hole into a leather strap. Then a thread is passed through and left to fester, so that the opening once made may not close again. Familiar as you are with the process, for it is being performed in each day's light of this civilized land, gentle and Christian dames, does not this description of it, when deliberately read, sound like that of the barbarous practice of savages in some far-off country of heathenism?

By hazard we once saw a young girl thus mutilated. She came into a jeweler's shop, clinging to a great blowzy woman bejeweled all over from the lobes of her ears to the tips of her fingers, and her toes too, for what we know. The child was pale, but was biting her lower lip with a spasmodic fixedness of resolution. The operator, a great whiskered fellow, after fumbling about for his tools, finally brought out his awl and cork and began the operation. With the mere touch of the cutting instrument the poor child winced for the first time, and as the man, who was somewhat of a bungler, forced his way boring through the tender flesh, a tear was wrung from each little eye, and drop after drop of blood fell and splashed, making great red stains upon her linen collar. The child only bit lip more firmly, but evidently could hardly restrain herself, and would have cried if her vanity had allowed. The operator coolly wiped his bloody instrument, and the mother merely scolded the child for letting the blood drop upon her collar, and, paying the price of her child's mutilation, walked away still grumbling at the stains.

Mothers will sometimes, when pressed hard to answer for this barbarity, declare that boring the ears is good for the eyes. This is a vulgar error, and only worthy of a greasy ship's cook or ignorant Maltese sailor, who wears earrings, as he says, for the same reason.

Neither is there beauty or fitness in the practice of hanging the ears with trinkets. The ear was intended to lie half-concealed by the hair, and any thing attached to it brings it into undue prominence. The ear-ring, however precious and pretty in itself, does not add beauty to that rarest of possessions, a small and well-formed ear, while it draws attention to a big oyster-like one, and intensifies its ugliness.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to young Mr. De Boots.

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIEND,—The other evening—say Wednesday of last week—I arrived at the St. Nicholas Hotel in the city of New York, and had the pleasure of entering my name upon the registry just after yours. It was my happiness, also, to be assigned a room next to yours, and when I saw that the accomplished and gentlemanly clerk had made this disposition of me I naturally, and I hope you will concede, innocently, surveyed you. This was for the purpose of determining whether there was any thing in your general appearance suggestive of snoring or somnambulism, or indeed of any tendency to nocturnal disturbance. You and I, in our much and varied travel, have learned, of course, to measure people in some degree by the outside. Our experience has sharpened our wits. I say "our," because although a very young gentleman you had the air of a man who had touched most of the stops of life and—at least in his own estimation, and who, pray, so likely to know so much about it as he?—had very little more to learn. Your costume, I observed, was perfectly comme il faut; the trousers not too much peg-topped; the collar not too long in the points; the scarf modest and the pin likewise. You had the severely indifferent expression for which I have so often remarked young gentlemen toiling, and painfully missing the mark. Now they are too solemn; now too flippant. Their idea of "the English gentleman" is their goal; and they sometimes succeed in resembling the solemn British groom, sometimes the gay British swell. But somehow they do not seem to reproduce the English gentleman, or, indeed, any other.

After the studious glance at you which I have described I suddenly met the friend whom I had come to New York to see, and we dined together and were engaged until a very late hour. Then I went to bed. I was very much fatigued by the long journey, and I was to begin the next day's work betimes. So I reflected gratefully that my neighbor was not of the disturbing kind, blessed my favorable stars and the affable clerk who had allotted me a room next to yours, and then looked under the bed, in a healthy spirit of prudence, lest sneak thieves or worse might be ambushed there. My cousin, the late Mrs. Mimosa, carrying prudence to excess, used, for the same purpose, to look into all the bureau drawers, and then execute a flying leap into bed to baffle any horrible hands that, notwithstanding her careful scrutiny, she could not help feeling might still be thrust forth from somewhere. These ceremonies ended, and my night-cap on, I turned down the gas, tucked myself comfortably in with the coverlet and blankets, laid my weary head upon the pillow with a sigh of real satisfaction, and presently began to drop away delightfully into oblivion.

Suddenly I bounced up—as it were—wide awake. There was a sound of revelry by night. A fine manly voice was singing "Tramp, tramp, tramp," or some military ditty, and a heavy, squeaking tread advanced through the echoing corridor. There was nothing tipsy in the song or the step. It was merely the voice and the walk of a man who was able to pay for his room, and therefore owned the St. Nicholas Hotel. "Tramp, tramp, tramp!" should a man not take his ease in his inn? "Cheer up, comrades," who was to know or think of any body else! "Of the free land in their own dear native home"—five dollars, six dollars a day, I am perfectly able to pay. And so he came along, waking me, probably waking every body else in the passage, so that his merry song was followed by a chorus of curses, or of words more forcible than choice. The singer stopped. He tried his key in a door. It was the next to mine. He opened the door.—My dear young friend, this indignant marauder of the peace of other people must have been you! And he banged the door tremendously; and after a few moments he opened it again, slammed his boots upon the floor, and then banged it to again. I declare that if the innocent and outraged people upon that corridor had arisen as one man, and had seized this nuisance who sang and slammed and banged in a public house at midnight, and had caused him to run the gauntlet of their towels up and down the corridor, it would have been a judgment upon which Justice herself would have smiled.

Were you, Sir, I should like to know, the only person in the hotel who had taken lodgings which he was able to pay for? Was the hotel yours, and the comfort of all the people in it? Had I the right to beat the Devil's tattoo upon your door at three o'clock in the morning? Just as much right as you had to sing and slam and bang by the doors of other people at midnight. In truth, my dear young Mr. De Boots, nothing was more utterly selfish than your conduct. Did you really think that the moderate trowsers and collar and scarf and pin, or the easy indifference of manner, made you a gentleman? A gentleman! Why, you unmasked yourself with a song. You betrayed yourself with a slam. You revealed yourself with a bang. I, your most humble and insignificant servant, whom you would surely despise, and twenty other people, lying snugly in our beds in the dark, and not seeing you nor knowing your name, were perfectly aware that you were not a gentleman.

Think of that! Think that a boor can not pass for a gentleman even when you can not see him! Just as a gentleman can never conceal that he is so. It seems, Mr. De Boots, that we put ourselves into our smallest actions; into the very tones of our voices; into the very squeak of our shoes. If you have read the life of Josiah Quincy, by his son—and if you have done so you have read a most delightful book, and seen a portrait which it will be of the greatest service to you to study—you will remember that he fell in love with his wife from hearing her sing in the next room. Something in the voice touched the precise spot which nothing in the world had ever touched before, and that was the inmost core of his heart. That voice was a celestial way along which his soul slid into the most perfect intimacy with another's. If he had been suddenly taken from the room, and had not seen the singer, but after some years had heard the voice again, do you suppose he would not have recognized it? and that all the time between he would not have known that somewhere in the world there was his bride, and that he had once been near enough to her to hear her sing?

Now, my dear young Mr. De Boots, what do I mean when I say that you are no gentleman? I suppose, when you read this, if you could only get at me, you would bristle and swell, and, despite my white hairs and cravat, you would hand me your card with all the air of your Uncle Wellington, whom I remember to have once seen at the theatre opposite Bond Street, now destroyed, and you would sternly demand satisfaction. Certainly, my dear young friend, I should blandly answer, and certainly I answer now; you shall have satisfaction. I will tell you precisely what I mean when I say that you are no gentleman. I mean that you are selfish; and no selfish person is a gentleman. He may have the finest figure, and make the courtliest bows, and dress in perfect taste, and talk neither too low nor too loud, and be very accomplished and agreeable, dancing as nobody ever danced, and fascinating the whole world; but the moment you have discovered that he is selfish he is as much exposed as a pickpocket caught with his hand in your pocket. The pretty mask drops, and it is a grinning death's-head behind it. Don't you remember the story of the man who consoled with his neighbor about the misfortunes of a poor common friend. "I am so very, very sorry. It is heart-breaking," and he wept plentifully. "Yes, yes," replied the neighbor, whose eyes were perfectly dry; "I know it's bad, and I am very sorry too. I'm sorry a hundred dollars. How much are you sorry?" Now, there is a great deal of manner and dress which serve with many people as the sign of a gentleman. But when the pinch comes which neither dress nor manner can satisfy, which demands generosity, and thoughtfulness of others, and real self-sacrifice, then you discover exactly how much of a gentleman it is.

Are the French a remarkably polite nation? Perhaps so. But how about the true gentility—the essential gentleness of heart and soul which are the substance of the matter? I have seen many and many a Frenchman who had the gentlemanly manner and dress, sitting in a good seat at the opera or theatre, and I have also seen women, old and young, standing during the whole evening by his side. The price of his seat was five francs—his gentility or gentlemanhood was not worth quite so much. Now, Mr. De Boots, don't tell me that a man does not buy seats at the opera for people who don't buy them, and who come late; and don't say that no man of sense ever allows himself to be sponged upon. I am speaking of gentlemanliness, and I say that no gentleman is a selfish man. And I declare, and I defy you, Mr. De Boots, or any of your family to deny, that it is selfish for a strong man to sit for a whole evening in a comfortable chair while a woman stands beside him.

Mr. De Boots, will you please to make the application of this sermon? You are constantly at all the hotels, and I assert that when you come romping through the corridor, knowing that on each side are people asleep, and you don't know how many sick people and infants among them; and when you slam your boots, and bang your door, and whistle and sing as if you were alone in a wilderness, you are a selfish man however finely dressed and soft-mannered, and being selfish you are not a gentleman. I know it is not easy to define the word. There have been books written about it. It is used to express the very flower and culmination of human character. I know you may ask me if a dirty, ill-mannered lout of a friar, who carries vermin in his rags, and has not washed himself for a month, but who is utterly unselfish, is a gentleman. And I reply that a clean, well-mannered, graceful young person whose clothes are all in the last fashion, and who bathes every morning in perfumed water, and who is selfish, is not a gentleman. But if he be unselfish, and have in addition all the charms of cleanliness and good taste, then he is the very model of a gentleman.

I do not hesitate to say that you will find it to your advantage to reflect upon these suggestions. You are a very promising young man, and I am very glad to do what I can to help you fulfill your promise. You need not indignantly send me your card and your defiance, for that would only prove to me that I ought to write you another letter. On the contrary, my dear Mr. De Boots, you should perceive that I am

Your sincere Friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CLOAKINGS.

AMONG cloakings the standard cloth is smooth beaver. Tricot beaver, with a scarcely perceptible rib, is a handsome material, and admits of elaborate trimming. Chinchilla beaver, gray and black, is a serviceable article, suitable for traveling cloaks. It is sold at ten dollars a yard. Velours is a light material used for fall garments. In shaggy cloths we have the Astrakhan of last winter, an excellent imitation of the lambskin, with short, knobby tufts, black and white mixed, and plain black or white, a yard and a half wide, sold at fifteen dollars a yard. Seal skin is among the novelties of the season. The real article is very expensive; but there is an imitation that can scarcely be told from the genuine, sold at fourteen dollars a yard. The Alpine and camels'-hair cloths are beautifully fine and soft, and make elegant evening wrappers. The original camels'-hair is pure white, but there are now scarlet grounds, with a long white silky fleece, or striped blue and white, or gilt and black. Plush is brought out in great variety, and is really becoming a formidable rival to velvet. It is in all colors; brown, purple, and dark-blue are the favorites, as they are in all wrappings. The plain colors vary in price from five to twenty dollars a yard. One pattern, an imitation of ermine—white, with black tufts—is sold at twelve dollars. Another, at ten dollars, is shot with silk, and has large mauve and blue spots. Scarlet chinchilla beaver is used for extra carriage-wraps. A beautiful cloth, thick and warm, is made of the fleece of the Angora goat. Lamb's-wool, an inch thick, is sold at eight dollars, double fold. These cloths are expensive, but they are nearly all a yard and a half or two yards wide, hence it does not take many yards to make a cloak.

Colored velvets are very much worn in Paris. The preference here still continues in favor of black, though a few colored cloaks—blue, purple, and Bismarck—are worn. Eighteen and twenty dollars a yard is asked for the colored Lyons velvets, while black varies in price from ten dollars to fifty. That at ten dollars is twenty-eight inches wide, the fifty-dollar article is full two yards wide. Velvet with a silk finish is sold at three dollars and a half.

MODES.

It is scarcely possible to find two cloaks alike, yet radically there is but little difference. The great variety is in the trimming. The gored sacque is the standard shape, longer and looser than those of last season, but not so decidedly altered in this respect as we were led to believe. Most of the added length claimed for the new styles is found in the scarf-like mantilla front. The peplum points on the side have disappeared, but there are occasionally long square tabs under the arms, that make the cloak retain something of the appearance of a peplum. Circulars are seldom seen; a few large talmas are brought out, as some ladies always prefer them.

The bottom of the sacque is cut into dents of every conceivable shape—squares, tabs, pendants, and castellated points. Many ladies are reluctant to have handsome material cut up in this reckless manner, and have instead satin vandykes bound or piped and sewn on the plain edge of the sacque. Another plan is to arrange the passementerie to simulate squares and points. This is quite stylish, and wears better; the indented edges curl up, and are apt to be frayed and jagged before the season is half over.

Another part of the cloak which admits of great variety is the sleeve. The choice lies between the coat sleeve, the flowing sleeve, and a medium between the two, or a combination of both. All are admissible, and the decision is left to the taste or convenience of the wearer. There is a sleeve that folds up inside of the arm, protecting it like a coat sleeve, while on the outside it is cut into a pointed fall that perfectly simulates a flowing sleeve, most admirably combining style and comfort. Pockets are frequently concealed in the long tabs and trimmings instead of being placed in conspicuous positions. Sashes sewn in with the side-seams are tied loosely behind with broad flowing ends. Rosettes, tassels, and fringes adorn the pointed ends of the sash.

THE REDINGOTE AND KILLARNEY.

A novelty among fall wrappings is the long, redingote, which resembles the old-fashioned great-coat without its cape, but with a rolling collar and worn with a vest. It is buttoned all the way down before.

The Killarney cloak in brown water-proof is an agreeable change from the monotonous black and gray. It is quite long, with sleeves and a cape which can be worn with or without the cloak, and is fastened by a cord passing through the trimming. A snap fastening allows the cape to be easily removed.

Burnouses are again worn. They are usually in Scotch plaids, and we have seen some in gray and Bismarck cashmere with palm-leaf borders.

Plush is a favorite material for autumn. It is made up in short loose paletots and in tight-fitting jackets. Large buttons and a cable cord at the edge are the only trimming.

EMBROIDERY.

Embroidery in silk, chenille, and jet is used in lavish profusion. The original fabric of the cloak is sometimes a matter of conjecture, so heavily is it laden with needle-work. The Oriental and Jardiniere patterns in several colors, with jet and amber beads intermingled, are not so popular as plain black, or any one subdued color in all its different shades. The eye soon wearies of the conspicuous patterns, and the fashion will scarcely be permanent. In view of this a good plan is to have bands of satin needle-worked and sewn lightly on the cloak, removing it at pleasure, and without destroying the pile of the material.

LACE, ROULEAUX, APPLIQUE, ETC.

Lace is the most elegant garniture of velvet cloaks. Barbs are sewn down the seams, and wide flounces on the skirt. Thread is the favorite lace; guipure has lost favor. Rouleaux of satin, made by braiding together narrow pipings, are much used. Many imported cloaks, both cloth and velvet, are trimmed with silk braid an inch in width. An appliqué trimming of vines, with large leaves, is very handsome. On smooth cloths the appliqué is of velvet, or of Astrakhan fur; gros grain is used on materials with heavy pile. An elegant velvet sacque has a novel trimming of this kind: satin cut into long pea-pods, represented as just bursting open, with rows of silk buttons inside for peas. Chinchilla fur and plush trim velvet handsomely for midwinter. There are several different kinds of fringe—ball fringe, crocheted, moss, knotted, twisted, corded, and beaded fringe. Almost every garment has some part of it ornamented by one of these varieties. Buttons are still large, and are of crocheted silk, jet or gilt. Cable cords and camels'-hair fringe are the only trimming suitable for the shaggy cloths. It is not an offense against good taste to trim opera cloaks in the most gorgeous manner; hence embroidery in brilliant colors, and bullion braids and fringes, are appropriate for the trimming of evening wraps.

SPECIMENS.

A regal garment of black velvet, called the Marie Antoinette, has a mantilla front cut in long tabs. The paletot gradually shortens at the sides and back. Long opera sleeves are cut as a part of the back of the cloak. There are smaller sleeves that can be removed at pleasure. Rouleaux of black satin begin at the back and wind down the entire length of the sleeve. The front is encircled by three similar rouleaux. A fringe of bugles and twisted silk completes the elaborate trimming.

A short sacque from the French Exposition, called the Duchesse, is of royal purple velvet, trimmed with a passementerie of gilt braid and amber beads. A wide gilt fringe is sewn around the bottom. The excess of ornament on this showy garment makes it heavy and cumbersome to the wearer. The price is two hundred and fifty dollars.

A Bismarck beaver, distinguished as the Hernani, has no gores, and is slashed at the sides. Two pointed streamers conceal the slashes, making the cloak longer at the sides than behind. It is cut out in sharp vandykes round the bottom and has wide flowing sleeves, pointed and trimmed with three folds of silk a darker brown than the cloth. Another, a cuir-colored shaggy cloth, has the bottom scalloped and bound, and beneath it appears a row of black velvet scallops, giving the appearance of two garments. An appliqué figure in velvet trims the sleeves and back of the cloak.

A circular garment of blue velvet is embroidered in bright colors and lined with plush. A deep chenille fringe with gilt drops at the end finishes the bottom. An opera cloak of white velvet cloth, called the Imperatrice, has the effect of a full circular, but is cut in three pieces, the back coming forward to overlap the front on the shoulders and protect the arms. A braiding pattern in gilt and crimson is festooned over each shoulder and down the middle of the back, and the bottom is trimmed with crimson and white fringe.

Another evening cloak is reversible, white velvet cloth on one side and scarlet plush on the other. A carriage sacque of scarlet chinchilla is double-breasted, rounded out in front with a row of gilt buttons on the left side, and none in the centre.

A black velvet-gored paletot, the Dagmar, is deeply pointed and trimmed with a thread-lace flounce. Small coat sleeve. An invisible blue cloth has the skirt cut into long tabs and trimmed with flat braid an inch wide. A sash of the cloth, pointed and tasseled, hangs in a loose knot.

VARIETIES.

Bonnets of Bismarck should be relieved by a face trimming of a becoming shade, as no color is so trying to the complexion as the reddish-brown now worn.

An elegant bonnet of mauve uncut velvet is trimmed with a Spanish scarf of Chantilly lace, which is crossed under the chin and fastened with a jet ornament. A mauve feather tipped with jet is arranged as a face trimming. This is suitable for light mourning.

Shot silks are coming into favor again. A pretty pattern black ground, shot with blue, is reversible, blue shot with black on the other side. Both sides are beautifully wrought up. This silk is three-quarters of a yard wide, and is sold at five dollars a yard.

A novelty just out of the Custom-house is an evening dress of pou-de-soie antique of the delicate neutral tint known as beurre, with moss rose-buds and sprays of lilies of the valley exquisitely wrought in chenille. On half of each width the flowers are very small, while the other half is covered with large clusters.

Another dress of white gros grain is brocaded in a unique pattern, representing the Last Rose of Summer—a rose falling to pieces, the petals strewn about here and there.

A Fanchon of frog green velvet has a row of white daisies arranged as a diadem. A fringe of white marabouts falls over the chignon. The broad velvet strings are lined with white satin, and bordered with blonde lace.

A beret, or round hat, is of Italian straw bound with blue velvet, with a bias velvet quilling surrounding the crown, a bunch of pheasant's plumes on the left, and blue gauze veil.

Circassian ceintures are very much worn. A ribbon belting encircles the waist. Two rings of jet or gilt are attached to the belt, from these falls a chain, in which another ring is placed, and this ring holds the ends of the sash.

Imported walking dresses may be bought with the skirt and paletot ready made and trimmed. Material for the body is furnished.

"Tying the bonnet under the chin" is out of fashion. Bows are dispensed with. Ornaments of jet, pearl, and gilt, or sprays of flowers are used instead. Square veils with long barbes fastened behind are worn with round hats. Lace of the color of the hat is used for trimming.

All cotton goods have declined in price within the past week. Waumutta muslin is retailed at twenty-five cents, New York Mills at twenty-seven. Sprague's prints and Merrimacs sell at twelve and fourteen cents.

PERSONAL.

PETER LORILLARD, Esq., who died a few days ago, left to his heirs $15,000,000. The accumulation of so large a fortune shows how entirely he was "up to rappee;" and that he was as familiar with the virtues of the plant Nicotiana as was that old French ambassador, Nicot, who introduced it into France in 1560. (This paragraph is intended to exhibit the Bazar's graceful manner of combining the "historical" with the "personal.")

The FORSYTH-DENISON nuptials at Columbus, a few days since, at which SHERIDAN, UPTON, SAWTELLE, and others of gory repute, assisted, has imparted great interest to matters of tenderness throughout Ohio. There was much Forsyth at the wedding. First, "TONY" FORSYTH (so called because his name is JAMES A.), who was the groom. He is a major of regulars, SHERIDAN's classmate at the Point, and now his chief of staff. Next, "SANDY" FORSYTH (so called because his name is GEORGE), who is also a major and on SHERIDAN's staff, but no relation to "TONY."

COUNT BISMARCK has given a fresh indication of good sense and knowledge of what the reading people of Prussia will appreciate, by ordering a government translation of Mosby's "Partisan Life," merely by way of educating the Prussian military men in the science of guerrillas—so to speak.

Some of the super-serviceable friends of Mr. DICKENS will smile a grim smile on reading the following paragraph from a private letter of Mr. DICKENS, recently published in the Tribune:

"For twenty years I am perfectly certain that I have never made any allusion to the republication of my books in America other than the good-humored remark, that 'if there had been an international copyright between England and the States I should have been a man of very large fortune instead of a man of moderate savings.' Nor have I ever been such a fool as to charge the absence of international copyright upon individuals. Nor have I been so ungenerous as to disguise or suppress the fact that I have received handsome sums from the HARPERS for advance sheets. When I was in the States I said what I had to say, and there was an end. I am absolutely certain that I have never since expressed myself even with soreness on the subject."

M. JEAN BAPTISTE FOURIER, fine old fellow, has just deceased at the fine old age of ninety-two, and an editor at that! He was once a manufacturer of public opinion in the office of the Journal de Paris. For several years before he "Wrapped the drapery of his couch About him, and laid down to pleasant dreams," his peaceful and ennobling pursuit was dominoes—nothing but dominoes.

Mr. JAMES ROBB, formerly of New Orleans (the gentleman for whom POWERS sculptured the Greek Slave), has been tendered, it is said, the position of Secretary of the Treasury. He is now one of the financial firm of WINSLOW, LANIER, & Co., and is known among his acquaintances as the possessor of an acute and vigorous intellect, combined with culture, refinement, and savoir faire.

Mr. JAMES GALLATIN, President of the National Bank of this city, and son of ALBERT GALLATIN, formerly Secretary of the United States Treasury, has one of the largest and finest private libraries in the country, especially in all that relates to the science of political economy. He is a clear and forcible writer on financial topics, a fluent and vigorous speaker, and an authority in Wall Street. He is one of the executors of the late JOHN JACOB ASTOR. In reply to the inquiry of a friend how he managed to look so young, he said: "The way I have found to be the best is, to make others do my hard work, leaving me only to do the planning."

Miss WORDSWORTH had the rare fortune of being the person for whom Sir WALTER SCOTT wrote his last lines. They were verses written in her album, and will be printed for the first time in the new volume of Moxon's Miniature Poets.

Miss EDMONIA LEWIS, a colored damsel, has achieved success as a sculptor (or travaux) having cut and sent to Boston a bust of Dr. Dio LEWIS, which is pronounced good. She has a good friend and patron in CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN, at Rome. Any person desirous of helping this clever girl can write to her, care of Miss CUSHMAN. Somebody ought to do it. If she should be a success, the American citizen would surely thump his manly heart and speak of it as a grand chose! As an encouragement to do this, we may mention that JAMES SOLOMON, a pure African from the Gold Coast, has just taken a first-class certificate in the Oxford Middle Class examination, and is about to matriculate at the London University.

Miss HANNAH JONES, of Dighton, Massachusetts, is a shining light in the longeval firmament, having tallied ninety-one in life's game, and is bright and lively enough to reckon confidently upon another year's innings. She walks two miles to church every Sunday, regardless of weather. And she's such a spinner! two seven-knot skeins of woolen yarn being her daily "stent." Has always enjoyed good health. Is a persistent reader of publications emanating from Franklin Square; hence the cheery, graceful way in which she grows old.

Hon. JOHN WENTWORTH, of Chicago, has done himself the honor of giving $10,000 to Dartmouth College, by way of acknowledging the "LL.D." honor conferred upon him last summer. Mr. WENTWORTH graduated from that institution in 1836, was born in New Hampshire, and is a direct descendant of that old Governor WENTWORTH who pervaded the Granite State in 1741.

The good and pretty PRINCESS OF WALES is rapidly convalescing, which will be pleasant news to lady readers. At the annual dinner of surgeons, at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, Mr. PAGER, the eminent surgeon, stated that when he left Wiesbaden she was doing very well indeed, though he feared it would be some time before she could return to the discharge of the onerous social duties "connected with her exalted rank and very great popularity."

Miss KEARNEY, daughter of General PHIL KEARNEY, "the American MURAT," has changed her local habitation and her name by becoming the better half of a peevish Norman gentleman, Monsieur DE KERMEZ. A lady critic says "better half" is quite correct as applied to the lady, man being always the "vulgar" fraction.

The ARCHBISHOP of YORK declined to have any thing to do with the Pan-Anglican Council. He is a churchman somewhat of the Tyng sort. A few weeks ago, at a dinner given at Preston, England, he responded to the toast of "the ministers of all denominations," proposed by the Right Hon. J. WILSON PATTER, M.P. The dinner was given by way of properly "inaugurating" a new town-hall. The Duke of Cambridge was the guest of the evening. Must dine in the old country before any thing can be said to be legitimately opened.

"MARK TWAIN," the newspaper man, who went sailing with Captain DREXEL and other good people up the Mediterranean, to Constantinople, and to various other places, thinks there is a great deal of humbug about the delights of the Old World. The Oriental bath at Constantinople, for example, he calls a "malignant swindle," and adds: "The books of travel have shamefully deceived me all these years, but they can never do it more. The narghili, the dervishes, the aromatic coffee, the Turkish bath—these are the things I have accepted and believed in with simple, unquestionable faith from boyhood, and behold, they are the poorest, sickest, wretchedest humbugs the world can produce. Wonders, forsooth! What is Turkish coffee to the coffee at home? What is a narghili to a meerschaum? What is a Turkish bath in Constantinople to a Russian one in New York? What are the dancing dervishes to the negro minstrels? New York has fifty wonders where Constantinople has one."

H. B. CLAPLIN & Co., during the year 1866, sold goods to the amount of $73,000,000—the largest year's business of any wholesale house in the world. On the 23d September, 1865, their sales amounted to $1,000,000. The present firm consists of only three members, H. B. CLAPLIN, EDWARD E. EAMES, and E. W. BANCROFT. In 1866 Mr. CLAPLIN purchased a country-seat adjoining Jerome Park at Fordham, for which he paid $64,000. His town residence is at 41 Pierrepont Street, Brooklyn. Mr. CLAPLIN has a very interesting family of children, and the oldest living son, WILLIAM CLAPLIN, occupies an important position in the store, in charge of one of the principal departments.

The longevity of the learned men of France is remarkable. M. VINET is 89; M. DE SGAUR, 86; DE PONSERVILLE, 76; LEBRUN, 82; VILLEMARIN, 76; LAMBERTINE, 76; FLOURENS, 78; GUZOT, 79; THIERS, 69; BEERYER, 74; DUKE DE BROGLIE, 82. The circumstances most favorable to longevity among brain-workers is the spending a considerable portion of early life in outdoor activity, travel, and the like, and then by a temperate and plain mode of living the brain will work advantageously until past fourscore years.

Mr. E. P. WHIPPLE has done another kindness to the Boston folk by entertaining them with a lecture on "Shoddy—shoddy politicians, generals, writers, etc." His notion is, that "the past has furnished us five generals of the first-class—ALEXANDER, HANNIBAL, CÆSAR, FREDERICK, and NAPOLEON—and our war did not bring out the sixth." He reckons GRANT and SHERMAN among the second-class of generals, with SOPIO, POMPEY, TERENCE, and WELLINGTON, but puts FARRAGUT with "the first and bravest naval officers of the world."

Mr. LEONARD JEROME goes to Europe next month to amuse himself for a year or two. Rather a heavy operation to amuse a gentleman who owns a race-course and racers, keeps a private opera-house, and buys up ten millions of Pacific Mail of a morning! His fine residence opposite Madison Square has been rented to Mr. DAVID CRAWFORD (recently married to Miss TOWNSEND), one of the cleverest and most opulent young gentlemen of Wall Street.

Mrs. JENNY C. WHITE DEL BAL, the wife of Don BERNARDINO DEL BAL, of Santiago de Veraguas, Panama, who has just fallen a victim to yellow-fever, will be mourned by a large circle in this city. She was the daughter of the late Hon. JAMES W. WHITE, of the Superior Court of New York, and of Mrs. RUEDA E. WHITE, who is quoted in Mrs. ELLER's new book as one of the New York queens of society. Mrs. DEL BAL's career has been so remarkable during her brief four years' residence in her South American home, where she was the first American lady, as to have won her the title from the populace of "The Angel of Santiago," and to have led the whole city to regard her death as a public calamity. After the battles of San Brujas and San Francisco, during the late insurrection, she organized the first military hospital in the charge of ladies ever known in those regions, and performed such signal services that General ORTIZ, the leader of the Spanish forces, thanked her publicly in the official gazette, and the Assembly of State voted her the thanks of the nation. She went about every where among the sick and dying, and spared nothing to ameliorate the condition of the people among whom she had been cast. Her charity endeared her to the whole population. At her death all the places of business were closed, and the city was draped in mourning, while in Panama the bells were tolled for her all day by order of the Bishop. She was a lady of rare accomplishments and singular loveliness of character, united with untiring energy, and we seldom have to chronicle a more useful and beautiful life so prematurely brought to a close.

double crochet stitch. The trimming is easily made by tracing the design on tissue paper, basting on the cord, and sewing it fast—taking care, of course, not to let the stitches appear on the right side.

Trimming for Under-Skirts.
This design is very pretty in black worsted braid on colored under-skirts. Two sizes, of different widths, are used. The broad is first sewed on, and laid in a pleat at the corners of the lines. The narrow braid is cut where it passes under the broad trimming, and the edge is fastened beneath the latter.

See illustration, page 36.
FRONT-HAIR slightly crêpéd, and rolled upward over the ear. Back-hair tied high, and arranged with braids, as shown in the illustration.

Style of Hair-Dressing for Middle-Aged Lady.

See illustration, page 36.
FRONT-HAIR slightly crêpéd, and drawn back behind the ear, with the ends fastening under the chignon. Back-hair arranged in a knot, round which a braid is coiled, as seen in the illustration. If the hair is not long enough, rats can be fastened to the ends, and braided in with other hair. A black lace barb is passed over the chignon.

ROSETTE OF CORD AND JET.

Ornamental Cloak-Fastening.
The centre of this fastening consists of a circular piece of thick pasteboard, a little more than one inch in diameter, which is covered with black gros grain silk, and ornamented with two large cut jet beads and a circle of bugles, sewed on in the manner shown in the illustration. Five rows of black soutache are then coiled round the bugles and sewed fast; after which seven pendants are fastened on the bottom. These are easily made of several rows of soutache, sewed together, and trimmed with bugles, with a large cut jet bead at the top of each.

Rosette of Cord and Jet.
For this rosette cover a circular piece of thick card-board, about two inches in diameter, with black silk; sew fine silk cord thereon, in the manner shown in the illustration, and set in the middle a small rosette, with a large cut jet bead in the centre, surrounded with loops of silk cord, passing round smaller beads; after which, set double loops of cord all round the edge, fastening them at the back of the rosette, and finish with jet beads and bugles.

Crochet and Bead Trimming.
This trimming consists of clusters of three leaves, crocheted of black silk, with a large cut jet bead sewed in the centre of each leaf, and three small bugles on the end.

Crochet and Bugle Trimming.
This trimming consists of silk cord, jet beads, and bugles. The heart-shaped figure is crocheted of black silk, in short

CROCHET AND BUGLE TRIMMING.

Gored Piqué Frock.
See illustration, page 36.
The trimming of this pretty little dress consists of circles of the material, looped one within the other, edged with colored serpentine braid, and sewn on a strip of embroidered muslin. The piqué is cut away under the muslin. The dress is fastened all the way down in front with buttons and button-holes. In the middle of the back there is a rosette with two long ends of piqué, edged with red braid. The waistband consists of a strip of piqué, trimmed in the same manner. The dress may equally well be made of merino or cashmere, with silk under the trimming instead of muslin. A frill of needle-work edging is pleated in the neck of the dress. This is a pretty frock for a little girl six years old.

Chest Protector.
See illustration, page 36.
This comfortable article, the pattern of which is given in the Supplement accompanying the present Number, will be found an excellent protection against cold, and is especially useful when worn with cloaks with flowing sleeves. It may be made of the same material as the cloak, from the pieces that will usually be left thereof, or of that of the dress, if preferred. The original is simply stitched round the edge; the sleeves, however, can be trimmed to match the cloak, which makes a very tasteful effect. Care should be taken to cut the sleeves loose enough to pass easily over those of the dress.

TRIMMING FOR UNDER-SKIRT.

ACCEPTING THE SITUATION.

MRS. FASCETT dropped herself on the chip-basket by the stove.

"If I ever saw the best!" said she.

Miss Silence Dummie looked up from the little canary-colored frock she was embroidering, raising her black eyebrows like the top of an interrogation mark, which was a good deal for her to do. So, without waiting for any more positive expression of interest, Mrs. Fascett went on:

"While I was out spreading that last batch of berries to dry I heard the sound of a horse's hoofs coming over the covered bridge; and says I to myself, says I, I'll just happen down to the cucumber vines and see if there are any cucumbers big enough to pickle (I knew there wasn't well as I wanted to, for John he picked them last night, and John is always pretty thorough about what he sets out to do). But I went and stood there fumbling among the vines just in time to see such a sight as was never seen in Meadows before."

Possibly Miss Dummie's curiosity was not very lively, for Mrs. Fascett was always seeing wonderful and unprecedented sights, but the interrogation mark on her face lengthened and deepened sensibly; and Mrs. Fascett, rubbing her nose up and down as though it was a pump-handle, went on:

"Just as sure as you sit in that chair, Miss Dummie, it was Isabel Hubbythorne riding with Mr. Hamilton, and not three months since Mrs. Hamilton was around as well as any of us are today! No, it isn't three months, for it is scarcely two months since she was buried. I know you can't never tell where to find these men-people; but I wouldn't have thought Isabel Hubbythorne would do such a thing, if it was only for the speech of people. I did think she was a girl of more propriety and good taste. Now, didn't you, Miss Silence?"

Miss Silence Dummie was something like a funnel—excellent to pour into, but quite unsatisfactory to dip from; she listened patiently to whatever one was pleased to tell her, and then that was the end of the conversation. So now, her object in life apparently being "how not to" say it, she replied, "Isabel Hubbythorne and Calvin Hamilton! I want to know!" And then she took a fresh piece of braid and began embroidering it upon the gay merino for the little Fascetts, who were cooking mud-cakes in a sand-oven behind the house, as complacently as though there was nothing more which could be said.

"Well, well; but this isn't making my pies, is it?" exclaimed Mrs. Fascett, lifting herself up by bracing her hands against the basket-handles, and going into the buttery, rolling up her sleeves as she went. On the way she stopped to look at the long trail of black grape-vines Miss Dummie had already left behind her busy fingers on the yellow cloth. "That will smarten up the little tykes. I do like to see them look spry," said Mrs. Fascett, who had an eye for color.

She had a palate as well as an eye, so she asked her pie-crust, and brought pans of cinnamon-rolls and sugar-gingerbread into being, talking away meantime as though her tongue was the motive-power her hands depended on; and Miss Silence stitched and stitched like an improved Wheeler and Wilson (that is, a perfectly noiseless one); while Miss Isabel Hubbythorne, in quite another part of the village, sat on the foot of her sister's bed and worried.

"Now, you needn't laugh at me, Clara. I can take a joke as well as any body as a general thing, but in such a case as this it is different; it seems sacrilegious. Calvin is a clear-headed man, and he ought to have known better than to ask me to ride; but what could I do? He knows I am not well, and am particularly fond of riding, and was always in the habit of going with him and Julia. And, I suppose, he can't see why he shouldn't treat me the same as ever. But he has no more idea of anything serious than an unweaned baby, and I wouldn't give occasion for a slighting remark on any consideration. I am actually distressed, for what can I do if he asks me again? How can I refuse without wounding his feelings? I've a great mind to tell him candidly I do not think it is proper; but do you suppose I could get up the courage? It would reflect so on his discernment. It would be a delicate matter. Now, don't laugh at me, or I am afraid I shall take dislike to the man, and that would be a pity, for he is a person I value as a friend. I shan't like it if you make fun of me, I say. Now, stop it!"

"I am not laughing at you, Isabel. Look behind you," replied Clara.

So Isabel looked, and saw the stout figure of her brother-in-law, Clara's husband, who supposed he had a right to go wherever Clara went, standing in the door listening to Isabel's perplexity with his great man's ears and his small man's sympathies.

"Why, bless you!" he cried, in rough man-fashion, "I know what you'd either one of you do—demurely get into the wagon. I know you women as well as though I had made you."

Great, complacent, foolish man! Isabel didn't get into the wagon the next time Calvin Hamilton asked her, though the wagon was an elegant carriage, and the horse was a—span. No, she was so insensible she never budged an inch, and so ungrateful that she said she'd rather not. There's self-denial for you! She refused also to take the place of his dead Julia, although he begged her with tears in his honest blue eyes.

And so he married the Widow Chaney, and dropped out of our story.

But before six months was over Mrs. Fascett had seen another sight.

"Fascett," said she to her husband, "what do you think I saw down in the south spring pasture?"

Mrs. Fascett's husband was a man very tall of his age, and very thin for his height, with a face about as animated and full of expression as a slice of boiled pork, and eyes like a piece of light-blue glass.

"I don't know," said he. He usually didn't know; but then his wife could always tell him, so it did not make much difference.

"Fascett, as sure as you are sitting in that chair" (this was Mrs. Fascett's customary form of adjuration), "with these two eyes I saw James Hamilton sitting on a maple log, swinging his foot and chewing a shaving, and Isabel Hubbythorne sitting on the other end of the self-same log."

"Did you hear what they were talking on?" asked Mrs. Fascett's husband, his eyes trying to sparkle, and looking as animated as beads in the sunlight.

"Of course not! Do you think I would demean myself to be around harking, Fascett?" returned his wife, virtuously. "There wasn't any need of it this time, to be sure, for James showed in the very crook of his elbow just what he was saying, and Isabel she showed she was saying 'No' to it. It stood out all around them both as plain to see as fog over a brook."

"Sho!" replied Mrs. Fascett's husband.

And "sho" it was.

"I have never suspected you could have such an idea, Jamie. I have often said your family come next to my cousins—and with me my cousins come next to my brothers and sisters—but I have never thought of your being any nearer. I am so sorry," said Isabel from her end of the log.

"Then, take a little time to think. Don't answer me now," pleaded Jamie, eagerly.

"Time would make no difference with my answer. I shall always say the same," replied Isabel, decidedly.

And simple Jamie took her at her word, ignorant that patient continuance will worry nineteen girls out of twenty into any sort of alliance or misalliance, and I dare say the twentieth as well if the patience is continuous enough.

So they left the log, and went their ways, farther and farther from each other. Jamie sighed a few days and nights like a pine-tree on a hill—a cheerful sound at all times, and one suited to make a melancholy-minded person fit to jump into the well. He really thought the sky had fallen, but it proved to be only a rose-leaf; and after a while the stars began to twinkle again just as much like diamonds as ever.

By that time, though, it was a full year, and Jamie's brother, Horatio, had come home from Oregon.

And what did Horatio do, but straightway follow in the footprints of his brothers.

"I guess," said Mrs. Fascett, "whether or no Isabel Hubbythorne and Horatio Hamilton won't make a match of it. Horatio is pretty wide awake, but I don't reckon that will hurt him any for Isabel, and I guess that will be a match. To my certain knowledge they have rid out together. I happened, as good luck would have it, to be picking dandelion-greens for dinner—Fascett, he's great on dandelion-greens—and hearing voices, I makes it in my way to go to the brow of the hill, where I could overlook the road; when lo and behold! as sure as you are sitting in that chair, there they was a-riding along as chipper as a pair of robins: Isabel on a white horse, and decked out like a poppet; and Horatio riding a black, coltish-looking horse. They must have been stable teams, for I didn't know either one of them; they wa'n't Hamilton's horses, nor they wa'n't Hubbythorne's."

"I want to know!" replied Miss Silence Dummie, who was trimming a hat for Mrs. Fascett with black velvet and scarlet pepper-pods.

"Yes. And I guess whether or no there won't be a wedding up to Squire Hubbythorne's come next Thanksgiving-time, if not before. They will make great doings, and invite from far and from near, you may be sure of that; for Hubbythorne's folks aren't of the kind that stops to pinch a sixpence. When they lay out to do any thing they do it without standing for the cost, now I tell you."

"Surely," replied Miss Dummie.

But it is to be hoped Mrs. Fascett did not buy her green gown, for there was no wedding at Hubbythorne's after all.

"I don't know for why it fell through. They would have made such a handsome couple," said she, regretfully.

"I wish Isabella could feel to marry one of my boys!" sighed Mrs. Hamilton, with tears in her motherly eyes, to Mrs. Hubbythorne, as they met on the church-steps before service.

Mrs. Hubbythorne joined softly in the sigh. "I don't know why it is, but Isabel doesn't seem to be one of the marrying kind," said she, apologetically.

Deluded woman! This shows that even mothers do not know every thing.

Horatio went back West, and next that was known of him he had married a Cuban lady at San Francisco, and thus was out of the way and out of the question.

But behold all this time there was belonging to the Hamiltons another brother, "a little one," the youngest, Frederic. He had been an invalid in his earlier years—weak lungs or something—and so was rather counted out; but still there he was; and one day when Isabel Hubbythorne was out in the rock pasture, half-way between her father's and Mr. Hamilton's houses, picking blackberries, suddenly she looked up and he stood before her just as though he had been a brier all along, and she was the princess who turned him into a man at her touch.

"Why, Frederic Hamilton, I thought you were in Labrador!" said she, without so much as winking.

"So I was," replied Frederic.

"How well you look!" said Isabel, next.

"My mother used to think so," answered Frederic.

And then the ball began to roll.

Frederic Hamilton was a little wiser in his generation than his elder brothers. He did not begin his suit so early, but he persisted in it longer. Like Mary's lamb,

"Every where that" Isabel "went"

Frederic "was sure to go;"

and every time Isabel happened to look at Frederic she caught him hastily turning his eyes away from her. So surely that presently she felt impelled by magnetism or by curiosity to look again at him, always finding his eyes just leaving hers quickly and consciously. So she could not keep him out of her mind altogether, though he never seemed to intrude himself into it. Always meeting her at every social gathering there was naturally now and then a time when Isabel had no especial attendant, and on such occasions Frederic walked home with her in an informal, matter-of-course way. He also lent her books, and sent her flowers enough to cover the Babes in the Wood half a mile deep.

So, little by little, as continual dropping wears away a stone, Isabel's hard heart had become honey-combed through and through, when one day, blackberries being ripe once more, Isabel and Frederic met again in the rock pasture.

First, like Maud Muller and the Judge, they "Spoke of the grass and flowers and trees,

Of the singing birds and humming bees."

And then of a sudden Frederic's eyes put on the grave, tender expression Isabel thought so becoming to them, and he said, "I am glad, Bel, you refused to marry my brothers."

"Why?" asked Bel, beginning to pick leaves instead of berries, while a peony sprang into full bloom on each cheek, and her eyes fell as suddenly as though they were nails and Frederic's were hammers.

"Because I want you myself," replied Frederic, as assured as though one was enough to make any bargain.

For a minute there was no sound under the blue sky but a crow's voice crying, "La! la! la!" and the measured beating of a flail in somebody's barn like the throbbing of a great heart; then Isabel without looking up said, making a deep sigh, "If I must marry one of you Hamiltons why I suppose I must; and I would rather it were you than any other one."

So, as true as you are sitting in that chair, there was a wedding at the Hubbythornes at last, with grandeur and style enough to satisfy Mrs. Fascett, and with Silence Dummie to cut the cake.

"To be sure! And there they are, Isabel and Frederic, settled, after all her ups and downs and all his wanderings, over to Holden—which is right at home as you may say—in as pretty a house as you could ask to see; all fitted up as handy as a work-box without and within, and with a burying-ground joining right on to the home lot," said Mrs. Fascett.

LOVE'S QUANDARY.

I move in an orbit of maidens,
A fair little circle of wiles,
And each is distinct from the others,
Yet all are alike in their smiles.

They are beautiful, too, and endearing,
And one is a model of grace,
And one is a statue of Patience,
And one is a dancer of praise,

And one is a fairy of fashion,
And one is a bonny wee pet,
And one is a siren at singing,
And one is a laughing brunette.

And I've puzzled me long to determine
Which of all is most fit for a wife;
But the labor is out of my station,
I can not divine for my life.

Alas for the fortune that's human,
Each one seems to hold me at call!
Oh, I wish that I were a born Mormon,
For then I might marry them all!

THE LATEST NEWS FROM JAPAN.

HARPER'S BAZAR has received intelligence of a startling nature from its Own Correspondent in Japan. The news, which can not fail to interest the entire American people, was forwarded by relays of men, traveling with the utmost dispatch and secrecy, to a British steamer, the only vessel just about to sail, and telegraphed from London, as we scarcely need say, at a fabulous cost: and the Bazar takes pleasure in assuring its readers that its intention is to please and instruct, at any expense; and that if the latest news from Saturn should become a necessity of the age, its managers are quite ready to contract for an air-line to that planet.

As has been said, the dispatch of our correspondent contains startling matter. On the 1st of September, early in the morning, the American Consul was informed that a deputation of the Governors of Foreign Affairs was waiting below at his door. A deputation of any thing is sure to be imposing in Japan. No officer of noticeable rank stirs abroad except in his norimon, a sort of swinging baby-house, with cushions, carried by four stout bearers a foot or so above the ground. Around the norimon walk the retainers that form his body-guard, carrying spears and pennons with their master's crest. After it comes the horse, which he never rides; a line of trunks filled with baggage, and the umbrella-carriers and other servants; and in this case you are to multiply it all by six. Six Governors of Foreign Affairs, in six norimons, each with four bearers, six led horses, six bodyguards, six sets of trunks (as if each official intended to spend six weeks with the American Consul), six fag-ends of six processions, spears, pennons, and the umbrellas. Furthermore, the Consul had received no previous notice of this visit, although the Japanese have the most tedious etiquette in the world. Yet more surprising, it was clear that the Governors were about to wait on the Tycoon. They were in court-dress. Each had his papier-mache cap, his surcoat with gauze wings, and those unconscionable trailing silk trousers, from which it is supposed that our ladies have borrowed a hint about trails, and they came to desire the Consul to wait at once on the Tycoon; although on his previous visits it had required days only to arrange the ceremony of his presentation. The Consul was not slow to surmise that these violations of an etiquette which is a part of their government denoted some urgent pressure, of what nature it was not so easy to decide. He remarked, as he rode through the lower part of the town, that, in place of the usual jostling crowd of porters, norimons, and foot-passengers, the streets presented an almost deserted aspect, and the few who were to be seen were gathered about the bath and tea houses, with the air of men discussing some exciting question; while in the official quarter, in which stands the castle of the Tycoon, surrounded by those of his nobles, were unmistakable evidences of hurry and alarm. These castles crown the hills, which cut the beautiful city of Yeddo, as it were, in two. In the centre is the residence of the Tycoon, surrounded by three great moats. Between these circle the palaces of the Daimios, with superb gateways, flanked on either side by buildings that often extend for a quarter of a mile, and with a back-ground of gardens, trees, and parade-grounds, that give them the air of royal residences. A broad road winds in among them, bounded on one hand by these palaces, and on the other by the deep moat, filled with thousands of wild-fowl, and shaded by noble trees; and there is many an enchanting turn, where the eye is delighted with a valley of temples, parks, shops, dwellings, and gardens—twenty miles of city, in fact—from which superb roads lead out in every direction into a fertile country, a mountain land of palaces; and beyond and around all the sea.

Now, however, the stately quiet of this precinct was invaded by a subdued clang and murmur, as if its thousands of retainers were getting under arms. From many of the imposing gateways poured long trains of attendants, hurrying with their masters toward the Tycoon's palace; and, arrived there, the Consul was hurried at once into the august presence, without any of the forms and delays so rigorously exacted on former visits. The Consul augured nothing less than an invasion, a revolution, or a declaration of war on his government, and only prayed to be equal to the occasion. The ordinary salutations over, the Tycoon signed to the interpreter. The Consul was all attention. The interpreter began. The Consul listened breathlessly. The interpreter said that "The Master of the World desired to know from the Consul the true meaning of the two words—Irish Girls."

I have seen a mother, who had been inconsolable about some missing urchin, spank said urchin soundly on his coming comfortably home without a broken neck. Some such revulsion of feeling the Consul experienced. He was relieved; but he could not help a gentle indignation that there should be no crisis; no invasion; no declaration of war. He answered the question curtly. The interpreter persisted. What were "Irish Girls?" What were their numbers? In what estimation were they held? Incredulity and surprise at his replies were in every face. He was asked to define the word government; required to explain the American form of government; questioned and questioned about the "actual ruler of the American people." The officials consulted in a low voice together and produced a paper, remarking, significantly, that the original was before the Mikado. This paper was headed by a drawing, which was given the Consul to examine, the written characters having first been folded away. The Consul examined it carefully, seeing all the while through his eyelashes that the Japanese were of the opinion that they had caught him. The drawing was of the Japanese school; but in the close, mutton-chop whisker, hat and band, livery coat, and mingled servility and impudence of the masculine figure, who could help recognizing somebody's coachman? while the wide mouth, pugnacious nose, and stiff hoop proclaimed with equal clearness that Bridget was his companion.

Examining the drawing, and turning it from side to side, under the attentive scrutiny of the Tycoon, the Consul felt like a physician called up at dead of night to prescribe for a cut finger. Here was the Tycoon, and the great nobles of his court, looking sagacious and diplomatic over a rough sketch of somebody's coachman, as aforesaid, and an Irish cook! Life is tolerably monotonous in Japan, and the Consul would have been glad to look as wise as any of them; but Bridget's nose was too much for him, and a very perceptible smile struggled about the corners of his mouth.

The ministers once more consulted together, and the interpreter was commanded to read aloud the paper thus strangely headed, the ministers meanwhile keeping strict eye on the Consul. It was written by one Daigaku No Kami, sent by the Mikado on a secret mission to the United States, and gave account of an association styling itself the Secret Springs.

The interpreter stopped here, and every one looked at the Consul.

"Very odd," said the Consul. "Never heard of such an association." The interpreter continued. The association met in a dew-drop (Dew-drop Inn?). The president and vice-president were named James Riley and Margaret M'Manus, and their portraits were given above. The "Secret Springs" were mostly bounceable women, and very enthusiastic at the meeting attended by Daigaku No Kami. The president addressed the members, and as his speech embodied the policy of the order, which, as Daigaku No Kami's experience had convinced him, was the governing order of the United States, he (Daigaku) had obtained a copy, and now forwarded it entire for the Mikado's consideration.

SPEECH OF PRESIDENT JAMES RILEY.

Copied by the American Consul at Yeddo, from the Japanese Version, and forwarded to Harper's Bazar, regardless of expense.

"LADIES AND JINTHELEMIN.—As the prisindint of this sosity, I has the objecks of this sosity continally on my mind. I asks meself, as every Sakrit Shpring shoold ask his or hursilf, what are the objecks of this sosity? And I ansurs meself, to be the Sakrit Shprings of power in a kunthry in which power is lying around loose. I asks meself has we enny of this power? And I ansurs meself, as evry Sakrit Shpring may proudly ansur his or hursilf, we has, in a jinrul way. We has the bricks, and morthor, and timbers, and men, and ground; and the intenshun of this sosity is to build it up in a edifise as will be a credit to Erin-go-bragh. [Applause.]

"I asks meself then, ladies and jinthlemin, is this a rasunabul objeck? Is this a objeck that will wash? and I sets the posishun before meself as bekums the prisindint of your sosity. Here is Erin on fut, with her pipe and shillalah, and divil a sint to the fore. Here is Jonathan with his feet up. He haz whipped himsilf, ladies and jinthlemin, and whin a man can do that he's ready for the rest of the world.

"Thin how is Erin to git Jonathan's chair from undher him?

"That is the question, and I asks it to meself continally, till I has lost my appytite and taken to abstracshun. I asks you, ladies and jinthlemin, that question, and where to find the ansur to that question, and I reads the ansur in thunder tones in your intellijint countenances—in history. Things are much of a muchness, sez you. The patters of things was pretty much all cut out in the beginning, and what we call new is jist a old style, laid aside and got dusty.

"Therefore the prisindint of your sosity has studdid history till he has forgot the horses, and masher has sworn awful, and what has he found?—for I scorns to linger on me private griefs. Why that history is jist a rotashun of crops. There was the giants, when they got as bad as they cood be, the Jews cum in and smashed thim. There was the Egipshuns went on like two-forty, till the Shephard Kings smashed thim. There was the Romans, as was like the Yankees, only twice as much more, and didn't brag so, and their turn cum too; and sez I what hazz bin done can be done agin, and whin a nation gits saucy thin is the time to trip him up.

"Then I sez to meself, since sich things can be done, are we the ones to do thim? I leaves the ansur to you agin, ladies and jinthlemin, and I hears it before you open your lips. Show me the man that is niver out of a dhrop, or a tear for his friend, or a blow for his inimy, and I'll show you an Irishman [Great applause]; and show me the wimmin that can hold a candle to ours"—[Frantic applause, in which the rest of the sentence was lost.]

"Ladies and jinthlemin," continued the President, when he could once more be heard, "our next question is, hazz we commised to bring about our objeck, and I ansur proudly that the prisindint of this sosity thinks we has. I luks about me, and I sees thim brown-stun houses. I sees the water brought in the rooms, and the oil-cloth on the kitchen, and the stashunery tubs. What for is that oil-cloth, and thim stashunery tubs? Because the American woman wants thim? An American lady as is worth the name would not be seen in her kitchen. They are there because the Irish girls will have thim; and I sez to meself, we makes thim build thim pretty much as we likes, and that is power. I looks about, and I sees three Irish girls adoin the work of one, and eatin for six, and I sez, there's power again, and a spoilin of the Egipshuns. I sees men as is great down town, reglar hundred-pounders, gittin up, whin I'm havin my sikind nap, diggin all day to make both inds meet, snubbin their wives because they don't meet, and a sayin, 'You must stop this here operoor-cloak and diamund business,' whin bless you, it is in the kitchen the candle is burnin, Molly givin out the bread, and Ellen givin out the coals, and cook gittin up double dinners, and keepin the best for down stairs, and Pat with his own key to the wine-cellar, and all a breakin, and smashin, and tearin; and sez I, 'Be jabbers! here's power, whin we keeps a man like that with his nose to the grindstone.'

"I luks agin, and I sees families comin in from the kunthry. They likes the kunthry, but the girls won't stay there; and sez I, 'Hurray for the girls!' I looks agin, and I sees thim boardin because they can't live with girls, and they can't keep house without thim, and sez I, 'here's power agin.' I looks in the Magazeens, and they're all abusin us, and plannin how to do without us. That's famous! I listens at the door, and all the ladies' talk is about us. I takes up Harper's Bazar, and the first thing I reads, that an intillijint jinthlemin from furrin parts has been lookin round the kunthry for the guv'nment, and where do you think he found it? In Congress? No. In the aristokrisy? No. Among the Irish girls." [Great applause, and three cheers for the "intillijint furrin jinthlemin."]

"This is fame," pursued the president; "this is confurpashun. We are reknized by the first unpredjidid man that cums among us, as carryin out our objeck. But this is not all that remains for us as 'Sakrit Shprings.' We want a motter and a polisy. Your prisindint has selektid a motter."

"Never lose nothing for want of tryin to get it.' Let ivry 'Sakrit Shpring' keep this butifal and appropriyt motter in mind, and act up to it." [Enthusiasm and cries of "We will!"]

"Your prisindint has also selektid a polisy," pursued Mr. Riley, with modest dignity; "not as out of his speshul merits, but because the horses must always have a guidin hand. There's hardly a house in the Union that hasn't a Irish girl into it. There's hundreds of Irish hands on every leg of that there chair of Jonathan's. What we want now is a long pull, and a pull all together in jinrul. Kape your ears butthund back while I giv you a few hints in pertickler.

"There's two kinds of girls, in my judgment—the bhrakers-in and the tranur. The bhrakers-in is jinrully in the offices and the advertizmunt, and there goes about fore of them to wun lady. There's the girl as cums home, luks about her, and sniffs, and gits took sick in the middle of the wash, and goes. There's the girl as puts the bread away in the soap-grease, and uses the table-cloths to wash the floor, and niver washes the ghridiron or her face, till the mistrhiss sends her packin. There's the girl as bhrakes all the dishes, and puts saleratus on the beef-steak, and gets dhruunk, and refusiz to go, and hazz to be carried out by the head and shoulders. There is the girl as is a trazhure for a week and a half, and then sauces the mistrhiss to be sent off with her month's wages, and abuses the family till they pays her to get red of her, and sets all the neighbors a-talkin. The girls hazz a good time a-roamin from place to place, like a butterfly, and a-seeing life and studyin character; and I call thim bhrakers-in, for by that time the lady's sperrit is bhroken, if she ain't uncommon, and she's ready to be thankful for a tranur.

"The tranur, ladies and jinthlemin, is the girl that some of her friends rekuminds, and that has lived two years in her last place. She don't make coffee very badly, or alwiz burn the beef-steak. She irons some of the clothes pretty well, and she is often good-natured. She don't get dhruunk, and she isn't often saucy. She won't have the childers in the kitchen, and snubs thim wherever she sees thim; but the childers are told not to ansur back, as they might get some one worse. She expects the mistrhiss to kape another girl, or to do two-thirds of the work hersilf; and the mistrhiss does it; for she is bhroken in. The tranur is opposed to company, and has jinrully to be appazed by a prizint for every guest. She is hard to suit, and complanes of the house, and turns up her nose at the style of livin. By degrees the family gits to dread a certain look about her mouth and eyes, and thim the tranur has them all under her thumb, till the childers come down with scallatina, when she laves without varnin for fear of taking the fever.

"When I sees these things I says that is my polisy. Go it, girls. Stick to it reglar: bhrakers-in or tranurs! whichever you are! but sez you, ain't there resk of their turmin by-and-by, and that is a question to be kunsidered; but your prisindint has kunsidered it filosofikully, spesifikully, and kategorikully, and they won't turn, not so long as the Irish woman uses thim mussels in her back and shoulders and legs that was put there to use, and the American woman lies on the sofa or sits in the rocker till her mussels wilt up; nor so long as the Irish woman walks in the sun and eats enough to make plenty of red blood, and the American woman shuts hersilf behind her blinds and curtains like a sprout in her cellar, and pinches her stomach with her corsets so that it can't hold enough to keep her scrawny frame a goin!—because the American woman will be sick, and the Irish woman well, and dinners hazz to be got, and floors scrubbed all the same, no matter who's sick or well.

"For the rest, ladies and jinthlemin, stick to your motter. Don't lose nothin for want of tryin to get it. Encurrij the arts by insistin on dumb-waiters, a man-waiter, and a little boy to run your errands. Don't encurrij no familiz that tries to economize and wants one girl. The cookin is one girl's work and the chamber-work another; and there should be a boy to tind the door, and a woman for the washin, and an extra woman for the cleanin! Alwiz!

"Keep your mistrhiss out of the kitchen. Don't allow no impertinences as where that pair of stockings wint, or how many eggs you used. Ask as much wages for doin one-third of the work as the whole. If the mistrhiss tries to order you, pay no attenshun. If she touches any thing hersilf, asks afther the change, keeps the key of her store closet, or tries to save, make up your mind she is no lady, and trate her accordinly. Don't allow no tyrinny; and if you go to the kunthry niver stay more than three wakes in one place.

"And now, ladies and jinthlemin, before we adjurn permit me to move a vote of thanks to that noble girl who refused to live with a woman that worked for her livin. Keep the standard high, ladies, and turn your backs on whatever is vulgar and low; also three cheers for the furrin jinthlemin, and let us assure him of our distinguished considerashun."

Here followed statistics appended by Daigaku No Kami, showing that in some places this governing order already had the majority in numbers; after which the interpreter laid down the paper, and the Japanese Ministers awaited the Consul's explanation. To them it was no light matter. A mere chance had thus far saved the Tycoon and his Cabinet from the necessity of performing hari-kari. Every one in Japan has his ometsky, literally shadow, or, as we should say, bluntly, spy. Daigaku No Kami's "shadow" was secretly in the service of the Tycoon. He had contrived to purloin the paper copy, and forward it to the Tycoon, who thus had time to summon the Consul and fortify himself against the expected attack of the Mikado.

As to the Consul, while he could not suppress a smile at the singular misapprehension of the Japanese envoy, he was also alarmed by the fact that a person of intelligence could find so many unanswerable proofs to justify him in the theory of a secret governing order and a hidden despotism in a free republic—an alarm which he hopes the readers of Harper's Bazar will share, and will do their best to make groundless—as he transmitted his intelligence—at any cost.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Wednesday.

"Women are angels: just a little weak. And just a little wicked, it may be. Yet still the sweetest beings in the world; but when one stands with apprehensive gasp at verge of stermination, or leaps off, projecting all her being in a sneeze, or snores with lips wide-parted, or essays the 'double quick,' we turn our eyes away in sadness, that a creature so divine can be so shockingly ridiculous; yet who shall say she's not an angel still?"

So says the author of "Kathrina." Wonder if he would not have said a little more or a little less if he had specially noted the fearfully high chignons (thank the fashions, they are falling down a trifle!), the extraordinarily scant skirts, the ridiculously long trails, and low bodices which some of the ultra stylish adopt? Or if he had heard of the threatened fashion of dyeing the hair green, mauve, blue, or any other shade to match the color of the dress the lady may desire to wear, what then? "An angel still?" An angel with green hair! A novelty indeed!

Saw a recipe to-day for obtaining a magnificent waterfall, and getting rid of annoying company by a single stroke of genius. Thought it worth preserving. A lady living in a not far distant city possessed a luxurious chignon, which was the envy of all her sex. One day it loosened, and a gentleman assisted her in preventing a catastrophe. She rewarded him by taking off the netting which enveloped it, displaying to his wondering eyes a large and handsome wig, and informing him how she obtained it. One evening, as she was hastening to her home, a well-dressed, middle-aged man stepped up to her side and insisted upon accompanying her. She declined; as he persisted in his attentions, she suddenly seized him by the hair of his head and pulled off the whole of it, much to her astonishment. The gentleman took to his heels, and ran away as fast as he could, looking much like a Chinaman minus his cue. This being the first and last time she ever saw the would-be gallant, and as no advertisement appeared for its recovery, she had made the best use she could of the elegant wig.

Mem.—Somebody writes from Paris that the mouth is to be worn slightly open this season!

Thursday Eve.—Some railroad cars in New England are evidently designed solely for six footers! Ladies possessing only two feet lance, that no amount of stretching will enable them to reach the top-board contrivance. Should suppose that ought to be for short folks, not for long ones. "After riding a while the other day most uncomfortably, perched on a high seat, feet poised in mid-air, and nerves on edge, I followed the example of other ladies in the car, and made a footstool of the seat before me. It seemed to be the fashion. The conductor gave consent by silence. Fortunately there were but few in the car. Shouldn't suppose people of ordinary size would patronize such vehicles. Very sorry to adopt an objectionable fashion; but where can a traveler, with only two trunks, pack her nerves and muscles during a six hours' ride? Concluded I should not go that way again until the cars were modernized.

Found, in an English newspaper, some directions for washing Valenciennes and other kinds of thread lace so that it looks almost like new. "Roll the lace very smoothly round a clean bottle, which has previously been covered tightly with old white linen. Tack each end of the lace to keep it smooth, and be careful in folding it round the bottle not to turn in any of the scallops or pearlings. When the lace is on the bottle take some of the best sweet-oil, and with a clean sponge wet the lace thoroughly with it. Prepare in a kettle a strong cold lather of white Castile soap; fill the bottle with cold water to prevent its bursting, cork it well, and stand it upright in the suds, tying it to the handle of the kettle to prevent its rolling about. Let it boil in the suds for an hour or more, till the lace is clean; drain off the suds and dry it on the bottle in the sun. When dry take the lace off the bottle, lay it in long folds within a sheet of white paper, and press it in a large book for a few days."

Saturday Eve.—Mr. T. has been reading aloud an entertaining sketch of Beethoven's life. The celebrated composer was never married, but tried house-keeping himself. He seems to have been no more successful in regard to servants than certain ladies of the present day. He kept a brief record of his domestic afflictions, indicating in what a chaos of misery he lived. An extract from his diary runs thus:

"1820, April 17. The kitchen-maid came. A bad day. [This means that he had only biscuits and beer to live upon, his dinner having been spoiled.]

"May 16. Given warning to kitchen-maid.

"19. The kitchen-maid left.

"30. The woman came.

"July 1. New kitchen-maid arrived.

"28. At night the kitchen-maid ran away.

"30. The woman from Unter Döbling came.

"August 10, 11, 12, and 13. Four bad days.

"28. The woman's mouth expires.

"September 6. The girl came.

And so on. He was parsimonious in little things; but how lovingly generous to his ungrateful adopted son, who fell into extravagant and evil courses! To him he wrote appeals like this: "MY DEAR SON,—No more of this. Come to my arms. You shall not hear one harsh word. For God's sake do not ruin yourself; you shall be received as kindly as ever. As to what is to be thought of and done for the future, we will talk it over in a friendly manner. You have nothing to expect from me but the most anxious and affectionate care. Only come; come to the heart of your father.—BEETHOVEN." Many a child might be saved when on the verge of ruin by such loving words.

Women are beginning to receive some of their "rights." The king of Prussia presented the great gold medal for Art and Literature to Miss Muhlbach, on the first appearance of her new work, "Napoleon in Germany." One of the principal characters introduced in the story is the present King of Prussia, William I.

New inducements to matrimony are being offered in England. At a recent review of British troops a pint of porter was ordered to be issued to each single man, and a quart to each married one.

The Chinese use silk-worms differently from most people. They fry them in castor oil, and regard them as a great luxury.

Some obscurity still hangs round the resignation of M. Monnier, the ex-preceptor of the prince. A hundred different reasons are assigned. The general conclusion, however, is that, even with merit and instruction, it is a difficult thing to steer through that strange sea called the Court. Think I should not be ambitious to navigate that sea in an humble capacity, even if I were less sensitive than Damiron, an incident in whose career comes to mind. That young philosopher was called to the honor of directing the education of a prince. He accepted the mission, and arrived one evening at the Tuilleries. A servant carried the young man's few trunks into the apartment arranged for him, and, after meditating for some time on the plan of wise and manly education he had formed as necessary for a child who would one day be king, Damiron went to sleep. The next morning he was awoke abruptly at seven o'clock by a bell ringing at the head of his bed.

"What's that?" cried the preceptor, in a very bad humor, and ringing in his turn.

The servant who appeared, and was questioned, answered that the bell was to warn Monsieur le Précepteur that his Royal Highness the Prince had risen, and that he was to go to his apartment.

"So," said Damiron, "they ring for me like a servant, do they? Mais. Oh, very well, leave me." In ten minutes Damiron was up, had left the Tuilleries, and never put foot in it again.

Monday Eve.—Received this morning a printed notice of a Church Fair, somewhere in Wisconsin. I was attracted by the announcement that all of the Lady Managers officiate in full male attire, uniform in style: Full-dress coat of dark-blue cloth, and buff cassimere vest, both trimmed with extra rich plain flat gilt buttons; blue or other dark cassimere or woolen-knit pantaloons, and all other belongings of a gentleman's toilet. While considering if I could not invite some of my Western friends to attend this novelty on my behalf, my eye fell on the date, and simultaneously my spirits fell. My circular had evidently been lying at some obscure post-office for weeks.

Just as we were sitting down to dinner a magnificent bouquet of rare blossoms was brought in. Cousin W. sent it. It cheered our dinner-table wonderfully; but I was puzzling my brains half the time how I could preserve it fresh and fragrant for many days to come. Aunt Anne relieved my perplexity. Said she had lately seen some rules for preserving flowers which she thought worth trying. These are the directions: "Sprinkle the bouquet lightly with fresh water, then put it into a vessel containing soap-suds; this will nitrify the stem and keep the flowers as bright as new. Take the bouquet out of the suds every morning and lay it sideways (the stock entering first) into clean water, keep it there a minute or two, then take it out and sprinkle the flowers lightly by the hand with water; replace it in the soap-suds, and it will bloom as fresh as when gathered. The soap-suds need changing every three or four days. By observing these rules a bouquet may be kept bright and beautiful for at least a month."

Tuesday.—Mr. Typeset had not spoken for full ten minutes, as we were cozily sitting in the parlor to-night, when suddenly I became conscious that he was watching me over the top of his newspaper. I looked up.

"My dear," said he, solemnly, "I wish you would not waste your time, and ruin your eyes, over that eternal stitching." Mr. T. never can endure to see me with a needle in my hands. He thinks every thing can be done by the sewing-machine.

"But I am not stitching, I am balisting—see;" and I held up a cunning little sacque, that he might have known with half a glance was just a fit for "Dot."

"Mr. T. gazed in a puzzled way at the little garment, until at length an odd smile came over his face, and he said, 'You got that idea out of the Bazar. But,' continued he, turning again to his newspaper, 'you will never be able to read all the new books that are coming out, unless you stop sewing.'

"Well, you can read them to me, and I shall like that all the better," I replied; "only you must be sure and get them for me as soon as they are published—all of them."

Mr. Typeset lifted his eyebrows, as if he thought his pocket was in imminent danger, but I went on as if I never supposed new books cost any thing.

"Now, do tell me what you are reading about. Anna Dickinson's new novel, or Mrs. Stowe's 'Old-Town Folks' Even I know that those are not likely to appear until spring. Or is it Robert Browning's poem, fifteen thousand lines in length, and founded on a murder? Possibly you may get that in season for a New Year's gift."

But Mr. T. is cautious, and made no rash promises. He only began to read aloud: "'Owen Meredith' has in press two volumes of poems, a work 'which may be either rhyme or prose,' entitled 'Orval, or the Fool of Time,' and a new illustrated edition of his romance, 'Lucile.' Maximilian's autobiography, in three volumes, is announced in England. Mr. John Timbs, an indefatigable compiler of other men's works, will soon publish 'Lady Bountiful's Legacy.' The Queen of Spain is imitating the Queen of England and writing a book."

"Writing her life?" said I, inquiringly. "What a book it must be!"

"I don't believe it is her life," returned Mr. T. "It is to be called 'The Happiness of Nations.' The Czar of Russia is engaged on a military work. The crowned heads are growing wonderfully literary of late. Charles Dickens and Wilkie Collins, it is said, are at work together upon a Christmas story. Victor Hugo is to publish a work in two volumes, prose and poetry, entitled 'Ideas of Three Revolutions.' Charles Reade has a new novel in hand. Mrs. Craik appears in a new literary field, as translator of Guizot's 'Biography of De Brabant.'"

Here Mr. Typeset paused a moment, but presently continued, "Here is a new treatise on Geometry, and Eight Lectures on Sound. I suppose you will want me to buy those also. Ah! a 'Hand-Book of Practical Cookery!' Now, my dear, do you think you could get up some new and savory dishes, if I should make you a present of a copy bound in 'blue and gold'?" And Mr. T. seemed so earnest about the matter that I'm sure I should have had an enlarged edition of his unpublished work on Model Cookery immediately presented to me, if by chance—a good chance, indeed—the door-bell had not rung, and callers interrupted our tête-à-tête.

WINTER CLOAKS.

STEWART'S.

THE "Fields," less than a century since, was an open common outside of the further boundary of the town, the chosen gathering place of political agitators and favorite resort of idlers and pleasure-seekers. With the rapid increase of New York after the Revolution it was soon included within the expanding limits of the city, of which for many years it remained a central space green with verdure and shaded with trees, known then and since as "the Park." The municipality here at an early period built its City Hall, its court-houses, and its jails; but those who resorted to "the Park" for public business were for a long time so few comparatively that idlers still sunned themselves in undisturbed repose on the rustic benches, and children chased butterflies and gathered butter-cups on the verdant sward. Now "the Park" is the most crowded thoroughfare of the lower and busiest part of the city. The dwelling-places which once surrounded it have yielded to massive warehouses and stirring places of business. Idle loungers and sportive children now seek repose and pleasure miles away, and "the Park," trodden all over into a solid pathway, is daily traversed by more than a hundred thousand people intent alone on business.

Making our way as best we can through a throng which seems thickened by the multitude of passers into a viscid current of humanity, we pass the Park, which, stretching a few hundred yards along Broadway, separates two of the most remarkable monuments of private enterprise in the street, the Herald building and Stewart's warehouse or "store" as it is termed by us in America.

This structure, with the exception of one which belongs to the same proprietor, is the largest ever built in the United States for private purposes. Its white marble front, with successive ranges of gracefully-proportioned Corinthian columns, extends from street to street, and the body of the building covers about an acre of ground. It is here that Mr. Stewart now carries on the wholesale part of his great business in what is called by us in the United States "dry goods," which includes every thing sold by the mercer, draper, hosier, upholsterer, haberdasher, glover, and mantua-maker. His annual sales in this one department reach the enormous sum of forty millions of dollars, and far surpass in amount those of any tradesman or merchant in the world. In the conduct of this immense business eight hundred persons are constantly employed. The customers of the establishment are scattered all over the vast continent of America. Every where in the North, South, East, and West, in each large city and small town, there are tradesmen who announce in capitals on their shop fronts, or in emphatic advertisements of the local papers, that the wares they have for sale have come from Stewart. This is deemed the surest way of commanding them to purchasers. When the rebellion broke out there was due from Southern dealers to Mr. Stewart the large sum of two millions of dollars in gold, the greater part of which has probably been long since put down to his "profit and loss" account.

Some few years ago Mr. Stewart, finding that his warehouse in the lower part of Broadway, where he had hitherto conducted his wholesale and retail business together, was too small for the two, and anticipating the progress of the city, built another and still larger structure a mile further up on the great thoroughfare.

Passing the long range of substantial wholesale warehouses which bound Broadway on either side for nearly a mile, we reach what may be termed the retail portion of the street. The same want of symmetry and regularity, the same quickened movement of thronging passers, the same apparently insoluble jumble of omnibuses, carts, and equipages of all kinds, and the same display of flaunting signs and trade-symbols confuse the eye throughout. But on reaching the upper part of the thoroughfare the scene assumes a gay and more holiday look. The shop-windows glow with a display of vari-colored stuffs and wares; great hotels, theatres, museums, coffee-houses, and restaurants throw out their flaunting banners; stylish equipages line the street; richly-dressed dames sweep the sidewalks with their lengthened trains; and lounging, over-dressed men gather about the marble hotel porches, or saunter up and down the street.

The great retail warehouse of Stewart, like his wholesale one, has no external sign or symbol, or any indication whatsoever of the kind of business conducted within it, or of the name of the proprietor. Nor does it need any. There is not an inhabitant of New York who is not familiar with "Stewart's store," and not a stranger that does not immediately become, on arriving in the city, acquainted with it. The structure itself is so large and imposing, and so prominently placed in that universal thoroughfare, Broadway, that it at once strikes the eye of every visitor. Though not yet completed, a portion of it has been occupied for several years. When finished, as it will be in the course of a few months, it will cover two acres and a quarter of ground, upon every inch of which there will be a solid construction of iron and masonry. It has a height of seven and a depth of two stories, descending fifty feet below ground. The first-floor will extend in one clear space over the whole two acres of this building site, unbroken by a single partition. The upper part of the structure will be supported only by the side-walls and a great range of iron pillars.

This spacious hall opening directly to the four streets which the great building will face, is to be exclusively devoted to sales, and in its fifteen different departments the purchaser will find every thing embraced by that comprehensive American word "dry goods" which he may demand, from a glove to a Turkish carpet. The upper stories will be used for manufacturing the various articles of the ladies' wardrobe, mantillas, cloaks, etc., all of which are sold in this universal bazar.

In the early part of the afternoon at the fashionable "shopping" hour five thousand persons, mostly women, may be counted at the same moment in this great establishment, and the daily average number of visitors is nearly twenty thousand. There are twelve hundred people employed in the retail department alone, making, with the eight hundred in the wholesale, two thousand persons to whom Mr. Stewart gives constant occupation. The annual retail sales amount in value to ten millions of dollars, which, added to the forty millions sold at wholesale, makes the vast sum of fifty millions. Thus Mr. Stewart alone sells the sixth of the whole value of the "dry goods" consumed each year throughout the United States!

Half a million of dollars' worth of the single article of gloves are sold each year in the retail establishment; and it is not surprising to hear that one of the largest glove manufacturers of Paris devotes his whole time and resources exclusively to supplying the immense demand of his great American customer.

All kinds of "dry goods" can be purchased at this establishment, from a shilling calico to an Indian shawl at many thousand dollars. There are constantly on sale cashmere from four to five thousand, and lace shawls from three to four thousand dollars each. Mr. Stewart, on a late visit to Europe, not finding articles of silk for dresses sufficiently rich and costly for the American market, whose exorbitant demands no one knows as well as he, ordered some at Lyons of unexampled gorgeousness of material and elaborateness of embroidery. He sold in one day, at four hundred and fifty dollars each, five of these dresses to as many dames in the city of New York. Belts, or mere ribbons to correspond, can not be bought for less than from thirty to forty dollars each. The famous black silks of Antwerp are sold every day across the counter of Stewart at twenty-five dollars a yard. Among the prodigal customers of Stewart there are many who in one morning's shopping spend immense sums. One profuse New York dame lately made a purchase of articles exclusively for her own toilet the bill for which amounted to fifteen thousand dollars.

In the construction of Stewart's retail warehouse utility has been considered rather than ornament. It is built wholly of iron, and consists of a succession of ranges of large arched windows, with no more space of solid structure between than is just sufficient to sustain them. The rotunda, rising a hundred and twenty feet, and extending over a diameter of a hundred, made of iron and painted white like the body of the building, will, when completed, give increased dignity to a structure already imposing from its size and position. Five millions of dollars is the estimated cost of the great shop.

Alexander T. Stewart, whose prodigious success has crowned him the king of merchants and shopkeepers, is an Irishman by birth, and came to New York, like most of his countrymen, a poor emigrant. He was born near Belfast, but descended from a Scottish Presbyterian and Methodist ancestry. A graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, and thus endowed with a good education, he, on arriving at New York, in 1823, became a tutor in a school of which the junior publisher of this paper was one of the pupils.

With thrifty habits he had soon put by a small sum of money. This he embarked as the capitalist in an humble establishment about to be commenced by a friend, who, for some reason or other, failing to "open shop," Mr. Stewart was forced, in order to secure the safety of his small earnings, to do so himself. Thus by accident the poor schoolmaster became the great tradesman. For many years he kept a small shop in Broadway, the whole contents of which would have hardly filled a corner of the cellar of his present marble warehouse opposite. After fluctuating for a long time on the narrow margin between success and failure, he was finally borne away on the full tide of prosperity to an ocean of wealth. No word seems too exaggerated in speaking of the riches of a man whose annual income has reached the prodigious sum of four millions six hundred thousand dollars, or ten dollars each minute of the twenty-four hours, night and day. Mr. Stewart actually declared this income, and paid upon it to the Government of the United States a tax of four hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. Stewart, though now more than three-score years old, retains all the activity and enterprise of his early days. No scheme of business seems too vast, and no detail too minute, for his own personal management and attention. His mind, while it is exact even to the recollection of the number of yards in a piece of flannel, is so comprehensive as to grasp with facility the whole machinery of the great business of which he is the proprietor and manager.

Before Mr. Stewart's late visit to Europe, where he went as the Chief Commissioner of the United States to the great Exhibition at Paris, he telegraphed to all his buyers to meet him at a certain fixed time at Manchester. The day and hour arrived, and Mr. Stewart found at the place appointed forty of his representatives whom he assembled, like some mighty potentate, in a Congress for a deliberation on what may be termed the interests of the world, for there is hardly a market of it, however remote, where the great tradesman has not a buyer.

The popular imagination, anticipating the death of Mr. Stewart, has made various dispositions of the immense wealth he must leave behind him. Though married he has no children. Sometimes it is said that the palatial mansion of marble which he is building in the Fifth Avenue, and which will cost two millions of dollars, is to be converted into an orphan house or a retreat for impoverished gentlewomen. Again, it is rumored that Mr. Stewart has already designed a plan for the erection of whole streets of tenements for the poor, to whom he will leave them in perpetuity at a merely nominal rent.

It would be better for the interests of society, if the political economists are to be believed, that the immense capital of Mr. Stewart should never be diverted from its present channels of trade through which it is now fertilizing the fields of enterprise and reproducing wealth; but how are the interests of the great business to be transferred to others, and where are to be found those capable of conducting it?

There is no country in the world where Fashion has so wide a sway as in the United States. Its worshippers in Europe are the exclusive few; in America its devotees are the multitude. Averse to all distinctions of class, each American citizen dresses like his neighbor, and the man of leisure and the laborer, the mistress and maid, wear clothes of the same material and cut. None of that variety of costume which gives picturesqueness to the people of foreign countries is seen in the United States. Here the workman wears the black dress-coat and stove-pipe hat, and the serving-maid the monstrous chignon covered with flimsy pretense of bonnet, and the flowing robe of silk. It is not always easy to distinguish mistress from maid, and master from man. He need not be an habitual bungler like poor Goldsmith to waste his eloquence and courtesy upon the valet mistaken for the lord.

The foreign visitor, on coming to the United States, is startled to find so much misplaced finery. His knock or ring is responded to by a rustle of silk, and he is confronted at the street-door by a flowing robe of the latest fashion. At table his cheek is brushed by a loose lock of the coiffure in vogue, and perhaps his soup lapped up or his sherry glass swept off by the laced sleeve of the fashionably-dressed Hebe who waits upon him.

Three hundred millions of dollars are spent annually in the United States for "dry goods." This immense consumption of satins, silks, woollens, cottons, and all the other materials of complicated female drapery is the natural result of the universal passion for dress. Every change of capricious fashion finds immediate expression all over the United States. Here the new bonnet is covering each head and the latest robe draping every form of the common people, while still in Europe they remain in the exclusive possession of the aristocratic few. Thus, though the fashions are derived from Berlin and Paris, they are so quickly appropriated and diffused in the United States that the country in the aggregate is always in advance of all others, not even excepting France and Germany, from which they are derived.

It is surprising how quick the foreign emigrant conforms to the American uniformity of dress. Whether Englishman, Frenchman, German, Italian, Swiss, or what not, he no sooner arrives than he doffs his peculiar costume and puts on the general dress of the country. On the day only of his arrival you distinguish him by his frieze coat, knee-breeches, coarse woolen stockings, and hob-nailed shoes, or by his velvet jacket and long gaiters, or by his bob-tailed coat and low-browed cap; on the next his identity is lost in the universal beaver-hat and black suit. So also with the wives and daughters, who at once throw off the scarlet cloaks, the bright velvet bodices, the short skirts of woolen stuff, however endeared to them by tradition and the usage of their own countries, and dress for the first time, but ever afterward, in the flowing gowns and bonnets or hats of American women. Dickens has recorded his astonishment at seeing in America Irishmen with whole coats to their backs. The people of all other nations, whether peculiar by costume or the want of it, are externally metamorphosed with the same rapidity and completeness as the raggedest of Hibernians.

FROM A VERY SMALL BOY.

I HAVE got a little brother. His name is Herbert. He is three years old. My name is Jack. I am six years old. Delia is our nurse. Delia says if I tell she will throw me in the river. But she did not say, if I told the newspaper. A newspaper is not any body. Papa says every body tells the newspaper every thing. I hope you can read my printing. I have just learned to make the letters. Our mamma don't know. She is a beautiful mamma. She wears new gowns, and curls. She comes in once a day to look at us. Like we go to see Flo's puppies.

Delia don't like Herbert. Because he is afraid, and cries. He cries because she shakes him. In the Central Park. There are swans in the Central Park. Sometimes she lets us feed them. When she is pleasant. There is a place there with trees. It is dark, and you can't see any thing. Delia talks there. We sit on the seat, and it makes my back ache. There are pebbles to pick up, but Delia boxes my ears, and shakes me. When she boxes me my head rings. Papa says there is something the matter with my head. The doctor comes. He thinks I get knocks on the head. I think I do. When Herbert's back aches he twists about, and Delia shakes him. I don't cry, but Herbert does. Because he is three years old. She says, "You naughty, good-for-nothing boy," and he cries worse. She boxes him, and I put my arm around him. Delia says Herbert is naughty, but I think he is hungry. I get hungry. It is hot too. Sometimes. My legs get tired, and I want to see the horses. Herbert's legs are short. He has to run, Delia walks so fast. He runs, and he whimpers. Delia says she will give him to the policeman. There are policemen in the Park to catch naughty children, and carry them away. Once there was a lady. She sat on a seat near us. She tried to follow us, and she said she would tell mamma. I wish she had. Mamma went with us once. We fed the swans, and saw all the horses. Delia did not scold. She let us run in the walks. I wish mamma would go again.

I don't like night. I wish God would make days longer. But I heard papa say they are growing shorter. When Delia goes down to the kitchen I see things. Ugly faces and yellow rings. I beg Delia to stay up, but she puts me in bed quick. I asked Delia what the faces were, and she says they are witches. There is a big wheel, too, behind my bed, and it keeps turning round and round. Sometimes I scream. But I try not, for Delia runs up and shakes me. Mamma never sees me when I am in bed. They dance and sing down stairs. But when Aunt Alice was here she put Nellie to bed herself. Nellie said prayers, and Aunt Alice kissed her. I asked Aunt Alice to kiss me, and then she always kissed me. Aunt Alice sings hymns too. And she said I was a poor, lonely little boy. And some day, to pay, mamma would be a poor, lonely old mamma.

This summer we went to the country. There is water and boats in the country. Mamma had new gowns, and we had new frocks. I hate new frocks. I want old trowsers and boots. I wanted to sail sticks, but Delia said I would soil my frock and scrape my shoes. Mamma went somewhere every day. I teased to go too. But she said, "Go to Delia." There was a kitchen door, with a nasty gutter near it. Delia went there. It was hot, and smelled, and mosquitoes bit us. Herbert sat in his carriage. I hated it. And when mamma came home Delia said, always, "We have been on the shore, mum." I did not tell. For there is a man who pulls little boys' hearts out. Delia knows him.

There was a lady. She was pretty, like mamma. She had two boys. They pulled her, and played with her. She went in a boat with them. And they dabbled in the water. When they went bathing she splashed them, and I laughed. The youngest boy was afraid. Like me. Delia pokes me in, and holds me, and I choke. The lady took him in softly. I don't think he choked a bit. They walked on the beach, and she carried a basket. Mamma would not carry a basket. It had lunch in it. The lunch looked very good. The lady offered me a piece. But Delia said, for shame. They got shells. And she let them ask "why." I ask why too. But mamma says, "You troublesome child!" Delia says, "Shut up!" Her boys had a birthday. She told them a story. On purpose for the birthday. It was a beautiful story. I sat very still, and heard. It was not about a little boy, who told something and had his heart pulled out. When the lady goes out her boys run to meet her. They catch her dress. She says, "darling," and "dear." Mamma never lets me touch her gown. Because I rumple her. Delia says she is not a great lady. My mamma is a great lady. Delia says common women walk about with their boys. Delia says when I grow up I shall be a gentleman. And do nothing. I wish mamma would call me darling. The lady would send Delia away. She told Delia not to drag Herbert. And to take me out of the sun. Delia said, "None of your business." Delia don't like the lady. We saw her in the cars. When we came from the Central Park. I stood up. My legs ached. The lady made them give me a seat. Delia said, "Meddling old thing."

Delia says big words. At the table with the girls. I say them too. And the girls laugh. But they say, "You must not talk that before mamma." I scream too. It is a good way to scream at home. Delia takes notice. She is afraid mamma will hear. She don't take notice when I ask. I scream for every thing. Papa says I am not to eat pies, and candies. But Delia says they won't hurt. Papa asks if I have had any. I say "No," and Delia gives me more. Herbert is sick. That is what I want to tell. Two doctors come here every day. They asked Delia if he ever ate fruit. Delia said "No, Sir." Mamma said Delia would not give him any. Herbert moans in his crib. Mamma does not sing now evenings. He ate apples. Two. For I saw them. Delia gave them. To keep him quiet. I want Herbert not to die. I want you to tell. Delia says she will throw me in the river. But she won't know. She can't read. She only looks at the pictures. Mamma reads Harper's Bazar. Mamma can tell the doctors.

Delia says she will never go away. She says she will stay with me as long as I live. She combs my hair hard in the morning. On purpose. When she is cross. And she twitches. When she twitches, it makes me angry. All over. And then she shakes me for being naughty. Tell mamma about it. And about the big wheel behind my bed. It says moon! moon! moon! full! full! full! Delia says there are boys who have no beds. That would be nice. If you tell mamma she will listen. She is very polite. But she always tells me, "Go to Delia." I can't tell her.

I should like to make mud pies. I should like to build a house. Of stones. I could make a waterfall. In the gutter. If my new frocks could be hung on a stick. For people to see. Like they do in the shops. I could wear old clothes. And play. And Delia could go away. She walks out to take care of my clothes. Ask mamma. And why she takes Flo. In her lap. She won't hold me. Flo rumples too. And why I am always troublesome. I try to be good. And what makes me say "why?"

Tell mamma about the lady. Who had the boys. And said "Darling." Ask her if I could be a darling. And if I am really her little boy. Delia says I belong to her. And she will carry me off. I wish mamma had common collars.

That it wouldn't hurt. To lay my head in her neck. Aunt Alice had.

My hand is tired with printing. And I don't see how they make the books. And when papa comes home I wonder how he will look. To think I have written to the paper. I hope you will put it in. Herbert is so sick. And the doctors will know about the apples. I shall know if you do. For mamma takes the paper. And I quite forgot. But could you ask mamma. I don't have any thing on my legs in winter. My stockings are so short. And my trousers don't come down. My legs are cold. All bare. And my shoulders are wrapped so warm. Please not forget. And if Delia asks who wrote this, you won't tell. Will you? JACK.

TOO MUCH MUSIC.

THEOPHILE GAUTIER has defined music as the most unpleasant of all noises. A well-known artist, Paul C—, nevertheless a fervent amateur of good music, shared the poet's antipathy as far as the piano was concerned, especially when the said piano groaned from morning to night under the touch of inexperienced fingers. From eight in the morning to six at night, just the space of time devoted by him to painting, the artist's studio was rendered uninhabitable by a young lady next door, who strummed Il Bacio right and wrong, generally the latter, at least a hundred and fifty times over in the course of the day. A little of Il Bacio is good, but not too much. It drove the artist mad. He could neither rest nor work. Nevertheless, he had never seemed so full of inspiration, but scarcely did he spring from his couch and seat himself before his easel, ready to imprison his fancies, when the pitiless pianist commenced the clatter, and the unhappy painter seized his pallet and took flight.

His patience exhausted, he had recourse to the police.

"Does your persecutor disturb you at night?" asked the official.

"Never."

"Then, my dear Sir, I can do nothing for you; disturbances at night alone come within my jurisdiction."

"What can be done, then?" asked Paul.

"Nothing by force. Persuasion alone can aid you. Open a negotiation with the young lady, and induce her, if you can, to give you some rest."

Paul entered into negotiations, through his janitress, to whom he gave full powers to treat amicably, but the only concession that he could obtain from the musician was, that as Mr. C— was a good, quiet neighbor, she would play the Amazon's Polka in turn with the Bacio Waltz.

What was to be done? The artist played no musical instrument himself, and could not retaliate in kind; nevertheless, the idea inspired him with a happy thought. He hastened to the market and bought a fine sucking pig, whose shrill treble voice seemed its best quality, and brought it home, together with a huge trough filled with vegetables and swill. At six o'clock the next morning he fastened the pig to straps hooked to the wall for the occasion, and which, passing under the belly, held the interesting animal suspended four or five feet from the ground. He then placed the trough before him, slightly inclined, so that the young virtuoso could eat and drink at his ease; and this done, locked the door, put the key in his pocket, and set out on a visit to the country.

The sequel may be guessed. The pig, forced to remain in a position for which he did not feel himself born, kept up a series of frightful shrieks for three days and nights, which even the piano was powerless to drown. The musician became indignant in turn, and complained to the police. An officer was dispatched to the place, where he learned from the janitress that the artist was in the country, and that a pig was the only inmate of the studio.

On the next day but one the artist appeared, in answer to an official summons, before the Police Commissioner.

"What is all the noise about at your house?" asked the latter, laughing. "Your pianist is furious!"

"I have as good a right to squeeze my pig as the young lady has to pound her piano," was the answer; "and I beg you to notice the magnificent voice of my animal."

The result was that a treaty of peace was signed between the two parties. The young lady agreed not to torture her piano from noon to four o'clock; and Paul C—, on his side, sent his musician to the conservatory of the neighboring pork butcher.

"INIGO" ON THE FASHIONS.

EVERY body is delighted with the Bazar (though it is spelled with but one eye), and pronounces it a complete success. For my part, I think it a deal better than either Harper's Weekly or Harper's Magazine, those periodicals only containing one contribution from me, while the Bazar had two. Moreover, the pictures are more plentiful, more varied, and much more interesting. I am strangely fond of pictures.

If asked to point out what picture particularly excited my admiration on the eighth page of the first Number, I think that my finger would unhesitatingly rest on "A Lady's Night-Cap." If there be one subject on earth in which I am more interested than another it certainly is the one of night-caps. In the picture referred to there is a delicacy about the drawing—especially about the drawing of the strings—which so attracted me that I called Mrs. Inigo's attention to it, and requested her unbiased, cut-straight opinion. With her usual felicity of expression and classicalness of allusion she replied, "It caps the climax"—probably meaning to have said the caput.

The "Peplum-Back" struck me as being very pretty, and I think I shall get one about Christmas-time, bird-cage and all, if Mrs. Inigo will allow me to have it in the house. Of the "Peptum-Front" I don't think so much. It has faults; looks, in short, like a false front. The idea of labeling all the nice pictures, by-the-way, is an excellent conceit, since otherwise one would be puzzled to know what the things are. For instance, even I, who have studied high-art with a view to one day linking myself with the profession, would have mistaken the "Drawers for little Girls" for a new pattern of money-purses had not the legend below told to the contrary. Those who fail to understand my criticism, be it remarked, had best buy the first Number of the Bazar. They should have bought it before, but it is never too late to repair an error, however it may be with clothes.

I am indeed glad that you pay so much attention to children's garments. There is nothing that is so beneficial to youth as a good dressing occasionally, especially to little boys. Little girls are kneaded of a finer clay, and have less of original sin in them; consequently in the matter of "collars and cuffs" a judicious discrimination should be made. Had I been collared and cuffed oftener when young, I do think my mature age would have been benefited, and I should not now be expiating the errors of early life in writing for the newspapers. Apropos of dressing little boys, it may be generally remarked that stripes are seldom out of place, wherever bestowed; and as for style, a short jacket and tight-fitting trousers will be found to greatly conduce to the convenience of parents, if not to the comfort of the wearer.

In gentlemen's clothes there is not much change this fall. (Looking through mine this morning I failed, if the truth must be told, to find any at all.) Consequently it is little wonder that coats this season, like ourselves, are "short," and that pantaloons, taking their style from the money-market, may be reported as "tight." Indeed I have seen some pantaloons on the street lately that had the appearance of being very tight indeed—so extraordinarily and inconveniently tight that the wearer could not walk alone, though his legs appeared flexible enough, and a policeman was kindly assisting him to a hotel. Scant measures, unless judiciously taken, are quite as dangerous as full ones. The rolling collars now worn may have something to do with inducing the rolling gait so frequently seen; but this is simply a matter of speculation. In over-coats it will be noticed that gentlemen have returned to their moutonne—a warm thick cloth much worn last year. On examination I discover that the cloth of my over-coat is much worn, so that it will require no additional expense to put me en règle for the winter.

To diverge to ladies' dress—the most pleasant divergence possible, for that of man is fearfully and wonderfully made—bonnets are still worn, though they will probably be entirely discarded when cold weather fairly sets in. They have already reached such dimensions that the aid of a powerful microscope is necessary to enable one to speak of them critically, though it is probable that they will never go entirely out of fashion with ladies who have a bald spot the size of a sixpence on the crown of their heads. Leaves—the golden rain of autumnal forests—is the favorite trimming. In this adornment it can scarcely be said that the ladies are turning over a new leaf, inasmuch as they only take up the tradition of the original mother who sinned that her descendants might dress. As regards names, I observe that the Editress of the Bazar—who erroneously thinks that she knows as much about fashions as I do—remarks that "It is useless to name a bonnet, inasmuch as each milliner has a name of her own." The force of this argument I do not exactly see, since it might quite as well be said that it were useless to name a church, since each minister had a name of his own. The Marie Antoinette I discussed week before last, so nothing of that this. Another style is the Fanchon, so called for its resemblance to the cricket on the hearth. It is very pretty, all but the top, and unfortunately there is little else of it. The Catalane is rather a favorite on account of the firm hold it has on the head. Ladies who do not like to have their heads held seldom wear it. Those who fancy neither of the foregoing styles can anon try the Trianon, which possesses all the disadvantages of both, and none of the beauties. It has been erroneously stated that many of the round hats are felt. This I hold to be mainly impossible, unless the lady has very sensitive feelings. Felt, however, has long been a favorite material for hats. There is reason to believe that it was extensively used in ancient Egypt. Hence the origin of the phrase, "As black as my hat," simply intended to indicate Egyptian darkness, or a darkness that is felt. From the same source, perhaps, is derived the pyramidal style of gentlemen's hats which has obtained since the time of the Ptolemys. In view of the fact that there is nothing like leather, I have sometimes regretted that hats are not made of that material. India rubber, however, might prove better, its elastic conditions seeming to point it out as eminently adapted to a generation of swell heads.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

MR. AND MRS. MUSCA DOMESTICA.
By "AUNT FANNY."

Now I am going to tell you about the house-flies; or, if you prefer to do so, you can call them by their grand Latin names, which make the title of this article.

Where do all the flies come from? Just where you come from—a father and mother, only that where you have perhaps two or three brothers and sisters—perhaps none—one little fly will have, from the early spring until late in autumn, about two millions.

The house-fly is bred in dirt, and the filthier the dirt the better; so the more dirt you have in and about your house the more flies you will entertain; and oh, how impudent they are! poking their long noses—which is not a nose at all, but a proboscis—into all the cream-pitchers, honey-pots, and molasses-jugs they can find, bouncing about perfectly free-and-easy, and inviting themselves to dine even with the Pope of Rome, who is supposed to be so grand a personage that nobody is good enough to sit at the table with him; but you know and I know very well that Mr. and Mrs. Musca Domestica not only eat out of his plate, but are quite likely to perch upon the end of his nose, and laugh at him afterward.

Of course you have seen flies walk up the glass and along the ceiling. This is the way they do it: Their tiny feet are covered with hundreds of hairs. Each hair spreads a little at the end, which end is kept moist by a fluid, and so forms a minute sucker. You have seen the bits of round leather fastened to a string which the boys wet, and then press with their feet on the pavement, and which are so hard to pull up. Well, the flies' little suckers act on the same principle.

I have seen a man walk upon the ceiling. He did it by wearing a sort of snow-shoes which fitted into a groove in the ceiling. He blundered along as clumsily as a pig would dance upon a tight-rope, and looked exceedingly red-faced and silly.

Flies do not breathe as you do, through the mouth or nose, but through a set of holes in the abdomen or stomach: these holes are called spiracles. By these the air is passed into beautifully-constructed tubes called windpipes, the learned name for which is tracheae. The holes or spiracles are furnished with a curious contrivance to keep the dust out, for they are closed by a sieve or screen so exquisitely fine that I advise you one and all to save up your pocket-money and buy each a microscope to view this and all the other wonders which go to make up one small fly.

The proboscis of a fly is a great marvel. It is more complicated than the trunk of an elephant, and in it are teeth—yes, real teeth, like notched chisels, and as plain to be seen as a notched chisel, if you only know where to look for them, when you have saved up your pocket-money and bought that celebrated microscope.

I have an old aunt who, like the Emperor Domitian, takes a savage pleasure in killing flies. She folds up a newspaper into a long flat weapon, and goes whacking about the house every summer morning in spite of my entreaties; for although they are nuisances, I try to feel like good old Uncle Toby—not my uncle, but an Uncle Toby in a book—that the world is wide enough to hold us and the poor flies too.

I know another very particular lady, upon whom a gentleman went to make a call. He found her in full chase round the parlors after one fly. She had a wet towel in her hand, and her sister a dry one. Buzz! hum-m! bounce! went the fly, on the edge of the mantle-piece, the shade of the lamp, the corner of the picture-frame, down the middle of the room, up the side, under the sofa, and over the table, and after him flew the lady, who scrubbed each place where he had rested with the wet towel, while her sister followed and polished it off with the dry one. After a breathless pursuit the fly beat them, for he suddenly flew up to a corner of the ceiling, and there staid scrubbing his head, and no doubt winking and making derisive faces at his tormentors.

The good old prime minister of the fairies in "Fairy Night-caps" had a much kinder heart than my old aunt or this lady, for you remember he got up a memorial for sick bumble-bees, and I have no doubt he would willingly admit all the sick flies into his hospital; so when you see a fly trying to commit suicide because he is unhappy by plunging into the milk-pitcher or honey-pot, just take him carefully out on the end of a match and send him to the bumble-bee hospital. It's a pity I don't know where it is; but perhaps you do.

We do not know comparatively what it is to be plagued with flies. In Italy, Spain, and France, where the olive grows, they are perfectly dreadful. They bite and sting, they buzz and torment, and nearly devour you alive. It is impossible to take a meal without having some one to brush away the flies. You go into the dining-room and find the table black with them. If you whisk them away, they rise like a great black cloud; if you drive them out, every time the door is opened in they stream again, each one bringing a friend to help eat your dinner, until you are nearly worried to death.

I suppose you have all seen a scarecrow in a cornfield. Well, a very ingenious gentleman living in Florence has invented a scare-fly. He hangs outside of his window a net with meshes large enough for half a dozen flies to pass through, yet not a single fly dares to venture. Let us fancy one now sailing around outside. He shuts up one eye, to get a better look with the other, and, putting a paw on the end of his nose, says to himself, "Aha! this must be the web of an awful big spider! he's spinning it across the window, and though I see a most delicious dish of ripe figs and cream on the little table just inside, I don't dare to try to fly through." So he dashes his head in his rage against the upper panes of glass, but he will not go near the net.

I am told that this scare-fly is a sure terror for our friends the flies—only you must be careful that the light comes into the room only from one side; that is, if you open a door into a back-room where there are windows the flies will get over their fright, and rush in immediately.

The house-fly makes with its wings about six hundred strokes every second; but if it is alarmed it can make five or six times as many. It rushes through the air like a cannon-ball; and this swiftness is very often fatal to it, for it will go pounce into pitchers and basins of water or other fluids, and come to its senses kicking dreadfully, and vainly wishing it had not been in such a blind and desperate hurry.

I candidly confess that I do not love flies. I always give a little foolish shudder if one crawls upon me. I wish they would all agree to go one way, and let us go another; but they are too tenacious of their rights to make any such bargain. Somebody once made a brazen fly, which when wound up went buzzing and bounding about just like any other free-and-easy fly; but I think the real ones are brazen enough—there was no need to make one.

The only position in which a fly looks really acceptable and delightful to me is when it is sitting up high and dry in the middle of a lump of amber; and if you should happen to find in your travels a Mr. or Mrs. Musca Domestica so situated, pray send him or her to me as a present for my next birthday, which, like the great General Washington's, comes on the 22d of February.

FACETIE.

A LADY advertises for a husband "having a Roman nose with strong religious tendencies." Poor thing! She will never meet with the object of her desires. A nose with religious tendencies would of course turn up—which is a feat no nose of the Roman type could possibly achieve.

GETTING A-HEAD.

When Tom with Anna fell in love,
And longed to taste love's bliss,
He tried by nec(k)romantic art
To win from her a kiss.

He sought, with arm about her throat,
To reach her twilips' cup;
But ruffled lace and temper both,
And got her choler up.

So next he clasped her shoulders fair,
To help him from the scrape;
And lo! he missed his reckoning,
And doubled up the cape.

Again he tried; but found his arm
And feelings were misplaced;
And that his young affections had,
Like Byron's, run to waste.

I've beat about the bush, he said,
So long that I'm dead beat,
And can't get round her, nor a-head,
It seems, by any feat.

Yet hold! he said, I've found a plan
So good it makes me laugh;
She ne'er could get the better if—
If I had the better half.

So of the twain I'll make but one,
Said Tom, the cunning elf;
Since naught I did could split her then,
Though I might spite myself.

Therefore he went and did the deed;
But felt, as he declared,
Beside himself, and altered so,
He couldn't be re-paired.

Back from the wedding fete he came,
Much like a fated one:
While she seemed Anna-mated, he Seemed an automaton.

She led him by the bridle now,
She said; though he would swear
Her story was an Anna-mad
Version of the affair.

And yet he owned, his darkest night
Had been his marriage morn;
Even the certificate he called
A noose-paper in scorn.

At last he cried, I'll murder her,
And then I'll have her still;
You know that's what Othello did
With one he loved—to kill.

A vendor, hawking hatchets, cautioned
Just then along the walk:
I'll buy me one, said he, and then
I'll have a tomahawk.

Yet could he not to act agree,
And could with none confer:
It killed the fellow, do you see,
To go to axing her.

I'll kill my own half of myself,
He joyful cried, instead:
So, like a brave, he buried deep
The hatchet—in his head.

I'll give my pate to her for an
I-Tom-ical display;
But let me not anticipate,
Said Tom, in novel way.

He did not see it; but she did,
That joke so strange and grim:
For after he was headed off,
She got a-head of him!

"Harry, I was sorry to hear you broke your arm. I suppose it pained you awfully, didn't it?"
HARRY (with much feeling). "It wasn't the pain, old boy. Oh no! it was being deprived of carrying my hands in my pockets which broke me down."

Which is the strongest day in the week?—Sunday, because all the rest are week-days.

There is a verse-writer in Philadelphia who rejoices in the name of Lynn C. Doyle. From the curious nature of the name (linseed oil) many persons think it is a nom de plume merely. It is not, however; it is a nom veritable.

Why do "birds in their little nests agree?"—Because they'd fall out if they didn't.

A lad swallowed a small leaden bullet. His friends were very much alarmed about it. The doctor was found, heard the dismal tale, and, with as much unconcern as he would manifest in a case of common headache, wrote the following laconic note to the lad's father: "Sir,—Don't alarm yourself. If, after three weeks, the bullet is not removed, give the boy a charge of powder. Yours, etc. P.S.—Don't shoot the boy at any body."

An Irish girl told her forbidden lover she was longing to possess his portrait, and intended to obtain it. "But how if your friends see it?"
"Ah, but I'll tell the artist not to make it like you, so they won't know it."

A little girl in Portland was reading the parable of the wise and foolish virgins, when she suddenly paused. "Well, what did they forget?" asked the teacher, encouragingly. "They forgot their herosene," responded Miss Five-year-old.

In a family Bible in Connecticut this record is to be found: "Elizabeth Jones, born on the 20th of September, 1785, according to the best of her recollection."

An Irishman, speaking of his children, said: "They are all well but the one born in this country. I must take him to the Green Isle, for I believe he is languishing for his native air that he never smelt at all."

THE BIRDS AND THE PHEASANT.

(After Longfellow.)

I snor a partridge in the air,
It fell in turnips, "Don" knew where;
For just as it dropped, with my right
I stopped another in its flight.

I killed a pheasant in the copse,
It fell among the fir-tree tops,
For though a pheasant's flight is strong,
A cock, hard hit, can not fly long.

Soon, soon afterward, in a pie,
I found the birds in jelly lie:
And the pheasant, at a fortnight's end,
I found again in the carte of a friend.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER V.

THE MYSTERY OF COFFIN ISLAND.

WHEN Brandon awoke on the following morning the sun was already high in the sky. He rose at once and walked slowly up, with stiffened limbs, to a higher spot. His clothes already were partly dry, but they were uncomfortable and impeded his motion. He took off nearly every thing, and laid them out on the sand. Then he examined his pistol and the box containing cartridges. This box held some oil also, with the help of which the pistol was soon in good order. As the cartridges were encased in copper they were uninjured. He then examined a silver case which was suspended round his neck. It was cylindrical in shape, and the top unscrewed. On opening this he took out his father's letter and the inclosure, both of which were uninjured. He then rolled them up in a small compass and restored them to their place.

He now began to look about him. The storm had ceased, the waves had subsided, a slight breeze was blowing from the sea which just ruffled the water and tempered the heat. The island on which he had been cast was low, flat, and covered with a coarse grass which grew out of the sand. But the sand itself was in many places thrown up into ridges, and appeared as though it was constantly shifting and changing. The mound was not far away, and at the eastern end of the island he could see the black outline of the rock which he had noticed from the ship. The length he had before heard to be about five miles, the width appeared about one mile, and in its whole aspect it seemed nothing better than the abomination of desolation.

At the end where he was the island terminated in two points, between which there was the cove where he had found refuge. One of these points was distinguished by the mound already mentioned, which from where he stood appeared of an irregular oblong shape. The other point was low, and descended gently into the water. The island itself appeared to be merely the emergence of some sand-bank which, perhaps, had been formed by currents and eddies; for here the currents of the Strait of Sunda encounter those from the Southern and Indian oceans, and this bank lay probably near their point of union.

A short survey showed him this. It showed him also that there was but little if any hope of sustaining life, and that he had escaped drowning only perhaps to perish by the more lingering agonies of starvation.

Already hunger and thirst had begun to be felt, and how to satisfy these wants he knew not. Still he would not despair. Perhaps the Java might return in search of him, and his confinement would only last for a day or so.

He understood the act of Gigole in a way that was satisfactory to himself. He had thrown him overboard, but had made it appear like an accident. As he felt he had heard the shout "Man overboard!" and was now able to account for it in this way. So a faint hope remained that the captain of the Java would not give him up.

Still subsistence of some kind was necessary, and there was nothing to be done but to explore the sandy tract before him. Setting forth he walked toward the rock along the sea-shore. On one side toward the north the shore was shallow and sloped gently into the water; but on the southern side it descended more abruptly. The tide was out. A steep beach appeared here covered with stones to which myriads of shell-fish were attached. The sight of these suggested the idea to him that on the opposite side there might be clams in the sand. He walked over there in search of them. Here the slope was so gradual that extensive flats were left uncovered by the receding tide.

When a boy he had been sometimes accustomed to wander on sand flats near his home, and dig up these clams in sport. Now his boyish experience became useful. Myriads of little holes dotted the sand, which he knew to be the indications of these molluscs, and he at once began to scoop in the sand with his hands. In a short time he had found enough to satisfy his hunger, and what was better, he saw all around an unlimited supply of such food.

Yet food was not enough. Drink was equally necessary. The salt of these shell-fish aggravated the thirst that he had already begun to feel, and now a fear came over him that there might be no water. The search seemed a hopeless one; but he determined to seek for it nevertheless, and the only place that seemed to promise success was the rock at the eastern end. Toward this he now once more directed his steps.

The island was all of sand except the rocks on the south beach and the cliff at the eastern end. Coarse grass grew very extensively over the surface, but the sand was fine and loose, and in many places thrown up into heaps of many different shapes. The grass grew in tufts or in spires and blades, thinly scattered, and nowhere forming a sod. The soil was difficult to walk over, and Brandon sought the beach, where the damp sand afforded a firmer foothold. In about an hour and a half he reached the rock.

It was between five hundred and six hundred feet in length, and about fifty in height. There was no resemblance to a coffin now as Brandon approached it, for that likeness was only discernible at a distance. Its sides were steep and precipitous. It was one black solid mass, without any outlying crags, or any fragments near it. Its upper surface appeared to be level, and in various places it was very easy to ascend. Up one of these places Brandon climbed, and soon stood on the top.

Near him the summit was somewhat rounded; at the farther end it was flat and irregular; but between the two ends it sank into a deep hollow, where he saw that which at once excited a tumult of hope and fear. It was a pool of water at least fifty feet in diameter, and deep too, since the sides of the rock went down steeply. But was it fresh or salt? Was it the accumulation from the showers of the rainy season of the tropics, or was it but the result of the past night's storm, which had hurled wave after wave here till the hollow was filled?

With hasty footsteps he rushed toward the margin of the pool, and bent down to taste. For a moment or so, by a very natural feeling, he hesitated, then, throwing off the fever of suspense, he bent down, kneeling on the margin, till his lips touched the water.

It was fresh! Yes, it was from the heavens above, and not from the sea below. It was the fresh rains from the sky that had filled this deep pool, and not the spray from the sea. Again and again he quaffed the refreshing liquid. Not a trace of the salt-water could be detected. It was a natural cistern which thus lay before him, formed as though for the reception of the rain. For the present, at least, he was safe.

thing which could distract his thoughts, or prevent him from brooding upon the hopelessness of his situation.

Brooding thus, it became his chief occupation to read over and over his father's letter and the inclosure, and conjecture what might be his course of action if he ever escaped from this place. His father's voice seemed now to sound to him more imploringly than ever; and the winds at night, as they moaned round the rock, seemed to modulate themselves, to form their sounds to something like a wild cry, and wail forth, "Come home!" Yet that home was now surely farther removed than ever, and the winds seemed only to mock him. More sad and more despairing than Ulysses on the Ogygian shore, he too wasted away with home-sickness.

Fate thus far had been against him, and the melancholy recollections of his past life could yield nothing but despondency. Driven from home when but a boy, he had become an exile, had wandered to the other side of the world, and was just beginning to attain some prospect of a fortune when this letter came. Rising up from the prostration of that blow, he had struggled against fate, but only to encounter a more overwhelming force, and this last stroke had been the worst of all. Could he rally after this? Could he now hope to escape?

Fate had been against him; but yet, perhaps, here, on this lonely island, he might find a turning-point. Here he might find that turning in the long lane which the proverb speaks of. "The storms alternating: sometimes all the sea lying dull, listless, and glassy under the burning sky; at other times both sea and sky convulsed with the war of elements.

At last there came one storm so tremendous that it exceeded all that Brandon had ever seen any where.

The wind gathered itself up from the south-east, and for a whole day the forces of the tempest collected themselves, till at last they burst in fury upon the island. In sustained violence and in the frenzy of its assault it far surpassed that first storm. Before sundown the storm was at its height, and, though yet day, the clouds were so dense and so black that it became like night. Night came on, and the storm, and roar, and darkness increased steadily every hour. So intense was the darkness that the hand, when held close by the face, could not be distinguished. So resistless was the force of the wind that Brandon, on looking out to sea, had to cling to the rock to prevent himself from being blown away. A dense rain of spray streamed through the air, and the surf, rolling up, flung its crest all across the island. Brandon could hear beneath him, amidst some of the pauses of the storm, the hissing and bubbling of foaming waters, as though the whole island, submerged by the waves, was slowly settling down into the depths of the ocean.

Brandon's place of shelter was sufficiently elevated to be out of the reach of the waves that might rush upon the land, and on the lee-side of the rock, so that he was sufficiently protected. Sand, which he had carried up, formed his bed. In this place, which was more like the lair of a wild beast than the abode of a human being, he had to live. Many wakeful nights he had passed there, but never had he known such a night as this.

There was a frenzy about this hurricane that would have been inconceivable if he had not witnessed it. His senses, refined and rendered acute by long vigils and slender diet, seemed to detect audible words in the voice of the storm. Looking out through the gloom his sight seemed to discern shapes flitting by like lightning, as though the fabled spirits of the storm had gathered here.

It needed all the robust courage of his strong nature to sustain himself in the presence of the wild fancies that now came rushing and thronging before his mind. The words of his father sounded in his ears; he thought he heard them spoken from the air; he thought he saw an aged spectral face, wan with suffering and grief, in front of his cave. He covered his eyes with his hands, and sought to reason down his superstitious feeling. In vain. Words rang in his ears, muffled words, as though muttered in the storm, and his mind, which had brooded so long over his father's letter, now gave shape to the noise of winds and waves.

"—In the crisis of your fate I will be near."

"I shall go mad!" cried Brandon, aloud, and he started to his feet.

But the storm went on with its fury, and still his eyes saw shapes, and his ears heard fantastic sounds. So the night passed until at last the storm had exhausted itself. Then Brandon sank down and slept far on into the day.

When he awoke again the storm had subsided. The sea was still boisterous, and a fresh breeze blew which he inhaled with pleasure. After obtaining some shell-fish, and satisfying his appetite, he went to the summit of the rock for water, and then stood looking out at sea.

His eye swept the whole circuit of the horizon without seeing any thing, until at length he turned to look in a westwardly direction where the island spread out before him. Here an amazing sight met his eyes.

The mound at the other end had become completely and marvelously changed. On the previous day it had preserved its usual shape, but now it was no longer smoothly rounded. On the contrary it was irregular, the northern end being still a sort of hillock, but the middle and southern end was flat on the surface and dark in color. From the distance at which he stood it looked like a rock, around which the sand had accumulated, but which had been uncovered by the violent storm of the preceding night.

At that distance it appeared like a rock, but there was something in its shape and in its position which made it look like a ship which had been cast ashore. The idea was a startling one, and he at once dismissed it as absurd. But the more he looked the closer the resemblance grew until at last, unable to endure this suspense, he hurried off in that direction.

During all the time that he had been on the island he had never been close to the mound. He had remained for the most part in the neighborhood of the rock, and had never thought that a barren sand hillock was worthy of a visit. But now it appeared a very different object in his eyes.

He walked on over half the intervening distance, and now the resemblance instead of fading out, as he anticipated, grew more close. It was still too far to be seen very distinctly; but there, even from that distance, he saw the unmistakable outline of a ship's hull.

There was now scarcely any doubt about this. There it lay. Every step only made it more visible. He walked more quickly onward, filled with wonder, and marveling by what strange chance this vessel could have reached its present position.

There it lay. It could not by any possibility have been cast ashore on the preceding night. The mightiest billows that ever rose from ocean could never have lifted a ship so far upon the shore. To him it was certain that it must have been there for a long time, and that the sand had been heaped around it by successive storms.

As he walked nearer he regarded more closely the formation of this western end. He saw the low northern point, and then the cove where he

"GREAT HEAVENS!" CRIED BRANDON, STARTING BACK—"THE VISHNU!"

He had food and drink. As long as the rainy season lasted, and for some time after, life was secure. Life becomes doubly sweet after being purchased by such efforts as those which Brandon had put forth, and the thought that for the present, at least, he was safe did not fail to fill him with the most buoyant hope. To him, indeed, it seemed just then as if nothing more could be desired. He had food and drink in abundance. In that climate shelter was scarcely needed. What more could he wish?

The first day was passed in exploring the rock to see if there was any place which he might select for his abode. There were several fissures in the rock at the eastern end, and one of these he selected. He then went back for his clothes, and brought them to this place. So the first day went.

All the time his eyes wandered round the horizon to see if a sail might be in sight. After two or three days, in which nothing appeared, he ceased his constant watch, though still from time to time, by a natural impulse, he continued to look. After all he thought that rescue might come. He was somewhat out of the track of the China ships, but still not very much so. An adverse wind might bring a ship close by. The hope of this sustained him.

But day succeeded to day and week to week with no appearance of any thing whatever on the wide ocean.

During these long days he passed the greater part of his time either under the shelter of the rock, where he could best avoid the hot sun, or when the sea-breeze blew on its summit. The frightful solitude offered to him absolutely no-day is darkest before the morn," and perhaps he would yet have Fate on his side.

But the sternest and most courageous spirit can hardly maintain its fortitude in an utter and unmitigated solitude. St. Simeon Stylites could do so, but he felt that on the top of that pillar there rested the eyes of the heavenly hosts and of admiring mankind. It is when the consciousness of utter solitude comes that the soul sinks. When the prisoner thinks that he is forgotten by the outside world, then he loses that strength which sustained him while he believed himself remembered.

It was the lot of Brandon to have this sense of utter desolation; to feel that in all the world there was not one human being that knew of his fate; and to fear that the eye of Providence only saw him with indifference. With bitterness he thought of the last words of his father's letter: "If in that other world to which I am going the disembodied spirit can assist man, then be sure, O my son, I will assist you, and in the crisis of your fate I will be near, if it is only to communicate to your spirit what you ought to do."

A melancholy smile passed over his face as he thought of what seemed to him the utter futility of that promise.

Now, as the weeks passed, his whole mode of life affected both mind and body. Yet, if it be the highest state of man for the soul to live by itself, as Socrates used to teach, and sever itself from bodily association, Brandon surely had attained, without knowing it, a most exalted stage of existence. Perhaps it was the period of purification and preparation for future work.

The weather varied incessantly, calms and had escaped from the sea. He noticed that the southern point where the mound was appeared to be a sort of peninsula, and the theory suggested itself to him by which he could account for this wonder. This ship, he saw, must have been wrecked at some time long before upon this island. As the shore was shallow it had run aground and stuck fast in the sand. But successive storms had continued to beat upon it until the moving sands which the waters were constantly driving about had gathered all around it higher and higher. At last, in the course of time, a vast accumulation had gathered about this obstacle till a new bank had been formed and joined to the island; and the winds had lent their aid, heaping up the loose sand on high till all the ship was covered. But last night's storm had to some extent undone the work, and now the wreck was once more exposed.

Brandon was happy in his conjecture and right in his theory. All who know any thing about the construction and nature of sand islands such as this are aware that the winds and waters work perpetual changes. The best known example of this is the far-famed Sable Island, which lies off the coast of Nova Scotia, in the direct track of vessels crossing the Atlantic between England and the United States. Here there is repeated on a far larger scale the work which Brandon saw on Coffin Island. Sable Island is twenty miles long and about one in width—the crest of a vast heap of sand which rises out of the ocean's bed. Here the wildest storms in the world rage uncontrolled, and the keepers of the light-house have but little shelter. Not long ago an enormous flag-staff was torn from out its place and hurled away into the sea. In fierce storms the spray drives all across, and it is impossible to venture out. But most of all, Sable Island is famous for the melancholy wrecks that have taken place there. Often vessels that have the bad fortune to run aground are broken up, but sometimes the sand gathers about them and covers them up. There are numerous mounds here, which are known to conceal wrecked ships. Some of these have been opened, and the wreck beneath has been brought to view. Sometimes also after a severe gale these sandy mounds are torn away and the buried vessels are exposed.

Far away in Australia Brandon had heard of Sable Island from different sea captains who had been in the Atlantic trade. The stories which these men had to tell were all largely tinged with the supernatural. One in particular who had been wrecked there, and had taken refuge for the night in a hut built by the British Government for wrecked sailors, told some wild story about the apparition of a negro who waked him up at dead of night and nearly killed him with horror.

With all these thoughts in his mind Brandon approached the wreck and at last stood close beside it.

It had been long buried. The hull was about two-thirds uncovered. A vast heap of sand still clung to the bow, but the stern stood out full in view. Although it must have been there for a long time the planks were still sound, for they seemed to have been preserved from decay by the sand. All the calking, however, had become loose, and the seams gaped widely. There were no masts, but the lower part of the shrouds still remained, showing that the vessel was a brig. So deeply was it buried in the sand, that Brandon, from where he stood, could look over the whole deck, he himself being almost on a level with the deck. The masts appeared to have been chopped away. The hatchways were gone. The hold appeared to be filled with sand, but there may have been only a layer of sand concealing something beneath. Part of the planking of the deck as well as most of the taffrail on the other side had been carried away. A stern there was a quarter-deck. There was no skylight, but only dead-lights set on the deck. The door of the cabin still remained and was shut tight.

All these things Brandon took in at a glance. A pensive melancholy came over him, and a feeling of pity for the inanimate ship as though she were capable of feeling. By a natural curiosity he walked around to the stern to see if he could read her name.

The stern was buried deep in the sand. He had to kneel to read it. On the side nearest him the letters were obliterated, but he saw some remaining on the opposite side. He went over there and knelt down. There were four letters still legible and part of a fifth. These were the letters:

VISHN

"Great Heavens!" cried Brandon, starting back—"the Vishnu!"

CHAPTER VI.

THE DWELLER IN THE SUNKEN SHIP.

AFTER a moment of horror Brandon walked away for a short distance, and then turning he looked fixedly at the wreck for a long time.

Could this be indeed the ship—the Vishnu? By what marvelous coincidence had he thus fallen upon it? It was in 1828 that the Vishnu sailed from Calcutta for Manila. Was it possible for this vessel to be preserved so long? And if so, how did it get here?

Yet why not? As to its preservation that was no matter in itself for wonder. East Indian vessels are sometimes built of mahogany, or other woods which last for immense periods. Any wood might endure for eighteen years if covered up by sand. Besides, this vessel he recollected had been laden with staves and box shooks, with other wooden materials which would keep it afloat. It might have drifted about these seas till the currents bore it here. After all it was not so wonderful that this should be the Vishnu of Colonel Despard.

The true marvel was that he himself should have been cast ashore here on the same place where this ship was.

He stood for a long time not caring to enter. His strength had been worn down by the privations of his island life; his nerves, usually like steel, were becoming unstrung; his mind had fallen into a morbid state, and was a prey to a thousand strange fancies. The closed doors of the cabin stood there before him, and he began to imagine that some frightful spectacle was concealed within.

Perhaps he would find some traces of that tragedy of which he had heard. Since the ship had come here, and he had been cast ashore to meet it, there was nothing which he might not anticipate.

A strange horror came over him as he looked at the cabin. But he was not the man to yield to idle fancies. Taking a long breath he walked across the island, and then back again. By that time he had completely recovered, and the only feeling now remaining was one of intense curiosity.

This time he went up without hesitation, and climbed on board the vessel. The sand was heaped up astern, the masts gone, and the hatchways torn off, as has been said. The wind which had blown the sand away had swept the decks as clean as though they had been holy-stoned. Not a rope or a spar or any movable of any kind could be seen.

He walked aft. He tried the cabin door, it was wedged fast as though part of the front. Finding it immovable he stepped back and kicked at it vigorously. A few sturdy kicks started the panel. It gradually yielded and sank in. Then the other panel followed. He could now look in and see that the sand lay inside to the depth of were covered deeply; the other two but lightly: the latter were unlocked, and he opened the lids. Only some old clothes appeared, however, and these in the same stage of decay as every thing else. In one of them was a book, or rather what had once been a book, but now the leaves were all stuck together, and formed one lump of slime and mould. In spite of his most careful search he had thus far found nothing whatever which could be of the slightest benefit to him in his solitude and necessity.

There were still two rooms which he had not yet examined. These were at the end of the cabin, at the stern of the ship, each taking up one half of the width. The sand had drifted in here to about the same depth as in the side-rooms. He entered first the one nearest him, which was on the right side of the ship. This room was about ten feet long, extending from the middle of the ship to the side, and about six feet wide. A telescope was the first thing which attracted his attention. It lay in a rack near the doorway. He took it down, but it fell apart at once, being completely corroded. In the middle of the room there was a compass, which hung from the ceiling. But the iron pivot had rusted, and the plate had fallen down. Some more guns and swords were here, but all rusted like the others. There was a table at the wall by the stern, covered with sand. An arm-chair stood close by it, and opposite this was a couch. At the end of this room was a berth which had the same appearance as the other berths in the other rooms. The quilts and mattresses as he felt them beneath the damp sand were equally decayed. Too long had the ship been exposed to the ravages of time, and Brandon saw that to seek for any thing here which could be of the a foot. As yet, however, he could not enter. There was nothing else to do except to kick at it till it was all knocked away, and this after some patient labor was accomplished.

He entered. The cabin was about twelve feet square, lighted by dead-lights in the deck above. On each side were two state-rooms, probably intended for the ship's officers. The doors were all open. The sand had drifted in here and covered the floor and the berths. The floor of the cabin was covered with sand to the depth of a foot. There was no large opening through which it could enter; but it had probably penetrated through the cracks of the doorway in a fine, impalpable dust, and had covered every available surface within.

In the centre of the cabin was a table, secured to the floor, as ships' tables always are; and immediately over it hung the barometer which was now all corroded and covered with mould and rust. A half dozen stools were around, some lying on their sides, some upside down, and one standing upright. The door by which he had entered was at one side, on the other side was another, and between the two stood a sofa, the shape of which was plainly discernible under the sand. Over this was a clock, which had ticked its last tick.

On some racks over the closet there were a few guns and swords, intended, perhaps, for the defensive armament of the brig, but all in the last stage of rust and of decay. Brandon took one or two down, but they broke with their own weight.

The sand seemed to have drifted more deeply into the state-rooms, for while its depth in the cabin was only a foot, in these the depth was nearly two feet. Some of the bedding projected from the berths, but it was a mass of mould and crumbled at the touch.

Brandon went into each of these rooms in succession, and brushed out the heavy, wet sand from the berths. The rotten quilts and blankets fell with the sand in matted masses to the floor. In each room was a seaman's chest. Two of these slightest service to himself was in the highest degree useless.

This last room seemed to him as though it might have been the captain's. That captain was Cigole, the very man who had flung him overboard. He had unconsciously by so doing sent him to the scene of his early crime. Was this visit to be all in vain? Thus far it seemed so. But might there not yet be something beneath this sand which might satisfy him in his search?

There still remained another room. Might there not be something there?

Brandon went back into the cabin and stood looking at the open doorway of that other room.

He hesitated. Why? Perhaps it was the thought that here was his last chance, that here his exploration must end, and if nothing came of it then all this adventure would be in vain. Then the fantastic hopes and fears which by turns had agitated him would prove to have been absurd, and he, instead of being sent by Fate as the minister of vengeance, would be only the commonplace victim of an everyday accident.

Perhaps it was some instinct within him that made known to his mind what awaited him there. For now as he stood that old horror came upon him full and strong. Weakness and excitement made his heart beat and his ears ring. Now his fancy became wild, and he recalled with painful vividness his father's words:

"In the crisis of your fate I will be near."

The horrors of the past night recurred. The air of the cabin was close and suffocating. There seemed in that dark room before him some dread Presence, he knew not what; some Being, who had uncovered this his abode and enticed him here.

He found himself rapidly falling into that state in which he would not have been able either to advance or retreat. One overmastering horror seized him. Twice his spirit sought to overcome the faintness and weakness of the flesh. Twice he stepped resolutely forward; but each time he faltered and recoiled.

Here was no place for him to summon up his strength. He could bear it no longer. He turned abruptly and rushed out from the damp, gloomy place into the warm, bright sunshine and the free air of heaven.

The air was bright, the wind blew fresh. He drank in great draughts of that delicious breeze, and the salt sea seemed to be inhaled at each breath.

The sun shone brilliantly. The sea rolled afar and all around, and sparkled before him under the sun's rays with that infinite laughter, that ἀνιρθμον γέλασμα of which Æschylus spoke in his deep love of the salt sea. Speaking parenthetically, it may be said that the only ones from among articulate speaking men who have found fitting epithets for the sea are the old Greek, the Scandinavian, and the Englishman.

Brandon drew in new strength and life with every breath, till at last he began to think once more of returning.

But even yet he feared that when he entered that cabin the spell would be on him. The thought of attempting it was intolerable. Yet what was to be done? To remain unsatisfied was equally intolerable. To go back to his rock was not to be thought of.

But an effort must be made to get rid of this womanly fear; why should he yield to this? Surely there were other thoughts which he might call to his mind. There came over him the memory of that villain who had cast him here, who now was exulting in his fancied success and bearing back to his master the news. There came to him the thought of his father, and his wrongs, and his woe. There came to his memory his father's dying words summoning him to vengeance. There came to him the thought of those who yet lived and suffered in England, at the mercy of a pitiless enemy. Should he falter at a superstitious fancy, he—who, if he lived, had so great a purpose?

All superstitious fancy faded away. The thirst for revenge, the sense of intolerable wrong arose. Fear and horror died out utterly, destroyed by Vengeance.

"The Presence, then, is my ally," he murmured. "I will go and face it."

And he walked resolutely, with a firm step, back into the cabin.

Yet even then it needed all the new-born resolution which he had summoned up, and all the thought of his wrong, to sustain him as he entered that inner room. Even then a sharp thrill passed through him, and bodily weakness could only be sustained by the strong, resolute, stubborn soul.

The room was about the size of the captain's. There was a table against the side, which looked like a leaf which could hang down in case of necessity. A trunk stood opposite the door, with the open lid projecting upward out of a mass of sand. Upon the wall there hung the collar of a coat and part of the shoulders, the rest having apparently fallen away from decay. The color of the coat could still be distinguished; it was red, and the epaulets showed that it had belonged to a British officer.

Brandon on entering took in all these details at a glance, and then his eyes were drawn to the berth at the end of the room, where that Thing lay whose presence he had felt and feared, and which he knew by an internal conviction must be here.

There it awaited him, on the berth. Sand had covered it, like a coverlet, up to the neck, while beyond that protruded the head. It was turned toward him; a bony, skeleton head, whose hollow cavities seemed not altogether vacancy, but rather dark eyes which looked gloomily at him; dark eyes fixed, motionless; which had been thus fixed through the long years, watching wistfully for him, expecting his entrance through that doorway. And this was the Being who had assisted him to the shore, and who had thrown off the covering of sand with which he had concealed himself, so as to bring him here before him. Brandon stood motionless, mute. The face was turned toward him—that face which is at once human and yet most frightful, since it is the face of Death—the face of a skeleton. The jaws had fallen apart, and that fearful grin which is fixed on the fleshless face here seemed like an effort at a smile of welcome.

The hair still clung to that head, and hung down over the fleshless forehead, giving it more the appearance of Death in life, and lending a new horror to that which already pervaded this Dweller in the Ship.

"The nightmare Life-in-Death was he, That thickens men's blood with cold."

Brandon stood while his blood ran chill, and his breath came fast.

If that Form had suddenly thrown off its sandy coverlet and risen to his feet, and advanced with extended hand to meet him, he would not have been surprised, nor would he have been one whit more horror-stricken.

Brandon stood fixed. He could not move. He was like one in a nightmare. His limbs seemed rigid. A spell was upon him. His eyes seemed to fasten themselves on the hollow cavities of the Form before him. But under that tremendous pressure he did not altogether sink. Slowly his spirit rose; a thought of flight came, but it was instantly rejected. The next moment he drew a long breath. "I'm an infernal fool and coward," he muttered. He took three steps forward, and stood beside the Figure. He laid his hand firmly upon the head; the hair fell off at his touch. "Poor devil," said he, "I'll bury your bones at any rate." The spell was broken, and Brandon was himself again.

Once more Brandon walked out into the open air, but this time there was not a vestige of horror left. He had encountered what he dreaded, and it was now in his eyes only a mass of bones. Yet there was much to think of, and the strug-

WHOLESALE DENTAL DEPOT, No. 53
North Fourth St., Cincinnati, Ohio. I have become much interested in the Bartlett Sewing-Machine. I have noticed testimonials from persons whom I know, and who I also know would not recommend it unless it was good. For instance, D. D.
T. Moore, Editor Rural New-Yorker, Rochester, N.Y., and members of the Editorial Staff. I am more and more convinced it is the best low-priced Machine now extant, and yet I can not see why it is not as valuable to a family as any other machine in the market. I have made many inquiries about it, and am happy to say that my conclusion is that I can engage in its sale with the firm knowledge that I am introducing a Sewing-Machine second to none for family use.
Yours truly, J. S. WALTER.
CINCINNATI, OHIO.—I think more and yet more of the Machine as we see it tested. I had some carpets to make, and bound them all with the Bartlett Machine, using a No. 3 Needle and No. 30 Thread. The needle walked right through the Carpet, with its double binding, as easily as in the thinnest cambric.
It astonished us that a thing so small should be such a giant. Not an individual to whom we have shown it but thinks it a gem—and it will grow in favor as it becomes known. There are many women who can not use a treadle without great fatigue and injury; they can now do the ordinary sewing of a good sized family with the Machine, adapted for use by Hand, fastened to a common house table, and with perfect ease. Yours truly, J. S. WALTER.
Mrs. Wm. E. Shutt, Springfield, Ill., writes to New York, September 16, for Needles, and says: I purchased, over a year ago, in New York, one of Bartlett's Reversible Sewing-Machines, the style at $25; it is as good as the day I bought it, and sews beautifully; I would not part with it; three of my friends who have seen it have also procured them from the Depot, No.
509 Broadway, New York.

best, 40 cents per pound.
Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our
FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.
Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound
by purchasing their Teas of
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY), we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.
First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.
Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.
Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.
Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo,
and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.
Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea
Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.
Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.
Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail
Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.
Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for
ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.
We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooper-ages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.
Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.
Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.
COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos.
31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.
Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.
We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are
BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.
Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the

HARPER'S BAZAR.
The Publishers have just commenced the issue of HARPER'S BAZAR, a Weekly Illustrated Family Journal, devoted to Fashion and Home Literature. Their aim is twofold: to supply the existing need of a Weekly Fashion Newspaper, and to combine therewith a first-class literary journal, which will be indispensable to every household.

It is the first Weekly Journal of Fashion ever published in the United States. The Publishers have made arrangements, at great cost, with the most celebrated of the Fashion Papers of Europe, especially with the famous Bazar of Berlin, which supplies the fashions to the leading journals of Paris, to furnish the same to them in advance, so that henceforth the fashions will appear in HARPER'S BAZAR simultaneously with their publication in Paris and Berlin—an advantage enjoyed by no other journal in the country.
The patrons of HARPER'S BAZAR will receive every fortnight large pattern-plates, containing from forty to fifty full-sized patterns of ladies', misses', and children's bonnets, cloaks, dresses, under-clothing, and other articles, accompanied with the necessary descriptions and directions, and occasionally an elegant colored fashion plate.

HARPER'S BAZAR, besides being the leading Fashion
Journal in this country, will also aim to pre-ent before its readers the very best specimens of Household Literature. It will contain original and selected Serial Stories, Poetry, Novellets, Articles on the Topics of the Day (excluding Politics), on Books, Art, Morals, Familiar Science, Education, Amusements, Hygiene,
Etiquette, Housekeeping, Gardening, with Home and Foreign Gossip. No subject of household interest will be excluded from its columns.

Novel Boots and Shoes.

We give illustrations of several novel styles of Ladies' Boots and Shoes, now in the Paris Exposition, which are marvels in the way of workmanship. The first is a very elegant purple-velvet "bottine," bordered with albatros and secured with pearl buttons, the top being ornamented with a bow and tassels. The next is of Bismarck satin, the "talons Louis Quinze" being covered with the same material; the top of this "bottine" is fringed with jet drops and ornamented with a black-lace bow embroidered with jet beads, and having a large jet button in the centre. Of the two shoes, the upper one, which has the toes curved up, is of light-brown leather, the high heels being covered to correspond; across the instep is a broad strap, with a small blue bow and steel buckle in the centre; the shoe itself, together with the strap, is bordered with a ruche of blue ribbon. The "soulier Louis Quatorze" is in scarlet leather, with tall black heels. The front is ornamented with a large scarlet-velvet and white-lace bow. The black edge of the sole of this shoe is embroidered over with a delicate white interlacing pattern. The "botte sport" of black kid is bound and stitched with mauve silk, and has oxydized silver buttons up the side with dogs' heads in high relief, and mauve heels. The collar of mauve satin is ornamented with a couple of medallions, also in oxydized silver, comprising a dog's and a horse's head divided by a huntsman cap and whip, and connected by festoons of chains. The remaining boot, of black kid, is trimmed up the front and round the top with marten's fur.

Home Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—Gored dress of Bismarck poplin. Skirt cut with a small train, and trimmed up the front with satin rouleaux, or piping, plaited, of a somewhat darker shade than the dress, and in the back with bias folds of the same satin, fastened at the ends with jet buttons. Waist and coat-sleeves trimmed with satin folds and rouleaux, to match the skirt.

Fig. 2.—Gored dress of pearl velours, trailing slightly, with peplum of the same material. A long sash of pearl silk is fastened at the right side, and falls nearly to the bottom of the dress. The sash and peplum are trimmed with silk fringe, with tassels on the lappets of the peplum and on the waist, as seen in the illustration. The skirt, waist, and coat-sleeves are trimmed with bias folds of pearl satin.

Fig. 3.—Dress and peplum of violet silk, trailing slightly, and trimmed with violet cord, fringe and tassels, and jet beads. The trimming is put on the skirt to simulate an over-skirt. The peplum is closed in front.

HOME TOILETTES.

NOVEMBER.

Out in the woods the lonely trees
Toss and moan in the autumn wind,
For the birds have flown far over the seas,
And they are left behind.

Bare and cold in the twilight dun,
They pine for the light of summer eves,
When the golden rays of the setting sun
Shone through their glowing leaves.

Far away o'er the purple hills
The little moon is climbing the skies,
And a faint gleam over the water thrills
Where her trembling radiance lies.

The flowers are dead, and the birds are flown,
And the wind blows cold from the chilly sea,
And I think of the days that are dead and gone,
That will never come back to me.

But the flowers will bloom again in spring,
And the birds fly home from over the seas,
And, nestled in sweet green leaves, will sing
All day to the happy trees.

And somewhere, deep in this heart of mine,
Under the sorrow, and care, and pain,
Waiting for April suns to shine,
For April clouds to rain,

Lies a little Hope, like a violet,
Ready to bloom with the other flowers;
And over the grave of my old regret
Springs a dream of brighter hours.

WARM CLOTHING.

THE popular notion that the body receives warmth from the covering, whatsoever it may be, that is put upon it, is, according to science, an error. All the heat we have is of our own making, and is the result of the perpetual combustion going on in us and every living animal. The fat of what we eat, being chiefly carbon, or charcoal, supplies the fuel, and the oxygen of the air we breathe may be considered the fire which burns it. Scientifically, however, it is the act of combination of these two elements—carbon and oxygen—which constitutes the combustion from which results the heat of our bodies.

The only purpose of dress, apart from satisfying the demands of decency and fashion, is to facilitate or prevent the escape of the natural warmth of the animal system. In summer we accordingly try to get rid of it, and in winter, on the contrary, we strive to retain it. The former is done by covering the body lightly with such materials as favor, and the latter by clothing ourselves heavily with such textures as oppose the passage of heat. The dress of summer is accordingly of thin, close texture, ordinarily white in color, and composed of cotton or linen. That of winter is of a thick, loose texture, generally black or dark, and made of silk and wool. This, which is the result of the experience of ages, accords in every respect with the principles of science.

Chemistry divides substances into conductors and non-conductors of heat. Tissues of close, thin texture, such as cotton and linen, are good conductors, and thus are suitable for summer dress, as they conduct away or carry off rapidly the warmth of the body. Thick, loose textures, made of wool or silk, are, on the other hand, non, or bad conductors, and do not conduct away or carry off rapidly the animal heat, and are thus adapted to clothing the body in winter.

Dr. Franklin's experiment proves that color has a decided influence upon the absorption of solar heat. He spread several pieces of cloth of varied tints upon the snow exposed to the warmth of the sun, and found that the snow beneath the black melted the most rapidly, and that below the white the least so. Whenever the wearer is exposed to the rays of the sun he will find a black dress hotter than a white one. In winter, accordingly, he will do well to choose the former, and in summer the latter.

The make as well as the material of the dress has a great deal to do with its warmth. The atmosphere is the worst of all conductors of heat. Accordingly a loosely-made garment, which in its various folds incloses an abundance of air, must necessarily be a greater obstacle to the escape of the warmth of the body than a close-fitting dress. The non-conducting power of woolen and other loose fabrics is mainly owing to the large interstices of the tissue being filled with air.

A loose dress is, moreover, warmer because it admits of the free circulation of blood, while a tight one impedes it by constricting the vessels, and thus hindering that free supply of the element essential to keeping up the brisk combustion upon which depends the due heating of the body.

Winter clothing, then, to be warm, should be of thick, loose texture, as cloth, flannel, and other woolen stuffs, dark in color; and of a cut so flowing that it may embrace within its folds stratum upon stratum of non-conducting air, and so loose as not to pinch any where, whatever may be the motion of the body.

SPARE THE ROD.

"SPARE the rod, and spoil the child," says Solomon, which the severe interpret to mean literally the laying on of the birch, the rattan, and the cat o' nine tails, but which the amiable explain as having merely a figurative signification. These humanely say that the wise King understood by the rod a symbol of discipline, and in advising that it be not spared in the bringing up of the young meant that they were not to be treated with too much indulgence. We confess ourselves in favor of the less rigid interpretation, and as altogether opposed to the use of physical violence in any form whatsoever.

A resort to the rod is the most impotent conclusion of discipline. It is a confession of the want of that moral power which the superior in authority should always possess over the subordinate. It is the exercise of a physical might which is sure to leave with those who may feel its weight a sense of wrong and oppression. Nothing could be more fatal to the affectionate relations which should always exist between parent and child, pupil and teacher, and which are so necessary to make the one patient and the other docile.

A resort to the rod, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, is merely an excuse for laziness or impatience. Without energy or perseverance to pursue a systematic course of moral training, the parent or teacher avails himself of the ready resource supplied by his superiority of muscle. It is so easy to raise an arm or wield a stick! The mere brutal force of man's nature gives that power, and to use it does not even require premeditation. It comes with the flash of anger; for the instinct to wound accompanies the irritation of the human as it does that of other brutes. The blow is doubtless the easier process, and not a disagreeable one to the administrator; for it may be made to fall very heavy on the weak without much cost of effort to the strong, and affords a sensible relief to the pressure of passion. If it were only effective in its purpose the use of it might be conceded to the parent and teacher for its evident facility of application and the gratification it seems to give them. But it is not effective. Virtue and learning to be pursued must be loved, and we are yet to learn that the association of the painful and disagreeable—and to the child the rod, the birch, and the cat o' nine tails are probably both, however enjoyed by those who apply them—is favorable to strength of attachment.

The moral and intellectual discipline of the child is certainly no easy matter, and the sooner the parent or teacher makes up his mind to it the better it will be for all. He should understand that it is not the summary process of a blow given in a spasm of passion, but a serious business, requiring time and patience.

The use of the rod begets an awe of the parent which never leaves the child, so that when he advances in life, if he becomes superior to fear, he yet feels toward father or mother a reserve which prevents that intimate companionship which is the best safeguard of youth against the dangers of the world.

It is not safe to trust the strong with the power of exercising their animal force upon the weak. Parents, though controlled by all the supposed influence of natural affection, have not seldom perverted this claimed privilege to a violence which has even resulted in death. How much greater, then, the risk of trusting the teacher, who has not, and does not profess to have, a love for his pupils! In France there is a law which forbids the application of physical violence to the child under any pretext whatsoever, and the rod is not only thus banished from every school throughout the empire, but from every home but the most brutalized. The use of it is regarded as the practice of any other gross vice. The relations between parent and child, teacher and pupil, are nowhere more tender, and their union more abiding, than in France.

The law should interfere also in our country, and make it a penal offense for any teacher or other than a parent, and perhaps even for him, to raise his hand to a child. With the present license there is what must be considered by those even in favor of the rod excessive abuse. Those who were not supposed to be cruel by nature, and who even have passed in the ordinary relations of life for benevolent men, have as teachers been guilty, unconsciously it may be, of the greatest inhumanity. A late learned professor, whose disposition is said to have been naturally kindly, issued, when master of a school, this edict: The last five boys of the class at the end of each day's lesson shall be caned. The fault, if a fault, was inevitable, and the penalty certain. Could the severe Draco himself ever have conceived so cruel a law as this?

FLORA'S CASKET.

OUR lady readers have, of course, never seen or heard of what the French, who are always contriving the prettiest names for the nastiest things, call an "Étui de Flore," and which may be translated the "Case," or, more freely, the "Casket of Flora." It is not necessary to explain how this ingenious contrivance was first revealed to us; but, having the thing at this present moment of writing in our possession, there can be no more doubt of its existence than of our personal identity.

Nothing could be more charming to look at than the exterior of this floral casket, covered, as it is, with a rich envelope of blue and gold. As the lid, evidently adapted to the delicate finger of woman, rises easily at the gentlest touch, there are disclosed three instruments. These have the look of so many pencil-cases. They too, with their metallic gloss and brilliant damask of silver and gold, strike the eye agreeably. Each one is distinguished by its especial color. There is a silver, a scarlet, and a blue. On opening these there is seen in each that which has the appearance in every respect of a sharpened crayon, which in the silver case is black, in the blue, blue, and in the scarlet, pink. The odor they diffuse, being a strong reminder of the barber's shop, excites a suspicion of the presence of pomatum, which, on investigation, is found to be the chief component part, with a large admixture of coloring matter. Their purpose is manifest. They are implements for the painting of ladies' fancy portraits by themselves. There are all the pigments necessary—the black for deepening the tint and lengthening the line of the eyebrow, the red for giving warmth and color to the cheek and lips, and the blue for heightening the cerulean arborescence of the veins.

Our dames have no occasion, of course, with their natural stock of charms, to avail themselves of these resources of art, notwithstanding Monsieur Poppinjay, of Paris, writes in letters of gold upon his Étui de Flore that it is indispensable pour la beauté de la figure—"indispensable for the beauty of the face." As our countrywomen are above either the necessity or the artifice of painting themselves, it is puzzling to conjecture what these French boxes of pigment are used for in the United States, where there is said to be a large sale for them.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Lionel Gans.

MY DEAR LIONEL,—Last week I had occasion to write a letter to your friend and, I hope, mine, young De Boots, upon his conduct at the St. Nicholas Hotel in New York, which he seemed to think was his own, with all the guests in it, to use or to abuse exactly as his serene highness might choose; and all because he paid his bill and was a selfish young person. I told him frankly that it was in vain to expect to be considered a gentleman—except by those who were not gentlemen—if he did not defer to the feelings of others. Why, my dear Lionel, I heard the other day a compliment to a woman—unless you deny that the truth can compliment, a casuistry upon which we will not now enter—which fairly matched the famous remark of Sir Richard Steele about the Lady Elizabeth Hastings, that "to love her was a liberal education." The conversation fell upon a young married woman, whom we will call Rose Warner; and after a little while, during which several persons had praised her, a quiet man said, "She doesn't know that there is such a person as Rose Warner." I have never heard a simpler or more beautiful tribute to the entire unselfishness of a human being, and if I said De Boots doesn't know that there is any body but De Boots, I should have described him accurately. But, my dear Lionel, I deny that I should have described a gentleman.

I write to you this week, my young friend, because I know how greatly you admire De Boots—how you study his dress, his manners, his personal appearance; how you share his admiration of his model, Mr. Tilbury, and because I see that no model can be more ridiculous for you than the one you and De Boots have chosen. It is easy to see that, although you have but a small salary, and must be closely occupied the larger part of your time in the counting-room of your worthy uncle, whose large family forbids you to expect any thing from him when—at a very remote period, I hope—he shall be called away; yet, notwithstanding all this, it is easy to see that you propose to yourself to be a man of fashion and of pleasure. One day, at high noon, I met you in Madison Square, seated in Mr. Tilbury's carriage, which he drove himself, four-in-hand, upon your way to the Central Park. Mr. Tilbury had liveried footmen, and the whole street stared at his gay equipage, which was simply absurd at that hour in this city, whatever it might have been in London or in any other foreign city. As for Mr. Tilbury himself, perched upon the high box of his barouche, he looked like an inefficient coachman. Yet I know perfectly well, and so did every body else who saw the spectacle, that he thought he was showing New York "a thing or two." So he was. But what kind of thing was he showing us? And I am glad to say that you looked heartily ashamed, my dear young friend, as you ought to have looked. If you had been engaged to any truly sensible young woman, and she had seen you pass, she would have told you in the evening that she perceived you did not wish to marry her. No young man upon a salary, who is engaged to a worthy and lovely young woman in the city of New York, and who means honestly by her and by himself, will go prancing to the Central Park at high noon with the Tilbury set. Of course he will have his enjoyment, he will have his recreation, but at the proper time, my dear Lionel, and in the proper way. The horse-cars to the Park, if you please, in the afternoon or upon a holiday, or in the carriage of some kind friend at an hour when you are properly released from business.

The truth is, that the men whom young fellows of your taste are disposed to emulate are the very men in the whole range of your observation whose example you should avoid. You wish to indulge your social disposition and even your social genius, for you really have that, and you naturally look at the leaders. The leaders? The Chevalier Bayard—ah yes! The Chevalier de Grammont, or Lord Sandwich, or Mr. Tilbury—ah no! The Chevaliers is living and is a nuisance. He teaches people to spend money in a foolish way. He demoralizes society. He erects false standards. He rules by gold and brass. Tilbury is a confidence man. He prevails by "cheek." And after stoutly resisting him for five or six years you find respectable people saying that they must succumb and allow Tilbury to visit them. Yet if Tilbury awoke to-morrow morning a poor man—gone the horses, dinners, yachts, suppers, parties of all kinds—you would never hear of him again. He succeeds neither by intelligence, by taste, by accomplishment, by wit—he succeeds by money merely. And yet all his money can not buy any thing better than horses, carriages, liveries, dinners, suppers, and a crowd of over-dressed people who eat his pâtés and laugh at the giver. My advice to you and to all young men and young women who really wish to buy their money's worth is—beware of Tilbury!

My dear Lionel, there are several persons who upon reading what I have written will think that I mean them. There are Mr. Phaeton, and Mr. Britzka, and Mr. Stanhope, and Mr. Dogcart, who will each cry, "The miserable scribbler says Tilbury, but he means me!" I do not mean them. I mean Tilbury. And he knows it perfectly well. He is not deceived, and when he reads it he will know whom I mean, and he will also know that I am telling the truth. What is the truth? The truth is that Tilbury is a man who promotes the worship of money, and who feebly imitates the habits and life of European high society. And very much wiser people than you, my dear young Lionel, follow him afar off, and delight to be seen with him and to be invited by him. I know worthy people in the City of New York who think it a fine thing to know Thomas Tilbury, and a desirable thing to go to his house to dinner! And those people will sneer at Thackeray as a cynic, and think it horrible not to go to church every Sunday, and loflyly despise what they call extravagance of opinion and eccentricity of conduct! They think young Mr. Tyng "a very queer man," because being an Episcopalian he preaches in Methodist pulpits. "Queer," "extravagant," "eccentric," why, my dear Lionel, these very people are fanatics for the Tilbury parties, for the Tilbury suppers, for the Tilbury set. Their extravagance would make the Regent Orleans blush, and their manners! I wish they were only "queer" and "eccentric."

What is the result of it all? Mothers educate their daughters by the Tilbury standard. The daughters marry smaller Tilburys. The sons, clerks upon salaries of fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars, ape the high Tilbury model, and there is a stupid, insane spending of money for which nothing is bought but demoralization, disease, and disgust. Your correspondent, my friend, is an old gentleman. He has seen this same dull old routine for many and many a day. He knew Mrs. Potiphar when she ruled society. And he has seen plenty of eager young fellows like you sit down to the ridiculous Barnecide banquet and feast upon wind. It leaves a dreadful colic, my dear Lionel, and I advise you to sup elsewhere. If you have a small income, live accordingly. That is good manners upon the great road of life where we are all traveling. If you have a small income, don't hire a large house. Don't go to Tilbury's parties if you feel obliged to give parties in return. Wear coarse clothes, but have them neatly and tastefully made. Taste does not necessarily haunt the most expensive and fashionable tailors. Some of the worst coats I ever saw came from the most celebrated artists in New York. After a time success has its perfect work. When a tailor has become the king of fashion he makes his fashion stand for every thing, and you pay the most money for the smallest satisfaction. I often imagine the chef of clothes standing at some door or window in Broadway upon some brilliant morning, and as the throng of his clients, young, gay, condemn-the-expense kind of gentry come filing along, I see him rubbing his hands with a superior air, and saying, blandly and boldly, "These are our failures!" So they are. The youth don't ask for a tasteful coat, they ask only for one of Chef's coats. And they get it, and they pay for it. But you, Lionel, and all sensible young fellows with slim purses, do you go and instead of letting Chef cut your coats cut him. Some of the handsomest coats in this city were made by men of genius in out-of-the-way streets. They are coarse garments, but they are neat and tasteful and cheap.

Remember, my dear Lionel, that the mass of the inhabitants of this city live upon very much less yearly income than your salary. Heaven forbid that I should praise poverty! I know too many good and generous hearts which are sadly pinched, too many lives that ought to be free and flowing and happy, which are embittered if not soured by the want of that generous elbow-room which money gives. I know the value of money as well as the cashiers of all the National Banks or the Secretary of the Treasury himself. But if I will not praise poverty, neither will I sigh for riches. If I have a thousand a year, or ten thousand a year, I will try to live accordingly. That is the very perfection of good-manners upon this great highway, the world. There is one phrase which few Americans are heroic enough to utter. They are brave in most ways, we all know, and I think I have even heard the same thing said. They are generous, frank, prompt—nobody shall say more, and nobody thinks better of them than I do. But Cromwell had his wart, and King Alfred let the cakes burn; and the one phrase which the American can not easily say is, "I can not afford it." Every excuse but that is readily given. But how many a Lionel—is it not true, my dear young friend?—will tell a lie rather than say that he can not afford it.

It is not very probable, at least I sincerely hope it is not, that you will be called upon to show your heroism upon such a terrible theatre as that upon which so many of our noblest young fellows have lately proved theirs; but you can be a hero, my good Lionel, all the same. You can vanquish De Boots. You can put Mr. Tilbury and his liveries and his insane squandering of money totally to rout. You can bravely wear coarse clothes, and live within your income at whatever sacrifice. This will be a struggle for you; but, depend upon it, it will prove your quality as much as the charge at Balaklava or the immortal days in the Wilderness tested the heroes of those famous battles. Indeed, my dear young friend, if I were to give you in one phrase the secret of true comfort and peace of mind—a piece of concentrated experience as full of wholesome nutriment as a square inch of Burden's essence of beef—I should say to you solemnly, "Don't do what you can't afford to do." And to that end try to discover a little better model than De Boots or Thomas Tilbury. Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

NO very decided change has as yet appeared in bonnets. The foundation of the bonnet is still very small, and it is the profusion of ornament that gives the impression of increased size. The Fanchon is so universally becoming that all efforts to displace it have failed. It has, however, undergone some modifications. The front is much improved by a coronet; and the back, shorn of its point, passes straight over the chignon, and is finished by the graceful Spanish veil. The Marie Antoinette style, and its varieties, are, however, of later introduction. This shape has a more legitimate claim to be called a bonnet, as it has a regularly-defined brim and crown. The brim is usually pointed on the forehead, surmounted by a diadem, and flaring at the temples. Another shape, intended for very young ladies, fits close to the head with a straight front. It is pointed over the chignon, and is precisely the reverse of the remodeled Fanchon.

FABRICS.

Velvet and satin are the principal fabrics. A union of the two is seen in almost every bonnet. Velvet bonnets are trimmed with pipings or folds of satin, and those of satin with rosettes and scarfs of velvet. Uncut and royal velvet is brought out in all the favorite shades, Bismarck, Capucine, Sarde, or pearl color, Celadon, and blue-purple. There was a time when purple was sacred to our grandmothers. It is now worn by the gayest belle. A few bronzed and Italian straws of open pattern are seen, lined with a warm rich color of silk. The Grebe bonnets we have already described. Wide lapels of velvet, lined with satin and bound with a narrow bias satin or fringed at the ends, are handsome strings for velvet bonnets. An edge of blonde sometimes borders the strings. A gilt spray fastens them under the chin, relieving the wearer from the necessity of tying a bow of stiff ribbon that refuses to be graceful. When narrow strings are worn they are of satin or gros grain ribbon, two inches wide. Squares of fine lace are thrown over velvet bonnets, and long barbes fall over the chignon. Blonde and point lace are used with the delicate shades of green and pearl color. Chantilly supplies the drapery to the deep rich colors.

ROUND HATS.

The round hat of this season is the merest apology for a hat, but with the present style of wearing the hair hats must be small in order to be becoming. The shape is as small as can be worn, and the light trimming does not detract from its jaunty appearance. Low crowns and rolling brims prevail, shaped in a variety of ways. The brim may be depressed in front and back, or turned up at one side or behind, or reversed alike all round. High crowns, square and slanting, are displayed, but one seldom meets them on the street. Velvet, plush, and felt are the best materials. A few black and bronzed straws are worn, but Leghorn and crinoline are laid aside for the present. Astrakhan, sealskin, and chinchilla hats are made to wear with paletots of those furs. Scarfs of velvet and satin, trimmed with narrow pipings or folds, and fringed at the ends, depend from the back. Black velvet is trimmed with white satin piping, and white with black. In others there is a tendency to preserve one tone throughout the whole hat, all the materials—velvets, feathers, and lace—agreeing in color. Skating toquets are made of Astrakhan, otter, and chinchilla. For the promenade we have Hungarian hats of ermine and grebe. The turned-up brims of turbans are quite broad in front, sloping narrower toward the back. A pompon of feathers or a gilt spray is the only ornament.

TRIMMINGS.

It is the arrangement and variety of trimmings that produce the novelties of the season. There are new feathers, new flowers, new laces, and new ornaments of jet, gold, and Roman pearl. Instead of willow feathers and long ostrich plumes, we have short ostrich tufts, silver heron feathers, the Swiss bird grebe, pheasants' plumes, and prettier than all others, the delicate marabouts in tufts and fringes tipped with gilt and jet. The new velvet flowers are tastefully mingled with gilt. Velvet leaves are veined with gold, and thistles of downy marabouts are covered with a flagree net-work. Scarlet berries with bronzed autumn leaves, make graceful diadems. Sprays of coral are effectively introduced into evening hats. Parma violets, marguerites, pansies, and wreaths of hawthorn and clematis are exquisitely modeled.

The attempt to have materials and trimmings of a uniform color has led to the introduction of lace of various colors. These laces have a tawdry appearance, and are as much to be deprecated as the profuse use of gilt. One of our most reliable milliners boasts that not a spray of gilt appears on the bonnets made at her establishment. Fastidious people avoid it altogether. We advise that it be sparingly and judiciously used. A small gilt spray or leaf, a gilt-tipped marabout fringe, or pendants of gilt lilies on a coronet, are pretty and in good taste; but the broad bandeaux of yellow gilt, the clusters of grapes and berries, and fringes of bullion, are coarse and objectionable. Jet is carved, and formed into bandeaux and pendants. The seed jet is not used except on illusion. Small ornaments of Roman pearl fasten white lace over-strings. A drop-trimming to correspond surrounds the edge of the bonnet.

VEILS.

The Spanish veil is specially suited to the fanchon, but is worn with bonnets of all shapes. It was originally a straight scarf falling over the chignon, and fastened at the throat with long, flowing strings. Now several forms are given it. Some are cut in a direct line from shoulder to shoulder, while others are pointed at the back. Tulle, dotted with chenille or embroidered with beads, is used for square veils. Colored net and blonde veils are worn long. Guipure and Chantilly are suitable laces for heavy falls over the chignon. The mantilla veil has long tabs in front, hanging loose, or caught together by a spray or small bow of ribbon. Another style laps in front, like the Marie Antoinette fichu. Round blonde veils, to match the color of the bonnet, are fastened near the front and thrown backward. These are graceful, and serve for drapery, which the new shapes require. The stiff brim and flat crown need to be softened and relieved by tulle and lace. Round veils, with long tabs fastened behind, are worn with hats. Of the colored lace veils the Bismarck is prettiest. Puffed trimmings of tulle and blonde on round hats have long ends that serve for veils.

WINTER BONNETS.

Among the many beautiful and novel models we have selected a few to describe for our readers. A Fanchon of moss-green satin is laid in plaits from front to back. Blonde lace Spanish veil at back, fastened under the chin with a pearl ornament. Diadem of china asters and metallic leaves. Narrow strings of green leaves tie the bonnet.

A Trianon of Mexican blue velvet has a square of point-de-gaze thrown over it, with lapels of the lace falling over the chignon. Wide velvet strings, cut bias, and bordered with narrow point. Lace appliqué ornamented on each string.

A Marie Antoinette, intended for a bridal bonnet, is of white terry velvet, with an exquisite lily with long trailing velvet leaves on the left. Marabout feathers with pearl tips over the coronet. Mantilla veil of blonde with the lapels crossed in front and fastened with a feathery ornament.

An Imperial of royal purple velvet. Alternate folds of satin and velvet encircle the brim of this bonnet, enriched at intervals with carved jet ornaments. Bandeau of jet in front. Velvet strings fastened with a jet pin. Another hat of similar shape is of black velvet, ornamented with black marabouts, tipped with the orange red shade called Capucine. Fall of thread lace over the chignon, and tiny bows of Capucine velvet at the throat and amidst the lace strings.

A bonnet of dove-colored uncut velvet is trimmed with a Spanish scarf of Chantilly lace, which is crossed under the chin, and fastened with metallic leaves and acorns. Ostrich tufts are arranged about the front of the bonnet.

Duchesse of Bismarck moiré velvet, with turned up brim and trimmings of satin rouleaux. A fringed scarf over chignon.

Opera Fanchon of marabouts tipped with gilt. Blonde strings fastened low down with a gilt spray. Another of uncut velvet, sarde or pearl color, has a three-cornered net-work of tiny pearl beads by way of ornament.

Black velvet Marie Stuart with a bird of paradise with trailing feathers for its sole trimming. Narrow strings of alternate points of velvet and satin.

TURBANS, TOUQUETS, ETC.

A very stylish hat of black velvet has a reversed rolling brim pointed back and front. The trimming consists of a band of white velvet with fringed scarfs behind. Marabout pompon on the left. A pretty turban suitable for midwinter is of Astrakhan fur, with a short curling ostrich feather for trimming. Another of French gray velvet has a shirred band pointed in front. There is a turned-up brim in the front of this hat. A pompon of silver heron's feathers on one side.

An Italian straw-hat with shallow crown and narrow brim turned up at one side, has rouleaux of scarlet and black satin around the crown, and a long velvet suivez moi hanging down behind.

A Metternich of black velvet has alternate points of white satin and velvet for trimming. In the left is a bird of paradise tail set in a grebe pompon.

A gray felt hat, called the Carlotta, is bound with Mexican blue velvet. Folds of velvet surround the crown and fall in long scarf ends.

A saucy little blue plush hat, the Di Vernon, has the brim turned up on one side only and held by a flat pearl ornament. Another of Bismarck velvet has a brim turned up in front. White and brown ostrich tufts on the left. Rouleau of velvet with scarf trimmed with narrow folds of white satin. Brown and white fringe at the ends.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

Low-necked bodices or corselets of gros grain, with epaulets, and long lappets at the back, are trimmed with bias folds of the same material, studded with jet nail-heads. They are worn over Empress cloths and self-colored merings.

Gored aprons of colored silk are pretty additions to home toilettes. They are embroidered in narrow vines in gay colors, or braided with mottled braid. Two narrow fluted ruffles, bias and bound, are also used for trimming.

Fine linen cuffs, with tiny tucks and scallops, are edged with Valenciennes; the collar to match. Wreaths of gold leaves and berries are sold by the yard. They are mingled with black velvet, and used for head-dresses.

An elegant carriage-dress is of black velvet, sprinkled with gold dust. Plain high corsage and sleeves almost tight. Gored skirt, with train a yard long. A border of black Astrakhan fur around the bottom, sewn on with soutache braid, forms an elegant trimming. Clusters of leaves of the fur, bound and veined with gilt, are placed at intervals along the border. Long ornamented pendants, falling from the waist like sashes, are used to loop up the skirt.

Two colors of ribbon sewn together make becoming cravats for morning wear. Capucine and black contrast prettily. Two narrow ribbons are sewn together at the edges to pass round the neck; the ends in front are finished by knotted silk fringe. May be tied in a bow or fastened with a brooch.

Collars are made of two narrow strips of linen, with an insertion of guipure between.

Sashes of satin, tied in large bows behind, with ends reaching almost to the bottom of train skirts, are much worn with evening toilettes. They may be either of most delicate or most brilliant hues, and are ornamented with lace and pearl passementerie. When white they are embroidered with bouquets of bright colors. The Venetian sash has a brocaded landscape on each streamer, and is heavily fringed. Velvet ribbon, a quarter of a yard wide, and satin, with a vine of velvet leaves in the centre, for sashes. They are two and a half or three yards long, and are loosely knotted at the waist.

Velveteen suits are very fashionable this fall; but this is another caprice that we deprecate. The plainest walking-suits of this material cost sixty dollars, and many of those exhibited cost ninety or a hundred dollars, and after all are only cotton velvet. The same money would buy a suit of poplin or winsey—not quite so showy perhaps as velveteen, but at least not an imitation.

Sets of trimming for handsome dresses are imported with an accompanying plate exhibiting the designs. They consist of epaulets, cuffs, belt with sash, pocket flaps, strips for each seam of the skirt, and butterfly ornaments for the front width.

A convenient new crinoline can be arranged to wear with both short and long dresses. At the bottom is a muslin skirt containing six hoops. Wide tapes fasten this skirt to the waistband. Buckles on each tape lengthen or shorten the skirt.

A pretty morning dress of blue cashmere is loosely gored to be worn with a belt and sash, and trimmed with brown guipure lace. Insertions of the lace are sewn on each seam. A wide lace simulates a deeply pointed peplum. Close sleeves. Brown mosaic buttons.

A light cloth called ladies' cloth is used for promenade suits. A short gored skirt, untrimmed, is worn under a tight-fitting pelisse with small cape.

Invisible green and Bismarck are suitable colors. We have seen a pretty one of mazarine blue embroidered with black. Silk braid an inch wide is the usual trimming.

One of the most elegant novelties of the season is a visiting dress of Bismarck corded silk, with plain corsage, close sleeves, and skirt just escaping the floor. Over this is worn a trained skirt, of tunic shape, reaching only to the knee in front. The material of this over-skirt is watered velvet of a deeper shade of brown than the short dress. The moiré figure on the velvet has a peculiar and novel effect. Short lappets at the back of the belt. A button on the back seam of the train buttons it to the belt lappets, and makes the skirt short enough for walking. Short sleeveless paletot and Marie Antoinette bonnet of the moiré velvet.

PERSONAL.

LORD DERBY, having done all the duty his party could reasonably demand of him, and being in any thing but robust health, proposes to retire from the Ministry. So write some of the quidnuncs of the London press, who go even farther and say that the Duke of Richmond will succeed to the premiership.

Of notable ladies, here and there, the Bazar finds time to stitch together these: ROSA BONHEUR is coming hither next year; Mrs. JESSE BENTON FREMONT is engaged, it is said, upon some literary work, of which she declines for the present to make public mention; the Empress EUGÈNE has folded away in her writing-table a drama which she wrote before she made arrangements with the Emperor; Miss KELLOGG commenced to warble to the Londoners on Saturday the 2d inst. at the same highly pecunious figures paid to PATTI; and PATTI, according to a paragraph we find in a Chicago paper, has shown a manifest improvement this year, great as she was before. She is on the pinnacle of her profession, and almost above the reach of the critics. We hear a good deal about her, and her class, in a gossipy book just published called "The Enterprising Impresario." The greater part of the book, in fact, is a narrative quite personal enough to be fair, of tours in which GRIST, MARIO, PICCOLI, and other celebrated opera singers took part; Mrs. ANN S. STEPHENS has made herself peculiarly independent by her pen, as have those delightful persons, the CAREY SISTERS; FREDERICKA BREMER's Life and Letters are to be published soon in Stockholm, London, and New York; and ELOISE, a daughter of LOLA MONTEZ, is soon to appear in tragedy in Paris.

Some person, intent upon ferreting out how much our prominent millionaires have put by for "self and family," states that JAY COOKE is worth $16,000,000; MARSHALL O. ROBERTS $3,000,000; and that WILLIAM E. DODGE has an income of $1000 a day. As a simple proposition, perfectly understandable and devoid of vulgar fractions, we should prefer to be Dodge.

Sir T. TROWBRIDGE, one of the true heroes of the Crimean war, died recently in London. During battle his right leg and left foot were shot off. On returning to England he was made a Colonel, and received the Victoria Cross direct from the hands of the Queen, who made him one of her aids-de-camp. The story of his life was still further distinguished by the devotion of the lady to whom he was engaged. He offered to release her from her troth; but she replied that she would marry what there was left of him if he was willing. He was, and she did. She died in August last, leaving a young family. The noble deeds of the soldier and the womanly devotion of the wife will be imperishable in story and history.

QUEEN VICTORIA has written to Lord DERBY, suggesting a pension to the widow of Professor FARADAY. The good Queen can not forget how her husband used regularly to take the PRINCE OF WALES and PRINCE ALFRED by the hand and walk over to the Royal Institution, and listen for an hour to England's foremost man of science.

How good and pleasant a thing it is to be a ROTHSCHILD! Just because they managed to get news of GARIBOLDI's arrest an hour and a half in advance of the French Government they made a hundred thousand dollars!

Prince GORTSCHAKOFF, merry man! though seventy years of age, is about to lend to the altar a divorced lady, aged twenty-four. The Emperor is said to favor the affair, because one of his relations likes the woman. GORTSCHAKOFF, however, doesn't see it in that light, but, like a manly old Russian, proceeds on his own account.

Miss NELLY MARSHALL, of Kentucky, daughter of the rebel General HUMPHREY M., is about to change her "local habitation and her name" and become Lady WILLIAM MOSGROVE, or MOSROBE, or some such pretty name.

A young lady, name unknown, has been writing in Fraser's Magazine very pleasant lines about our New York young ladies. She says "their faces are charming. I never could come to America and return unmarried if I were a man. Such sweet, delicate, refined little faces, and such lovely dark eyes!" And then she adds: "The people all look so independent; even the beggars just carelessly request money, and then go away instantly."

Mr. S. S. L., of Boston, is a correspondent, the attractiveness of whose style will at once be recognized by every publisher. Enclosing to us $20, he says: "The Bazar will be a success, and judging from the great demand for it in this section I predict a circulation of not less than 150,000 copies. The six subscribers above named are all located in one room."

Of the crowned females of Europe, ELIZABETH, of Austria, is said to be the most beautiful. A fine portrait of her hangs in the office of Chevalier de LOOSEY, the Austrian Consul-General in this city. The Chevalier is an accomplished diplomatist and thorough Austrian; but his daughter has identified herself with this country by becoming the wife of one of our merchant princes—Mr. HAVEMAYER.

KIT CARSON, FREMONT's old guide in the Rocky Mountains, is supposed by some persons to partake daily of broiled Indian. But he is any thing but formidable in personal appearance. He is only five feet six, has small hands and feet, a sweet mouth, light blue eyes, gentle as a woman's and clear as a boy's, flaxen hair falling to the shoulders, and a mustache. Wears his Brigadier's uniform in a careless, comfortable, half-Indian way. But Kit is a terrible chap in a fight, especially when red skins are about.

Mr. CHARLES KALBFLEISCH, of Brooklyn, is entitled to the special and enthusiastic admiration of every lady in the land. On the day he married Miss JOSEPHINE CONOVER he presented to his wife, as a wedding-gift, a handsome brown-stone house, elegantly furnished, together with a stylish equipage.

Since DOZE's name has come to be a household word whenever art is seen or talked of, it may gratify our lady-readers to know in what a delicious snuggery he passes his time. His studio is situated in one of those quiet, clean, aristocratic little streets that open out of the Champs Elysées. The room has an air of wealth about it—indeed, it is so lofty and spacious that the epic pictures of the Sistine Chapel could almost find room to stand against its east wall. Just now it is peculiarly worthy of attention, as its owner has this year collected together many of his most representative pictures, to be looked at and enjoyed by his friends who have flocked to Paris during the "Exposition."

—Miss JENNY BAKER, a daughter of the Fire Marshal, has been wedded to Colonel HARRY ROCKAFELLAR, who did some gallant things during the rebellion. If HENRY should happen to fall ill we suppose it will be thought all right and proper to "rock a feller."

We perceive no objection.

—Mr. HOME, the Spiritualist, has "popped" to the widow of MORT, the Champagne maker of Rheims, and is to lead that admirable person to the altar forthwith. How much more agreeable to taste one's Meot at Home than to sip it at a restaurant!

—General ADAM BADEAU, Military Secretary to General GRANT, is in town revising the proof-sheets of the first volume of his Life of General G., which is nearly ready for publication. General BADEAU, who is a full Colonel in the regular army, is a person of culture, industry, and tact, has seen much of the world and knows much of men, as might be expected of a gentleman who graduated creditably from the Press of New York.

—ANTHONY TROLLOPE, having resigned his lucrative position in the London Post-office and taken to editing a magazine, proposes to be a candidate for Parliament for one of the constituencies to be formed under the new reform bill.

—The Emperor NAPOLEON, when at Biarritz, does his four-mile walk every day, regardless of the "peltings of the pitiless storm," and the Empress generally accompanies him. He is in pretty "good case"—better than at this time last year, but looks awfully worn, and betrays the presence of a confirmed and incurable malady.

—The late Dr. LEVI SILLIMAN IVES, if he had not renounced Episcopacy and resigned the Bishopric of North Carolina, would have been, for several years prior to his decease, Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church in the United States. On the roll of Bishops he stood next above Bishop HOPKINS, who is now Presiding Bishop. A contemporary thus refers to the services at Dr. Ives's funeral: "So the Catholics of New York have given honorable sepulture to him who sought and found peace in the bosom of the Church. Our brethren abroad will rejoice to know that nothing was left undone to surround the bier of the venerated Dr. Ives, the ex-Protestant Bishop of North Carolina, with all the honors due to his admirable virtues, his spotless character, his exalted position, and the sacrifices he made to become a child of the Church. He sleeps where sleeps the first Archbishop of New York, his friend and his supporter in the trying ordeal of his conversion, in the vaults of that venerable edifice around which so many solemn and sad associations gather. There, too, reposes REBECCA HOBART, the beloved wife of Dr. Ives, and daughter of Bishop HOBART, like her husband, a fervent and exemplary convert to the Catholic faith."

—When the late B. W. GREENE, of Hartford, made his will, and thought, good man, that he was performing a laudable act, he little imagined the naughty conduct it would beget among his relatives, who now come into court and swear they don't believe B. W. G. had mental capacity enough to make a will. The property amounts to about $200,000, and after bequests of household furniture, plate, pictures, etc., to his family, the remainder is divided into one hundred and fifty equal shares, of which the American Tract and Bible Societies, the poor of the Centre Church, Hartford, and Congregational Church, Bristol, Rhode Island, each receive two, and the others are given to relatives.

—Mr. EDWIN A. STEVENS, of Hoboken, is reported to have sold the Elysian Fields to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for $2,000,000. The Bazar may as well repeat what is freely spoken of in the higher financial circles, that the Pacific Mail magnates contemplate the establishment of a line of steamers from New York to Great Britain, to run in conjunction with the Pacific and China lines.

—General LOGAN, a lineal descendant of the big Indian of that name, is not only an effective orator, but a charming story-teller, a skillful violinist, a great mimic, and very agreeable in society. He is very black-hairy and Indian-y in appearance, but that, you know, can't be helped.

—When JOHN JACOB ASTOR determined upon identifying his name with a fine hotel he went to his friend COSTAR to buy his residence, at the corner of Broadway and Barclay Street. Mr. C. being rich declined to sell. Mr. Astor finally made a proposition to him that they should each name a friend, and the two friends should name a third; the three were to estimate the value of the property, and when the price was named Mr. Astor agreed to add $20,000 to their highest valuation, and give Mr. COSTAR a check for the entire sum. The proposition pleased Mr. COSTAR, and he acceded to the terms, and thus Mr. Astor secured the entire plot of ground necessary to the erection of the immense building. The Astor House was completed in April, 1836, and was thrown open to the public on the first day of the following June. SIMON BOYDEN was its first landlord, and he kept the house about two years. Then the establishment passed into the hands of BOYDEN, COLEMAN, & STETSON. After a short experience the firm dissolved, and FREDERICK BOYDEN went to Richmond, Virginia. COLEMAN & STETSON continued the business together for a few months, when Mr. COLEMAN retired from the partnership, and CHARLES A. STETSON assumed the entire management of the hotel, and has since remained its principal proprietor. He is a remarkable man, a fine scholar, a capital speaker, the genial friend and companion of the men whose names are brightest in American history. During the rebellion his hospitality was extended to thousands of our departing and returning volunteers, "without money and without price."

—Sir MOSES MONTEFIORE, whose mission to Roumania has just been crowned with success, is upward of eighty years of age, having been born in 1784. This venerable and honored Hebrew, who has acquired a world-wide reputation for philanthropy and his many journeys to distant countries on behalf of the oppressed of his race, has thus crowned the achievements of a noble life. In his eightieth year he undertook a similar mission to Morocco, and was equally successful. So long ago as 1837 he was Sheriff of London, and was knighted on the occasion of the Queen's visit to the City; he was High Sheriff of Kent in 1845, and is a Deputy Lieutenant of that county; in 1846 he was made a baronet. His wife, JUDITH, a daughter of the late LEVI BARENT COHEN, Esq., died in 1862, without issue, so that Sir MOSES has no child to succeed him in his title, but the name of "Montefiore" will always be honored and respected in England, while his philanthropic labors will be admired by all nations.

DWARF OCTAGON JARDINET.

WINTER GARDENING.

"And who can sing the songs of spring
In dull and drear December?"

WE purpose to give a few easy directions to those who desire to possess at light cost and little trouble a blooming winter garden in their homes, that can be attended to in the worst weather without soiling the hands or wetting the feet.

The hyacinth must rank first in our list as being almost the easiest flower to cultivate.

Hyacinths may be grown in water, in pots, in moss, and in prepared cocoa-fibre and charcoal. The last is the best for hyacinths indoors, in the numerous choices which are used for this purpose. In order to cultivate the hyacinth in the sitting-room in prepared cocoa-fibre and charcoal, place at the bottom of the jardinet, etc., a handful or so of rough charcoal, and fill up with the preparation; plant the hyacinths thickly, associating with them snow-drops, scilla sibirica, early-flowering tulips, narcissus bulbocodium, free-flowering crocus, and, if the space will admit, a few pompon hyacinths; cover the bulbs with the preparation, and neatly cover the surface with nice green carpet moss; the freshness of the moss will be prolonged by occasionally damping it with a wet sponge. Sprinkle the plants overhead with tepid water two or three times a week.

This preparation is free from impurities and possesses a gentle stimulus; the bulbs root freely into it, and produce fine spikes of bloom. Another important recommendation the prepared cocoa-fibre and charcoal possesses is its retention of moisture for a long time. Unless in a very hot room two or three good waterings will be sufficient from the time of planting till the bulbs are in bloom, so that the amateur is relieved from the daily anxiety lest his favorite group of forthcoming flowers should suffer from want of water.

TILE FLOWER-BOX.

HANGING BASKET.

To cultivate the hyacinth in water the following hints are simple, but ample: Use clean rain-water, and let it just touch the base of the bulbs; for three or four weeks keep them in a dark, cool situation. Avoid all disturbance of the rootlets; therefore, never change the water while it remains sweet. As a purifier, place a piece of charcoal in the glass. Never suffer dust to remain on any part of the plant, but remove it daily with a camel-hair brush and water.

To cultivate the hyacinth successfully in moss at the bottom of the jardinet, etc., lay a handful of charcoal, on which place clean moss, and firmly press it down; on this plant the bulbs, and cover them with nice green carpet moss. Water overhead with tepid water, two or three times a week, through a fine rose, till the plants are in bloom.

To grow the hyacinth in pots is by far the most important method of cultivation. At any stage of growth the hyacinth can be removed from its pot without injury and arranged either in jardinet, flower-baskets, or vases, transferred to hyacinth-glasses, or planted in the open border. With a little management beauty and delightful fragrance may be enjoyed from the beginning of January to the end of April, either in the sitting-room or conservatory.

A free, porous soil is indispensable, and one composed of equal parts of turfy loam, thoroughly rotted cowdung, and leaf soil, or, instead of the latter, prepared cocoa-fibre and charcoal, adding about one-eighth part of sharp sand, all of which should be well mixed before being used. This compost, however, can not always be commanded; use instead any good, light soil, mixed with silver sand and prepared cocoa-fibre and charcoal. For one bulb use a four or four-and-a-half inch pot; for three bulbs a five-and-a-half inch pot will be sufficient. At the bottom of the pot place some pieces of charcoal, and on this some rough pieces of turfy loam to insure good drainage; then fill the pot with the prepared soil to within an inch of the top, placing the bulb in the centre, or, if three, at equal distances apart, pressing them lightly into the soil, and filling up, leaving only the crowns uncovered; water moderately, and place them any where out of doors on coal-ashes, or any thing that will secure good drainage; then fill the spaces between the pots with coal-ashes, leaf-soil, old tan, or common cocoa-fibre, and with the same material cover the pots over two or three inches. In five or six weeks the pots will be full of roots, and may then be removed as required.

The crocus can be now procured in many colors, self and striped. To cultivate them indoors with success it is necessary that they are well supplied with water, kept close to the glass, and have abundance of fresh air.

THE PORCELAIN BASKET JARDINET.

EARLY SINGLE TULIPS.—No tulips display so great a variety of delicate, striking, and attractive colors as these. Culture in pots is the same as recommended for the hyacinth; but to produce an effective display three bulbs should be planted in a four or five inch, and five in a six-inch pot. They should be grown close to the glass, and during fine days have abundance of air. Those intended for early blooming should be gently forced as soon as the shoot appears.

POLYANTHUS NARCISSUS.—These are easily cultivated, deliciously fragrant, and associate admirably with the hyacinth for indoor decoration in winter and early spring.

The culture is similar to that recommended for the hyacinth. The bulbs being large we advise one for a five-inch, three for a six-inch, and six for an eight-inch pot.

SCILLA AND MUSCARI.—Scilla amena and scilla sibirica are of the most lovely azure blue, growing three inches high, and flowering as they do in March, make exquisite pot-plants. It is difficult to find a more graceful or elegant ornament than a jardinet full of blooming hyacinths and snow-drops, and the delicate scilla sibirica. We give illustrations of several beautiful styles.

The rustic boxes in our illustrations are to be suspended to a window from strong staples, or to stand on a ledge covered with cloth and fringe inside the windows. Any carpenter will fix one at a trifling cost, and the effect is charming. As soon as spring appears the boxes can be transferred to the outside or to the balcony.

ENCAUSTIC TILE JARDINET.

These boxes are to be filled with a succession of hyacinths, crocuses, snow-drops, tulips, scilla sibirica, narcissus, and pompon hyacinths.

The hanging basket should be suspended where the bird-cage usually hangs, and filled with ferns, the adiantum tinctum, the adiantum formosum, and pompon hyacinths. A bracket, as shown in our illustration, will afford room for a small jardinet of mixed bulbs or a single foliage plant.

LOW GORED FROCK.

MORNING FROCK.

GORED CASHMERE FROCK.

NEEDLE-WORK BREAKFAST CAP.

Gored Cashmere Frock.

This frock, of very cashmere, is fastened on the shoulders, a very convenient arrangement for a child's dress. It is trimmed up the seams, round the bottom, and on the sleeves, with strips of blue velvet, studded with buttons. The under-skirt is of fine white muslin, ornamented at the bottom with a pleated Empire flounce of muslin, which is also trimmed with strips of blue velvet to correspond with the dress. A similar pleated Empire flounce completes the bodice before and behind. A strip of muslin is also pleated in the neck.

Morning Frock.

This frock is made of brown Holland, and trimmed with red worsted braid; it is cut out in deep scallops along the sides of the skirt, in front, round the bottom, and round the sleeves. The bodice is pleated in front and back; and the belt is fastened behind with two lappets. The scallops are bound with worsted braid, and the frock is trimmed besides with a pattern in narrower braid. Brown Holland buttons extend all the way down the front.

Low Gored Frock.

This frock is made of blue cashmere, trimmed with white silk braid and white bugles, and is fastened all the way down the front with crystal buttons. A flounce of white muslin is set under the bottom to imitate an under-skirt. The seam of the flounce is covered with a cross strip of blue glacé silk, ornamented with white bugles. A similar strip of muslin is sewed round the neck and arm-holes. The flounces are edged with narrow lace. The white silk braid is laid on in figures up the front and around the bottom, as seen in the illustration, with white beads and bugles in the figures.

Needle-Work Breakfast Cap.

This cap is composed of alternate strips of muslin, Valenciennes, and needle-work insertion, with an embroidered circular crown, three inches in diameter. The strings are of ribbon, edged with lace, and are about three quarters of a yard long.

Breakfast Cap with Velvet Trimming.

This cap is made of fine muslin, embroidered with set figures, and edged with black velvet ribbon, three-fourths of an inch wide. The strings of white ribbon, three quarters of a yard long and three inches wide, are also edged with the black velvet ribbon. Bows of black velvet ribbon and Valenciennes edging, three quarters of an inch wide on the front and back, complete the trimming.

Lace Cravat.

This cravat is made of lace insertion, five-eighths of a yard long and three-fourths of an inch wide, laid over violet ribbon, two inches wide, and bordered on each side with a full of Valenciennes edging. Small pansies embroidered on muslin are then sewed on the insertion, about an inch apart, and a large pansy is placed in the middle, where the ends cross each other.

Black Lace Fichu.

For this fichu fold a black lace handkerchief, three quarters of a yard square, shawl-fashion, so that the under part falls about three inches below the upper, and makes a pleat at the top of the back, as seen in the illustration. The ends are crossed in front, and fastened with a bow or a rosette.

White Piqué Dress.

This dress is of white piqué, trimmed with blue silk braid and guipure insertion, laid over

BREAKFAST CAP WITH VELVET TRIMMING.

LACE CRAVAT WITH NEEDLE-WORK APPLICATION.

BLACK LACE FICHU.

blue ribbon. The trimming is put on the skirt in such a manner as to simulate an over-skirt, and on the waist to simulate a jacket. An under-waist of pleated muslin, with a needle-work band round the neck, and long sleeves, is worn with this tasteful and fanciful dress.

NETTING.

ALICE, my own one, even yet
That evening I can well remember,
When round the fire we three were met—
That evening in the dark December—
We three—your aunt, yourself, and I.
I lingered still, though late 'twas getting—Must I be gone? Well, by-and-by—
And you, my Alice, you were netting.

Your aunt—duenna kind—sat there,
With head o'er book discreetly bended;
To writer's words could reader ne'er
So very closely have attended.
And you and I seemed all alone,
Her very presence then forgetting;
A thousand themes I chatted on,
While, Alice darling, you were netting.

I think I asked you what poor prey,
What bird while bent upon an airing,
Would be a prisoner some fine day
In that same net you were preparing.
And then you blushed; I smiled, and though
On the event I might have betted,
I started, for I thought—and lo!
I found—'twas I who thus was netted.

I yielded to my destined fate:
Your loving heart, your tender graces,
Your sunny smiles—these were the bait—
The sweetest face of all sweet faces!
Well, Alice, well; though years have gone
Since then, those hours I've ne'er regretted,
Nor thought, save thankfully, upon
The way in which I then was netted.

THE DETRIMENTAL.

"TELL you what, Frank," said Mrs. Beauchamp, "I can't allow any more of this. You mustn't go on playing moth to that flame any longer; it's getting dangerous, and your wings will be horribly singed, mon enfant!"

I happened to be just two years younger than the speaker, which, of course, gave her every right to be maternal.

We were sitting when she delivered herself of this wise counsel in her petit salon, in Curzon Street, over post-prandial coffee, and sobus cum solâ, while her lord, the Right Honorable Brandon, was snoring, in the travail of digestion and his place upon the Treasury Bench, a martyr to his sense of duty and of an impending division.

Brandon Beauchamp was a very worthy man; and I believe Madame was fond of her liege, who was liberal and long-suffering toward her in all matters, as became a husband twenty years or so his wife's senior; but no doubt she found him a decided bore en tête-à-tête; and being bored was not to Carry Beauchamp's taste; so they didn't see much of each other.

Madame took her chocolate in her dressing-room, and came down to her knife-and-fork breakfast about the time that Brandon was pounding down to his office. Except when there was a duty-dinner in Curzon Street, the Right Honorable, if he dined at all, did so in the Eleusis or in the House. And as Madame was out every night during the season, and her lord, whenever the Commons rose early, went direct to his bed, they got on well together, and people voted theirs a pleasant ménage.

So it was, no doubt. Mrs. Beauchamp flirted a good deal, well "within the line," of course, in public, but still a good deal; and Brandon seemed to think it all right. Mrs. Beauchamp spent as much money as she liked (she had been a penniless belle, and naturally got through three times the amount that an heiress would have required), and Brandon filled up the checks for her without a murmur. And she came and went at her own sweet will; gave the pleasantest dinners and the jolliest balls; rode the most perfect park hack; drove a phaeton and pair of ponies almost as unexceptionable as Anonyma's; amused herself like the "Reine Gaillarde," as Guy Livingstone called her; and, apparently, troubled herself no more about the man to whom she owed every thing than she did about yesterday's bouquet, or the glove that had served its turn.

Beauchamp seemed to take all this as a matter of course. I dare say he had got to look upon it in that way now. But whether the life he led was what he had looked forward to when he made Carry Luttrell, the last of a long "string," with nothing but her dash, her debts, and her dangerous dark eyes, his wife, is doubtful.

Whatever he had expected, he made no murmur that the world ever heard of what he got. Stupid as his wife thought him, Brandon Beauchamp, in every thing but marrying her, was a wise man. He made the best of his bad bargain, and kept the secret of what he suffered close.

Mrs. Beauchamp and I who speak to you had spent half the autumn in the same country-house the year before. The admirably-managed and skillfully-graduated flirtation between us, which had begun there, and reached an interesting stage for both by the time the first snow lay upon the ground, had passed since through the usual phases, and had now become the quasi-maternal interest in my well-being before hinted at on her part, and a combination of filial and fraternal admiration and devotion to match on mine.

So when, that night, Mrs. Beauchamp sermonized me over her coffee-cup about playing moth to a certain dangerous flame, I listened to her with becomingly patient attention.

"It's awfully kind of you, Mrs. Beauchamp," I said, dropping quietly into a low seat beside her sofa—it's awfully kind of you to take such an interest in my wings. But I've grown very cautious now. There's no danger, I assure you. I can take care of myself, thanks to your teaching."

"I don't know that I taught you to be impetuous, though."

"A Dieu ne plaise!" I murmured.
"And as to taking care of yourself, my poor boy, that's absurd, you know," she went on, tapping my arm with her fan. "You all think that till you find out your mistake. Frank, I tell you this is getting dangerous."

"No; it's quite safe yet."
"Yet? And how long will 'yet' be? Till the next after-supper fast-dance she gives you; or the next five minutes you have alone with her on the stairs or in the conservatory. Bah! I know all about that sort of thing."

And, to do her justice, she certainly did.
"And if you lose your head, as (cool hand as you think yourself, Sir) you will do, what's to become of you, I should like to know? Of both of you?"

"Well, I don't see why, after all—" I began.
"Nonsense!" she interrupted, ruthlessly. "The thing is not to be thought of for a moment. Do you suppose they would dream of allowing it? You're a Detrimental, you know, Frank; and Leila, poor child, sans sou ni maille."

And Madame spoke with as lofty a compassion for Leila Lenox in her tone as though she herself had never been in the same category.

As she said, the thing was not to be thought of for a moment; but I was very hard hit, and did think about it a good deal more than was good for me. For, supposing I could have managed to overcome the natural instinct that makes men in their sober senses crane and shy at matrimony in this our day, I had about as much chance of marrying Leila as I had of espousing a Princess of the Blood.

Not that she hated me by any means; we quite understood each other. But, of course, Miss Lenox had not lived nineteen years in this best of all possible worlds, plus three months of London season, for nothing; especially when, as was the case, her bringing up and bringing out had been superintended by that wise woman, her mother, in person.

Mrs. Lenox knew perfectly well what her daughter ought to fetch in the ordinary course of things, and fully meant to get her price, and any thing she could over and above. So, after two years of hard training, Leila was duly entered for her first season; had received a capital start; was sailing away in the front quite easily; and admirably piloted, hitherto, by her experienced old jockey, was looking uncommonly like a winner.

It was absurd to suppose that she would fling away her chance for my sake, however much she might prefer me to the parti of the maternal choice; or that Madame Mère would ever let her.

But even a Detrimental may have an innings now and then; and I was having mine.

I knew perfectly well how the game would end; that I must be beaten. But the knowledge only made my play more coolly audacious.

I watched, seized, and made the most of every sort of opportunity: I became one of the tormentors and the worries of Mrs. Lenox's hard-working life; I knew I should get no quarter from her, and I gave her none in the harassing guerilla warfare I kept up against her.

And I think I had won my way, by the end of the season, to what I suppose Leila Lenox would have called her heart.

So there were fair grounds for her mother's detestation of me, and for her rage at the tranquil persistency with which I kept my innings against such a great creature as Richard Carkill, whom she was doing her deadliest to make her son-in-law.

Fair grounds, too, for Carry Beauchamp's maternal warning.

Mrs. Beauchamp finished her coffee before she spoke again; and I sat silent too, thinking of ugly Dick Carkill, his ingots and his insolence; and wondering whether my dainty little Leila had calculated all the results of her bargain, in no particularly pleasant frame of mind.

"What is it, mon enfant?" said my monitress at last, putting me with her hand this time; "brooding over your wrongs?"

"Admiring your dress," I returned, rousing.
"I dare say. Well, if you have done admiring it, perhaps you will ring the bell for Florine."

"What do you want Florine for at this hour? It's only half past ten. You can't be going any where for another hour, you know."

"And pray what am I to do here for another hour? Do you know, Frank, I'm afraid yours is a bad business. I'm afraid your wings are singed already, my poor child. You are getting just the least bit in the world stupid; you've said nothing for nearly ten minutes."

"Ergo, I'm stupid! You can't expect me to sit and look at you, and say very much, you know."

"I don't expect you to sit and look at me, and think of Leila Lenox, Sir!"

"Very good. I'll go away, then."

"And think about her all the more? No, I don't want you to think about her at all, Frank."

"You always had a taste for exacting the impossible."

"Ring the bell, please. Thanks. Ah! impossible, is it? Plus fort que soi, and that sort of thing?"

"Don't chaff me about it, please. I can't stand that from you, Car."

The name slipped out without my knowing it. She saw that, and let it pass.

She came to me where I was standing, with one arm on the mantle-piece again, and put her little gloved hand on my shoulder, like an elder sister. All the badinage had departed out of her dark eyes; there was a look in them that, though they rested tenderly on another man, Brandon Beauchamp need hardly have been angry at. "Chaff you?" she said; "is it as serious as that?"

The door in the drawing-room beyond opened. She took her hand off my shoulder, and turned round. Mademoiselle Florine appeared at the opening between the portières.

"My burnous," Madame ordered, "and the carriage in ten minutes, tell Charles." Exit Mademoiselle Florine. She turned back to me. "If you are as far gone as that, Frank," she said, in her woman's elliptical way, "the mischief's done, I'm afraid! There's nothing left for me to do but—"

She stopped and smiled deliciously on me as I looked up at her.

"But what?" I asked.
"But to be as foolish as you are, and help you."

"Oh, Car, how kind you are to a fellow!" She drew away the hand my lips were pressed on gratefully; but with no very rigorous haste.

"There! That will do. And, Frank, you've called me 'Car' twice within the last five minutes."

"Have I? well, you know—"

"Yes; I know what you mean. I call you 'Frank,' tout court. That's very different. I'm old enough—at least, I feel old enough—to do that. I should call you so before Brandon. But I'd better be 'Mrs. Beauchamp' to you, if you please, now."

Now I was going to give up Platonic dalliance with her for the real thing with somebody else, she meant. Even though she had promised to help me, though she had spoken and felt two minutes before as an elder sister might have done, the natural woman in her could not resist putting that "now" into her last speech.

"You are my good angel; you always will be that to me."

"I doubt if I am! It's not a wise business I've promised to help you in. But, still, I do promise. Where are you going to-night?"

"Nowhere."

"Which means to the club smoking-room. But you had a card for Lady Dorénavant's to-night?"

"Yes. But, you see, Leila told me in the Row, yesterday, that—"

"That they weren't going? And you believed her? When mamma could hear every word she said. Allons, donc!" And Mrs. Beauchamp laughed pleasantly.

"Absurd on my part, I dare say. But it appears there's some one dying—a relation."

"The relation is a cousin half a dozen times removed, down at Cheltenham, from whom Mrs. Lenox has no expectations whatever. And he's no more dying than he has been for the last year."

"Then you mean—"

"That Mrs. Lenox isn't likely to stay away from Lady Dorénavant's to-night for that reason. In short that Leila will be there, and—"

"The carriage, Madame!" announced a servant, from the door of the other room, discreetly.

"And," concluded Mrs. Beauchamp, while Florine induced her with a burnous of my pet color, sempitern blue, "I am going there early, as I promised; and I will take you with me, if you like."

In five minutes we were rolling down Piccadilly on our way to Eaton Square.

"Madame Mère will be properly savage at my bringing you, Frank," Mrs. Beauchamp said, laughing; "the great Carkill is to be there to-night, I hear."

"Is he?" I returned, tranquilly. "It will be rather fine, if Leila happens to be in a punishing mood. She'll give me half a dozen fast dances, and drive the prize-parti frantic with jealousy and the sense of his helplessness. He can't keep his face in order at all; scowls when he's wroth; and looks perfectly imbecile with delight when she's a little civil to him."

"He's so hard hit, poor man!"

"Poor man, indeed, if he's hard hit with her! Nice life she leads him, doesn't she?"

"It's like your vanity to think you get all the douceurs," she laughed; "she's only bringing him on, mon enfant; and using you to the audible end. Leila is a clever girl. It is very silly of Madame Mère to make the fuss about you she does. I shouldn't, I know, in her place. Don't you see that, as Algy West Endleigh would say, you 'make the big one gallop'?" He gets more eager than ever when he sees that, for all his money, he can't quite make sure of the girl yet; that she actually neglects him to flirt outrageously with you under his eyes. You Detrimentals are very useful, after all; I've always said so."

"You're very kind to us, I know," I answered, passing over the patronage from her; "and if I am useful, you know, why I'm paid for it, in this case; which is more than Carkill can say."

"Paid for it, are you?" she said, turning the dark eyes, with the "good" look in them, round to me; "Frank, I should like to see you getting better pay than this."

"Should you? How?"

"Why, Leila is—never mind what. And you are wasting—"

"Treasures of affection et cetera on a never-mind-what? Well, there's nothing very unusual in that. Et puis que cela n'amuse? But go on."

"She never means—"

"Did I ever say she did?"

"She's no more heart than—"

"Than the average of her kind. Did I ever believe she had?"

"She'll drop you by-and-by, like—"

"Like a wise young woman of the period. Did I ever believe she wouldn't?"

"What do you believe?" she said, provoked.
"I believe in you, Car!" I said, very softly, and, this time, without rebuke.

"But how comes 'Dirty Dick'—he did some objectionable thing in a speculation once, and his city sobriquet sticks to him—to be at Lady Doré's?" I asked, presently, when we were being blocked up, as usual, in the narrow gorge of Halkin Street. "I thought she had set her face steadily against the invasion of the 'House' and the 'Lane'?"

"So she did; while it was any use. But to keep them out is to keep every body out now-days, you see. Why, there's Augustus Wing, the leader of the Cotillion, he goes down to the City and does something with sugar, every morning of his life, before Park. I don't mean to say he touches it, you know, or has a shop there. But he does something with sugar, and he says he makes two thousand a year by it. Then, look at Charlie Papillon, who goes every where, and is engaged to Lady Berengaria Fitz-Fraise! He does something with coffee. In great sacks, you know. But he sells coffee, and makes his two thousand a year, I dare say, too. Fancy! Perhaps you and I were drinking some of Charlie's coffee just now! In fact—Mrs. Beauchamp went on—"in fact, every body goes there. Lord Hautenbas is the chairman of a brewery company. Sir Stretton Stratton is a wine-merchant. Lord Lackland is a director of the Golconda Hotel. A dozen duke's sons give their names to this or that board; and sit there, too, in easy-chairs, for three guineas an hour, five days a week! That always seems the easiest business of all to me. The only people who don't go, I believe, are the Household, who get their money-matters arranged in Clifford Street; and people like you, Frank, who couldn't do any thing when they got there. The consequence is," she continued, "that Mr. Carkill has as much business in Eaton Square to-night as most other people."

"Mrs. Lenox hopes he has more, I shouldn't wonder," I said; "she must wish the golden calf would make up his mind to bleat what she wants. He's said nothing to Leila yet."

"Hasn't he?" she took me up; "how do you know?"

"Enfin, I know," I responded.

"I see. And Leila intends not to let him, if she can help it, till the season is just over. Well; of course, you—"

"Of course, I mean to have as long an innings as I can, belle dame. 'Dirty Dick' must go on bowling a bit longer."

"But he'll bowl you out, you know, in time."

"Just so. In time. I know that. But I have the mean time, don't you see?"

She shook her head rather dubiously, but said no more.

The carriage pulled up the next moment, and I was handing her out on to the foot-cloth under the striped awning.

I waited dutifully for her till she emerged from the cloak-room, and then we began to scale the staircase. It was still rather early, and Lady Dorénavant was "under arms," and at her post in the little blue boudoir that opened on the ball-room.

"My dear Car!" she cried, when she caught sight of us. Lady Dor was rather an enthusiastic person in her loves and likings. "How good of you to come so early! How do you do, Mr. Drasdy?" she went on, turning to me, when she had at last released "dear Car's" two hands. "Pray go and dance. There are so few men come at present."

"Come on purpose," I replied; "but I must find Mrs. Beauchamp a seat first. The Lancers are made up, I see."

And then Mrs. Beauchamp put her hand on my arm again, and we moved away.

"I suppose I'd better let you off that first valse you asked for, just now, Frank?" she said. "Look over there."

I looked over there, and saw, with a crowd of men round her, Leila Lenox; but not "Dirty Dick."

"Where's he?" I asked.

"Mr. Carkill? Isn't he with her? No. Why—look! There he is, wedged up in that corner, poor man, by the door. He's dying to get at her, and can't move hand or foot. You'd better go to her, before he gets out. I'll stop him, if he breaks loose too soon."

"What a good angel you are!" I ejaculated, in my gratitude. "I shall come back to ask you for number five, you know."

"Soit! And now, go."

Madame Mère was raking the room up and down in search of her man, possibly because she was under the fond delusion that I shouldn't be there at all; she never caught sight of me as I crossed the room.

But, over the broad shoulder of Cairngorm, S.F.G., as that warrior bent down to beg for his valse, Leila saw me. Rapid telegraphy between her eyes and mine; the least little flush across her cheek, a certain quickening of my own pulse, and I was standing covered from the maternal view by Cairngorm's broad back, waiting till the Guardsman had recovered his perpendicular to slip by him and get to her.

"No," Leila was saying, "not number three. Colonel Cairngorm; that's an old engagement: number seven, or number fifteen."

"Say both?" he petitioned, in his cool way. "Awful time between 'em, you know. Eh?"

"I said 'or,' I thought."

"Mean it? Well, then, I'll take number seven."

He scored his great double C on her card; and then Cosmo Cairngorm turned on his heel and discovered me.

I was beside her in a moment; on the blind side of mamma, of course.

Under cover of the rattle and clatter of the last figure of the Lancers I managed to say, unheard: "You are here, then, after all?"

"Yes; we had better news from Cheltenham," she answered, demurely; "and so mamma decided to come."

"How good of mamma! No; she's not looking this way. She's looking straight across at that mob by the door. The great man is in the middle of that mob, a prisoner. You should have seen his face when he caught a glimpse of you standing here. And may I have number three? The Lancers are just over; and—you kept it for me? Oh, Leila, how—no; she is looking over there still. She hasn't even seen me yet. Don't you think we'd better go before—?"

"If you like," she answered submissively, putting her hand on my arm, that closed forthwith upon it. And then we moved away before Car-kill had freed himself from duance, and before Madame Mère was aware that her daughter had left her.

She looked adorable that night in her white robes, with one pale amber rose on her bosom, and one other nestling in the coils of her bronze-brown hair—that child with the face and the innocent eyes, who had yet learned all her feminine arithmetic, and had made up her astute mind to sell her dowerless self, for "Lands in Kent and messuages in York, To Richard Carkill, with his watery smile And educated whisker."

Leila, as Mrs. Beauchamp had said, was a clever girl.

They began to play that valse of vales—the "Wien, mein Sinn"—before Leila and I had reached the top of the room.

"I'm not going to lose a bar of this," I said, as I let loose the hand that lay close under one arm, and put the other about her.

"No, don't," she said, as we swung into the circle; "we shan't have many more like it." I couldn't see her face as she spoke; but I fancied I guessed what she meant.

"I suppose not," I said; "how many?"

"As many as you like to-night."

Ever such a little emphasis on the last word—but enough.

"And after to-night?"

"After to-night—ce sera différent!"

That was my sentence; prettily passed in three words of French, but irrevocable, I knew; and bitterly hard, I felt.

I held her closer to me, with a sudden clasp she did not resent. I could see her face now; but not her eyes. She kept them half-closed, and bent down. And her delicate pale face was paler than it had been.

"Leila! you can't mean—?" How well I knew all the time that she did mean it!

She had never heard that tone in my voice before; perhaps it was a little revelation to her now.

She lifted up her eyes; how naïve and innocent they looked! she lifted them up to mine as she murmured:

"Don't speak to me like that, Frank. I—I can't bear it." And, even in that close clasp, I could feel her shiver.

Round the circle; past Madame Mère and "Dirty Dick," in happy conjunction at last, and glowering at me; past Carry Beauchamp, who in the middle of her flirtation with Cosmo Cairngorm, S.F.G., had time to give me a glance, half-encouraging, half-pitying, as Leila and I went by; past Charlie Papillon, come to a halt as usual with his terrible fiancée, the Lady Berengaria Fitz-Fraise, in their first turn; swiftly and smoothly round and round again; and neither she nor I had spoken, after those last words of hers.

What could I say? I had known all along it must needs come to this, sooner or later; it had always been tacitly understood between us.

She had her way to make, and a mother of England to help her. "Dirty Dick" could buy her, just as he could buy a Derby crack, with a sack full of guineas; and I couldn't pay her milliner's bills. The prize-parti was going to bid for her; and she and mamma had made up their minds to accept him. It was the simplest thing in the world, the plain A B C du métier: what had I to say against it?

There was a good deal I might have said. At five-and-twenty something stronger than ice-water runs in a man's veins, you know; and to look down on that pale little face that drooped toward my shoulder; to see how fair it was; to feel that lithe, slender form shiver in my arms; to meet the dimmed look in the soft eyes; to know that, hard and selfish and heartless as they had schooled her to be, "a something wild within her breast" was stirring then—that, as she never had loved, and never would love if they had their way with her, she loved me—to do this, and yet keep cool, and hold one's peace, was rather hard work.

She saw that when she looked into my face again.

"You are tired—we are going too fast? Shall we stop?" I said, after that look.

"No, don't stop; our step doesn't tire; and you said you didn't want to miss a bar of this; I don't either."

I didn't ask her to stop again.

"Suppose I hadn't been here to-night?" I asked presently, "after what you told me yesterday—"

"It was true," she said; "I didn't think we were coming."

"And if you hadn't? or if I hadn't?"

"Well?"

"Could it have been 'different after to-night' just the same?"

"After to-night, or after to-morrow night, what does it matter?"

"Nothing, of course."

"You need not sneer. Do you think I am not sorry that—"

"That what?"

"But there must have come a last night," she went on, wisely beginning a fresh sentence; "and it has come."

"To-night?"

"Yes."

"Leila!"

"Call me Leila, if you like, till this is all over; but don't look like that at me, Frank. We have four hours more, perhaps; let us make the most of them."

"Good! Let us make the most of them. How many vales will you give me?"

"As many as you like after number seven."

"After number seven? Ah, I see, les convenances. We mustn't forget them, even to-night."

"Unkind!" she said, with her reproachful eyes; as if I were in the mood just then to prophesy smooth things to her.

"Well, after number seven; after due sacrifice has been made to the British fetish, you belong to me for to-night?"

"Yes."

The valse came to an end the next moment; luckily, perhaps, for both of us.

"Take me back to mamma at once," Miss Lenox said; "and go and dance with Mrs. Beauchamp, and your usual partners."

"All right; I understand. Go and ko-too to the fetish! Very well. Watch and see how well I shall do it. And when Cairngorm has had his valse—"

"Come and fetch me."

I staid a little while talking to Mrs. Lenox with an outwardly bland tranquillity which I knew, in my case, was especially irritating to that model mother; though, happy in the thought that my innings were nearly played out, she was less hostile than usual in word and look to me that night.

Then I went away, leaving Leila beside "Dirty Dick," whose physiognomy presented a curiously-mixed expression of calf-like adoration for her and intense dislike to me, which caused me to indulge in secret and bitter laughter.

"That idiot actually thinks that child cares for him!" I thought, as I crossed the room to where Mrs. Beauchamp was sitting with her devoted Cairngorm at her side still; "cares for him. Richard Carkill, per se! Well, I hate him bad enough, it's true—the insolent cad; but, by Jove, his worst enemy couldn't wish him heavier punishment than he'll get if he marries her."

"Well?" questioned Mrs. Beauchamp, when I had sat down beside her, and her broad-shouldered Cosmo had taken himself away.

"Well," I responded; "you'll be delighted to hear it's all right—every thing settled à sou-hait."

"What do you mean?"

"She means to take the great creature's offer, and the great creature itself, for better, for worse. The better for her; the worse for him, you understand."

Carry Beauchamp's lip curled a little. In her sympathy for me she quite forgot that she had taken the Right Honorable Brandon on precisely similar terms.

"I always told you so, Frank," she said; "Leila is—"

"Perfectly right. She's backed by no end of precedent, you know. And who wouldn't snap at 'Dirty Dick,' if she got the chance? You and I oughtn't to fling very hard at her. You, because you can afford to be generous; I, because I'm going to marry Miss Molasses or the Begum—whichever makes the most eligible offer. And now, Mrs. Beauchamp, may I have the pleasure of this gallop with you?"

"No; sit down and talk to me. It will be better for you."

"Impossible. I've promised to do ko-too to the British fetish—pour cause, you understand. In other words, I'm bound to dance the next four dances. If you refuse me this one I shall go and relieve poor Charlie Papillon at the wheel, and make a sensation with his Berengaria."

She looked up in my face rather curiously. I suppose she saw what was the matter with me there, for she gave me the gallop I asked for without another word. Carkill the great was performing in it with Leila. We passed them in one of their frequent halts; and, for some reason or other, instead of scowling as usual, "Dirty Dick" actually smiled upon me in a most benignant manner.

So did Mrs. Lenox, when, by-and-by, I went over to her intrenchment among the watchers of the game to claim her daughter for number eight.

Something—it wasn't very hard to guess what—that Leila had said or done had made them both feel that they could afford to be civil to me now; my innings was very nearly played out.

Smiling back upon them, but raging inwardly with a sort of cold rage that strung every nerve like steel wire, I took "Dirty Dick's" fiancée—as I supposed she was by that time—away upon my arm.

The next two or three hours seemed to pass in a sort of waking dream.

Leila was as good as her word. She gave me every dance I asked for; flung over every man upon her card; let me take her down to the supper-room, where she made-believe to eat mayonnaise, and I swallowed tumbler after tumbler of "dry" while I waited for her; sat as long as I chose in the deserted blue boudoir; and bore all my decorously-veiled bitterness and anger like a martyr.

Presently she and I were standing quite alone among the dwarf-palms round a miniature fountain in Lady Dor's winter garden.

The square-dance before the final gallop was just beginning. The ball-room had thinned considerably.

As we had passed through it five minutes before I had seen Mrs. Lenox still in her old place, smiling beatifically, and apparently quite easy in her maternal mind. But "Dirty Dick" was no longer beside her, nor to be seen any where.

Neither had troubled us since I had carried off Leila from between them. I looked at her as she stood beside me among the dwarf-palms with bitter rage in my heart against her, thinking what a price she must have paid to purchase undisturbed disposal of these last hours of our last night.

Presently she lifted her head. Her eyes met mine, and dropped; I could see her lip tremble.

I forgot my wrath as I forgot my worldly wisdom then; I admit I fairly lost my philosophic equilibrium. I was bending down; her hair was touching mine; her breath on my face; my arm was round her; and—

Eh! diable, que voulez-vous? I couldn't help it. Mindful of that one wild moment, when the blood burned like fire, and the pulse gave one great leap and then stood still, I don't know that I would have helped it if I could. And you, Monsieur?

She had slipped with a little cry from my arms; the next moment white as her draperies, looking at me strangely out of her great gray eyes, half-blind, shivering, faint. It had indeed come upon her with rather overwhelming suddenness, this new experience.

"You must never see me again after that," she panted, holding out her little hands before her, and still shrinking back.

I caught her hands in mine and drew her to me.

"No, no," she half sobbed; "let go my hands, Frank!" She was frightened for once in her life, that cool little girl; as much by what she felt herself as by me.

I laughed as I loosed her.

"Soyez tranquille!" I said; "what are you afraid of?"

In a little while she felt her feet again.

"Why must I never see you again, Leila?" I asked then.

"Can't you guess? Why did you do that? Horribly cruel!"

Perhaps it was. I made no defense any how.

"No," I said; "I can't guess; at least I won't guess. Tell me why."

"I tell you we must see each other no more after to-night."

"Because—?"

"Because—I have promised."

"Promised? Promised yourself to him? You shan't do this, Leila!"

"If you talk like that I will go away. It is too late to tell me that now."

As if it would have been any good to tell her so before; as if she would have given up "Dirty Dick" for me if I had spoken a month ago. Yet that was what she wanted me to believe, I suppose.

"Too late to tell you you shan't give yourself to this man? No, stop!"—for she made a move as though she would go to this—"stop, and listen to me. I tell you so because I love you, Leila; because you—"

"No!" she said, passionately; "I will not bear this; it is too cruel! Let me go!"

"You knew I loved you."

"You have no right to say that. You laugh and sneer at every thing, Frank. What do you care for? You care for nothing. You have never cared for me; not really cared, as a man does who—and now you tell me that—"

And here another sob choked her.

"And you think he cares for you really?" I began bitterly; "this cold-blooded plutocrat they're trying to tie you to?" Then the sight of her made my tone change. "Leila, you know no man loves you as I do. In your heart of hearts you know that. Let your heart speak to me now. What is his love to mine? What is yours for him? Love is love, darling! There is happiness at least for us in ours. Don't fling the happiness of our two lives away."

Bah! I must have lost my head, indeed, to talk like that to her, and actually to feel and mean every word I said and all that I implied. I must have been quite mad. I, impecunious, to talk to her, also impecunious, about hearts, and happiness, and love; to feel that we two could exist on those pretty words and five hundred a year: to mean her to put her little hand into mine instead of "Dirty Dick's"; and on such terms to give herself to me forever instead of to him! Allons donc! I must have lost my senses. Fortunately, though, Leila hadn't lost hers.

It was all very pleasant to be talked to in that way; but it was only pleasant, not profitable in the least. So little Leila had quite made up her mind what to say when I had done, and was standing—white, eager, anxious—waiting for her answer. She had kept her face hidden in her hands all the time; and she didn't lift it from them now; but in the most musically heart-broken accents that ever fell on soup-irant's ears, my darling murmured:

"Oh, Frank! It is too late."

Nothing could be more pathetic than her tone, and that little movement of her shoulders expressive of emotion. A little stazy, the last, perhaps; but still pathetic.

The fire died out in me as if I had been under a douche. I had got back my own face and my own voice the next moment; become my proper self once more.

"I see," I said; "it is too late—for what we have been talking about. Brisons là-dessus. But it isn't too late, I hope, for the Pluie d'Or? That hasn't begun yet. The last gallop, I mean."

Up came the reproachful eyes again.

"Frank, I didn't think you could have been so—"

"So merciless as—"

"Yes."

"As to ask you for another fast-dance? I thought you promised me—"

"You know I didn't mean that."

"Your promise, or the other thing. No matter! I know what you do mean now, Leila. But am I to have this gallop?"

I had it. Whirled her through it to the very last bar, without a check.

Then I was down stairs putting her cloak about her; Madame Mère waiting outside in the carriage.

"Say good-by kindly," she whispered, piteously, while I was unfolding the burnous.

"Why not? Stop; I think I've put it on the wrong way."

"Say it, then!"

"Good-by, Leila! There, that's right, isn't it?" as I settled the burnous at last. "You mustn't stand in this draught."

She didn't seem to mind the draught; and if my fingers hadn't been quite so quick and steady she would doubtless have been just as well pleased. I led her across the foot-cloth. Our hands parted; the man shut the door upon her; and Mrs. Lenox's brougham drove away.

And I was left, certainly not lamenting, on the Eaton Square pavé, with a pale amber rose crushed in my hand.

My innings was played out that night. Leila Lenox is Mrs. Carkill now. I read the advertisement in the Times that autumn at Homburg; and hoped "Dirty Dick" was as satisfied with the course of his true love as I was.

ARABELLA. "What did uncle give you on your birthday, dear? He gave me 'Hard Cash.'"

GEORGE. "Half-a-Million of Money."

INTELLIGENT FOREIGNER (who has overheard the dialogue). "Oh, mon Dieu! but these Anglaises are reccher as Cræstus!"

A monster bridge is in course of construction across the Ohio River, at Louisville, Kentucky. The total length of the bridge will be 5220 feet, or nearly one mile.

We have heard of a "Bridge of Sighs" before, but Mr. Paste, the paper-hanger, says he is inclined to think the one under notice will be a bridge of "double size!"

A young lady devoid of all feeling—Annie Stesia!

NO TIME FOR EATING.—A grocer meeting one of his own fraternity the other day, whose pony might be considered a beautiful specimen of a living skeleton, remonstrated with the owner, and asked him if he ever fed him. "Ever fed him! that's a good one," was the reply; "he's got a bushel and a half of oats at home now, only he ain't got time to eat 'em."

The concluding words of a Utah obituary notice are very pathetic: "He leaves thirteen widows and fifty-four children to mourn his loss."

RULES OF WHIST.

Whist is a very favorite game. The whistful look of persons playing it fully accounts for the name. There are four players; each person has a right to shuffle the cards previous to a deal; you may, however, get out of ye-or-deal in the best way you can, you will still be, then, a shuffler. The person on the left-hand side of the dealer is called the elder. If you happen to be thirsty in the course of the game, tread on the elder's favorite corn, you will no doubt then get some elder wine.

Standing rules (to be read at a sitting):

1. Lead from your strong suit. This you will find difficult unless you have a good tailor. See, however, next rule.

2. If you haven't a strong suit lead from a weak one, this is considered powerful play.

3. If you have a sequence, seek whence it came.

4. If you have a strong hand in clubs, or a strong club in hand, knock down the person next to you; this is a decided hit.

5. If you have a Jack in your hand, say you knave it not; your partner, if ill-tempered, may show some acerbity at this.

6. If you have but two cards remaining do not play the right one, and excuse yourself on the ground that you could only play what you had left.

7. If one of your opponents happens to have a club foot, lead clubs, and laugh boisterously. If he resents it say, "I shod'n't have done it, but what boots it? Put your best foot foremost and win." This is club law.

8. When spades are led, look grave, and don't make any allusions to undertakers or coffins.

9. If you have ace and king do not play out the king till ace is out, or rather do not play it ace-tilly out.

10. Look often over your adversary's hands.

11. If discovered cheating be indignant, say you won't play any more, and throw your cards down on the table. This will prove that you have played fair and above board. (N.B.—Above all things avoid being bored, this wouldn't do at all.)

12. Lose your temper whenever you can't keep it. This is a golden rule.

Carefully attend to the foregoing rules and you will soon become a perfect whist-player. Don't play for too high stakes, however, or you may "pay too dear for your whist-(de)."

"Were you guarded in your conduct while in New York?" asked a father of his son, who had just returned from a visit to that city. "Yes, Sir, part of the time by two policemen."

"That's a pretty bird, grandma," said a little boy. "Yes," replied the old dame, "and never cries." "That's because he's never washed," rejoined the boy.

Servant looks into the breakfast-room and says: "Pleas, ma'am, ther's a beggar woman in the kitchen wants something to eat."

LIBERAL MISTRESS. "Give her the water in which the eggs were boiled this morning, Bridget; it's quite nutritious."

A mother admonishing her son, a lad of some seven years of age, told him that he should never defer till to-morrow what he could do to-day. The little boy replied, "Well, then, mother, let's eat all that plum-pudding to-night."

To have fish at supper, just drop them a line.

A lady was recently reading to her child—a boy of seven years—a story of a little fellow whose father was taken ill and died, whereupon the youngster set himself diligently at work to assist in supporting himself and his mother. When she had finished the story the following dialogue ensued:

MOTHER. "Now, my little man, if pa was to die, wouldn't you work to help your mother?"

Boy (not relishing the idea of work). "Why, ma? what for? Ain't we got a good house to live in?"

MOTHER. "Oh yes, my child; but we can't eat the house, you know."

Boy. "Well, ain't we got flour and sugar and other things in the store-room?"

MOTHER. "Certainly, my dear; but they will not last long, and what then?"

Boy. "Well, ma, ain't there enough to last till you could get another husband?"

Ma gave it up.

Fig. 1.—Empress dress of dove-colored gros grain silk; skirt plain. Viennese cloak of blue velvet, trimmed with grebe, with belt and flowing sleeves. Satin buttons and button-holes. Bonnet of blue velvet with satin strings and velvet foliage.

Fig. 2.—Dress of Bismarck poplin, trimmed with soutache and fringe. Imperatrice cloak of black velours, embroidered with silk, and trimmed with braid and tassels. Round hat of black velours, with trimming of capucine satin, with feather tuft on the side, and lace strings.

Fig. 3.—Dress of white silk, trimmed with capucine satin folds and sprays of flowers. Sultan burnous of white cashmere, bordered with bias folds of capucine satin, and embroidered in front.

Fig. 4.—Empress dress of blue silk. Manchester cloak of black velvet, trimmed around the bottom with deep lace, with a scarf of broad satin ribbon tied behind, and confined with satin rosettes. Imperial bonnet of white velvet, trimmed with rich lace, with a velvet crest on the right, and blue velvet foliage on the left side.

Fig. 5.—Bismarck velours skirt, trimmed with bias satin folds and fringe. Bratant paletot of the same material, trimmed to match the dress, bonnet of white gros grain silk, trimmed with lace ruffles and lace strings.

Fig. 6.—Petersburg costume of blue cloth, trimmed with chinchilla. Overskirt, trimmed with silver braid and edged with chinchilla. Round hat of chinchilla, with chinchilla trimming and blue ostrich tuft.

Winter Bonnets.

See illustration, page 57.

Fig. 1.—Lilia, of Bismarck straw, with round crown; trimmed with a wreath of g. ded foliage with golden grapes. A scarf of tulle is roved across the back and forms strings, which are tied loosely.

Fig. 2.—Trionon, of black velvet, very small, trimmed with jet fringe round the edge, and a tuft of tinted plumes on the side, fastened with an aigrette. Strings of ribbon, edged with blonde.

Fig. 3.—Marie Antoinette, of Bismarck straw, with a small, rounding crown, and front undulating to suit the shape of the face, trimmed with flowers, and fastened with a scarf of tulle. This bonnet fits well, and is admirably suited to the present style of hair-dressing.

Fig. 4.—Fanchon, of blue velvet, beaded, with jet fringe around the edge, and a cluster of pansies with foliage in front. Strings of blue ribbon, edged with blonde.

Fig. 5.—Marie Stuart, of black velvet, pointed in front and turned up at the sides, with a silver cord entirely round the edge, and trimmed behind with a broad barb of black lace, which simulates a cape, and falls in front, forming strings. A bird, with long plumage and outspread wings, is fastened in front and nearly covers the top of the bonnet.

Fig. 6.—Duchesse promenade bonnet of velvet, with a stiff crown. A broad lace veil passes round the bonnet, and is tied behind, the ends falling over the chignon. A rose is placed on the front and the back; and a narrow band of blue velvet is fastened in front, over the forehead. Strings long, of blue ribbon.

Fig. 7.—Universel, of pink velvet, flat on the top, and trimmed in front with a white curled feather. The back of this elegant bonnet is covered with a rich lace barb, the ends of which form the strings. A band of velvet, to match the bonnet, is placed inside, over the forehead.

Fig. 8.—Imperial, of white royal velvet. The crown is pleated; the brim is covered with broad rich lace, with a heading of twisted silk piping, and is edged with white crystal fringe. Flame-colored roses complete the trimming of this new and beautiful bonnet. The strings are of satin.

Fig. 9.—Evening Coiffure à la premier Empire. This beautiful head-dress is very simple; it is composed of a broad bias strip of velvet, forming a bandeau, and edged with narrow white lace, which is passed round the front of the head, and tied under the chignon. A wreath of Bismarck velvet foliage is placed on the top.

Fig. 10.—Cap Coiffure, composed of two volants of lace, mounted on blue ribbon, with bows of ribbon in front, and ribbon shells over the forehead. The broad lace strings are covered down the centre with a blue velvet ribbon, and tie under the chignon, the ends falling down the back.

Fig. 11.—Carlotta; round hat, with a narrow brim, slightly turned down all round, trimmed with broad black ribbon, tied behind, with long, fringed ends. Bouquet of roses on the side.

Fig. 12.—Metternich, of black velvet, with a long black feather curling on the right side, and a cluster of gilt foliage in front.

Fig. 13.—Fanchon, of green silk, beaded with crystal, with a tulle veil rolled across the crown, and forming strings. Spray of roses and buds on the side, falling over the front.

Fig. 14.—Marie Antoinette, of white royal velvet, with a wreath of leaves, and a feather at the side. The back is trimmed with medallions of ribbon and lace, the latter of which is prolonged so as to form the strings.

PARIS GOSSIP.

FOR some months past the Parisians have taken into favor a singular color, which is becoming to nobody, neither blonde nor brunettes, but which nevertheless is the rage; almost every thing now is of a deep yellowish tint, called Bismarck, whether because the uniform of the Prussian Minister is entirely white we know not, but politics make their influence felt even on ladies' dresses. Some wags go so far as to pretend that there are different varieties of Bismarck, the Bismarck sick and the Bismarck well.

This color has given rise to some curious episodes. A German countess, the owner of one of the most ancient feudal castles on the banks of the Rhine, wrote to her dress-maker to send her a fashionable dress. The dress-maker naturally dispatched her a Bismarck. The dress was pronounced beautiful, and the countess hastened to array herself in it to receive a large party of guests. The new shade excited universal admiration, till an imprudent person happened to utter the name of the fashionable color. "What! do you call it Bismarck?" exclaimed the countess. "Yes, Madame, that is what they call it in Paris." The countess turned pale, and instantly disappeared; she retreated to her room and, tearing off the dress, indignantly flung it in the fire.

Here is another anecdote concerning this famous shade. Madame X— is something of a tease (some women have this slight fault, it appears). Her husband is a rabid anti-Prussian, and his better-half took delight in adopting the Bismarck tint, and letting slip no opportunity to pronounce the obnoxious name in his presence. "Where are my Bismarck gaiters?" "What bonnet will Madame wear?" "My Bismarck one, of course." "What cloak?" "My Bismarck cloak." The husband foamed with rage at every mention of the name; but he dared say nothing; it is beneath a man's dignity to concern himself about his wife's fripperies. Out of patience, at last, he proposed a compromise to his charming wife, who consented to abandon the color she loved so well in exchange for the magnificent diamond bracelet which her husband had been imprudent enough to refuse her last winter. We hope that our amiable readers will not profit by this little suggestion.

A little less hair is worn this season than last, but the coiffures are none the less complicated. By way of compensation the ladies, even those belonging to the best society, have adopted a lamentable habit; they paint more than ever, and the effect is shocking. All the women you meet are clear red and white, like dolls; they are real bonbons, and you might eat them if it were not for the dangerous effect of the paint. If they only contented themselves with hiding their imperfections it would be better; but no, they lay on the rouge so thickly that it is evident to the most unobserving eye. Even young girls eagerly adopt this terrible fashion, and the freshness of youth is lost beneath a coat of paint.

It is sad to say, but we really seem living in a counterfeit age. All that is young, true, and beautiful is hidden under a layer of pearl-white; and, unhappily, it is the same with tender feelings, for it is the fashion to be déshabillé, positive, and materialistic. Let us hope that this is only a fashion, and that this general disenchantment is only for a season. We shall perhaps yet see the golden age revive.

After the Zouave Jacob the Parisian public is raving about the masked man who wrestles so marvelously in the Gymnasium. Behold the triumph of mystery! Were his face uncovered we should hear nothing of this robust athlete, who has furnished food for Parisian curiosity during the last two months. But he is masked, and that is his real attraction. Every kind of improbable story has been invented concerning this living enigma. Some make him an old officer, who hides his name and mutilated face under a velvet mask. Others have suddenly discovered that he is Madame Thierret, the eccentric artist of the Palais Royal, who amuses her leisure moments by wrestling. The truth of the matter is this: the masked man is of the highest rank, an Englishman by birth, and a millionaire three or four times over. A victim to the spleen, like many of his countrymen, he came to Paris to consult one of the medical celebrities there, who advised him to abandon his indolent mode of life, and to act precisely as if he were forced to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow; on this condition only would he undertake to restore him to health. The Englishman was pleased with the very originality of the prescription, and resolved to follow it. After long turning over in his brain what he could do to earn a livelihood he thought of the Herculean strength with which he was gifted by nature, and presented himself, masked, at the Gymnasium. His success exceeded his hopes; he was immediately engaged for a series of performances, and has continued ever since to draw crowded houses. This heroic treatment is already producing good results; the gloomy fancies of the patient are vanishing daily; and when the Man with the Mask disappears from the stage it will be because he has found a charm in life. Then Lord D— will return to London, where his absence is already felt; and on seeing the elegant sportsman no one will suspect that he has succeeded in captivating the attention of all Paris during a whole season.

ROMANCE IN MEDICINE.

A SINGULAR affair has recently created a great sensation in Switzerland. The story of the escaped galley-slave is well known, who disguised himself as a woman and was engaged as lady's maid by an elegant young lady of Versailles. The handsome, smooth-faced bandit was arrested just as he was preparing a bath for his mistress, who was cruelly surprised on learning the sex and antecedents of her zealous servant. The Court of Justice of the Canton de Vaud has lately had under its jurisdiction a case which, without being as grave as the drama of Versailles, nevertheless somewhat resembles it. A young man named Piquilloud, taking advantage of his feminine appearance, forged a diploma of doctor of medicine from a female college of New York, introduced himself to a number of families as Miss Abbot, and offered the benefit of his medical knowledge—especially to ladies.

Piquilloud wore his new garb with grace, and, thanks to powerful recommendations, succeeded in gaining a lucrative practice, the title of American, in some sort, justifying the choice of his profession and removing all suspicion. All the young ladies in the Canton de Vaud insisted on placing themselves under the care of Miss Abbot, and would have no other doctor than the charming and successful practitioner, who ruled like a despot in their houses. The neighboring cantons grew jealous of Vaud. The doctor's reputation increased daily, and there was even talk of offering him a chair in the National Academy of Medicine, when suddenly an unlucky waterfall caused the downfall of his triumph. Miss Abbot, instead of contenting herself with simply wearing her hair cut short as suited a grave Professor, wished to rival her fair patients in their luxuriant, flowing tresses. She intrusted her head to a skillful hair-dresser, who soon pierced the mystery and divulged the fatal secret. The fathers and mothers, furious at being thus duped, and having themselves introduced the wolf into the fold in the crinoline of a lamb, had recourse to the courts. The affair was instantly caught up and grossly exaggerated, and the gravest accusations were showered on the head of the culprit, who was forced to return to the prosaic frock-coat. At the trial, however, the declarations of indulgent witnesses graciously extenuated all the charges, despite the ill-will of sundry zealous accusers; and it was found impossible to convict Piquilloud of anything except the illegal practice of medicine, in punishment for which he was sentenced to a month's imprisonment.

A "FAIR" BUSINESS TRANSACTION.

A GENTLEMAN in Honduras, recently, in writing to the mercantile house in London with which he was in correspondence, after finishing what he had to say about molasses, mahogany, and India rubber, added as follows:

"I have one other commission to give you. I wish for a wife, and can not find any suitable person in these settlements. Please send me by an early steamer a young lady answering to the following description: Age not less than twenty or over twenty-five; person well formed and graceful; countenance agreeable; disposition and manners gentle; and possessed of good health, so that she may endure well the change of climate. If you send a person answering to the above conditions I promise to marry her within a fortnight after her arrival."

The return mail brought him a letter to this effect:

"In accordance with your orders I ship for you by this steamer a young lady, Miss Louisa C—, possessing the qualifications prescribed, as per the vouchers which she will present to you. Please acknowledge receipt, and believe me," etc.

The gentleman—whose letter had been brought to him by the mail tug—hurried to the pier to meet the steamer. As soon as the plank was laid he went on board, and there, inquiring for and finding Miss Louisa C—, he made himself known to her. She handed him her letter from the house in London, saying:

"I have here a bill of exchange drawn on you, Sir, which I hope you will not decline to honor."

"Miss Louisa," said he, "I have never yet dishonored a bill of exchange, and I certainly shall not begin with this one. On the contrary, I shall deem myself the happiest of men in being allowed to accept it."

So the business was settled in a manner satisfactory to all concerned.

BANTAM'S BEQUEST.

BANTAM knew every thing. As a talker he surpassed Coleridge. Theology, decline of the drama, chemistry, cure of corns, astrology, manufacture of lemonade, the Jamaica question, destruction of black beetles—no matter what subject, nothing was too great or too small for Bantam. Beturbaned old ladies keenly appreciated him, he was such good company for them when Maude was whirling in the waltz; and the maidens, when Captain Fitzearwig was not in the room, simply idolized him. Did the darlings dispute as to the age of Patti or Mario, the color of Fechter's hair, or the length of the Rev. Ignatius Dearlove's whiskers, who should decide for them if not Bantam? At public dinners the phrase "as my friend Bantam can attest" was as familiar to the guests as were the faces of the waiters. Upon one occasion only was his dictum disputed, and I trembled for the irreverent skeptic who ventured to oppose Bantam and to ask for his authority. "Authority, Sir!" said my friend; "my authority is my Cyclopaedia!" The doubter was satisfied. As none of the cyclopedias with which I was acquainted treated of the minor topics—such as the removal of superfluous hairs, or the age of Queen Victoria—in dilating on which Bantam shone, I often asked my friend to permit me to see the wonderful book from which his stores of wisdom were drawn; but he as invariably refused the boon. With all his learning, however, Bantam was unable to ward off sickness. When I visited him he shook my hand, and said that he had made his will and bequeathed to me his cyclopaedia. In due time my friend learned to die, and the bequest was handed to me.

Bantam had not derived his knowledge from the ponderous volumes which fill the shelves of the Astor Library. Had he quoted from those books, a lynx-eyed critic would have been "down" upon him. No; my friend was too clever for that. The bundle of old penny numbers handed to me showed that his marvelous stock of out-of-the-way information had been picked up grain by grain from the Flycatcher, with its sensation story of "Daggeri, the Deep-Dyed Desperado; or, the Moaning Mountain Maniac;" its exciting wood-cuts doing duty in one number for "Daggeri Dissecting the Demoniac," and in another as "Sir Mordaunt Hearing a Confession;" its marvelous unpaid-for "Poetry," and above all else its "Answers to Correspondents," to which, as I soon discovered, Bantam had owed his fame.

From that time to the present week I have been a constant subscriber to the Flycatcher; and although I have not been able to fill my friend's place, I have had the exquisite pleasure of hearing myself alluded to as a man of varied attainments, a great reader, and the possessor of a mine of knowledge. The mine is not an expensive one to work. Am I in doubt as to the color of my hair, or the strength of my claim to be considered handsome, I rush to pen and paper and ask the editor of the Flycatcher, who after the delay of a few weeks dispels my doubts.

The number before me contains answers to ninety queries, the subjects including the climate of New Zealand, the dates of composition and performance of Handel's Joshua, the gilding of picture-frames, the kind of shop at which "black stick for dyeing whiskers" is sold, the French medical society, the condition of some unfortunate being's liver, the manufacture of alum-water "for weak and watery" eyes, "remedy for a bald head" (sic), the marriage ceremony, the cost of a divorce, the "best way of getting rid of blushing," many applications for husbands and wives, and still more numerous responses from candidates for the honorable estate of matrimony. These applications and responses are by no means the least curious feature of the correspondent columns of the Flycatcher. W. E. W., who coolly says that he is "good-looking," being quite tired of a single life, wishes to meet with a wife "capable of cooking a dinner to his and her satisfaction;" and in a few weeks a lady, with "a good home and an income to support it," expresses her desire to correspond with him. John C. is no fortune-hunter, he affirms, but wants "a kind and loving wife; a hard-working man, and a singer at a church;" which is a combination not often to be met with, we imagine. G. M. C. L. requires a partner, and Maid of Kent and Violet Eyes respond that they would like to hear from him; the editor adding, "The former is a tall young lady, with a nice plump figure; the latter is an affectionate little girl, with brown curly hair." Glen has need of a wife, and eight ladies respond. One dame describes herself as "lovely," another as "prepossessing," and a third as "pretty." Violet confesses that she is thirty years old; and M. E. Grant says that she is "an Irish girl and a Christian." Another Benedict receives offers from nine correspondents, one being "handsome," another "tall and handsome," a third "tall and fascinating," and a fourth "small and pretty." J. M. S. receives replies from one lady who affirms that she is "healthy;" from another who says she is a "fine healthy country girl;" and from a third who pictures herself as a "tall and stout young person." Signore applies for a wife, and a lady sends her height and measure round the waist, and adds that she weighs "160 lbs. in full dress." Pale John, doubtless an interesting and cadaverous young man, receives a response from Evangeline, who asserts that she is "entitled to marry, and entitled to escape from the tyranny of a step-mother," whatever that may mean. The gentlemen do not invariably speak first. Gertrude Travers writes to say that she would like to marry "one of the sons of Neptune;" and mentions incidentally that she has violet eyes and an abundance of wavy golden hair, and that she is an excellent musician. Miss Grey wants a husband; and a gentleman "accustomed to a good style of living" responds, and acknowledges that he could not afford to marry a young girl without a fortune. Fern confesses that she is "rather anxious than otherwise" to be married, and remarks that she is handsome, with flashing black eyes; but the husband of her selection must be possessed of property, as she has "a horror of poverty." The carte de visite, she adds, "will be welcome." Little Violet, with "brown curls, blue eyes, black eyebrows and lashes, small teeth white as pearls, and small hands and feet," with accomplishments of the highest order, is anxious to marry any one possessed of an income "adequate to the exigencies of a refined home." Anastasia, a lady of middle age, whatever that may be, who says she is "a well-known authoress," wishes to meet with a gentleman "about sixty years of age, with a view to a matrimonial alliance," and a settlement we presume. Mavroun, coolly describing herself as a lovely blonde of eighteen—precocious girl—"has long been an admirer of military men," and would "delight in the idea of leading a camp-life," adds, as a bait doubtless, that on her marriage she will have a competency. This charming frankness is by no means rare in the correspondents of the Flycatcher. Widows with "little girls" express their wishes for husbands who will be good to their children; ladies desire to meet young men with flowing beards and curly brown hair, or with musical tastes and not less than $1500 a year. Gentlemen want wives with the vague "little money," or "some means;" and girls say that they have, or will have, sums varying from $5000 down to the paltry $1000 per annum; the latter amount being apparently a very ordinary income, for in one number of the Flycatcher no less than three ladies state that they each possess it. Cartes de visite are solicited, promises being made that the "approved one" shall receive another in exchange; and intending respondents are informed that "none but thorough gentlemen need apply."

Do these discontented individuals ever meet? The editor of the Flycatcher states most distinctly that he will not do any thing more than receive and forward cartes de visite, and that only when stamped and directed envelopes have been received. One astute lady, however, proves too clever for the conductor; for she states "for the information of A. R., the middle-aged gentleman with $3000 a year," that she "goes to the Central Park every fine Tuesday, and will sit on the Terrace reading the Galaxy." Had she said that she would study the Flycatcher, the editorial laxity would have been easy to understand.

Has Anastasia, then, in her interesting and literary middle-age, to be content with the carte of the gentleman about sixty years of age, and with life insured in a good office? Can her heart overflow only in sonnets to his somewhat dim and blurred eyebrow? If the Flycatcher does not lend itself to anything not exactly proper, it is evident that meetings may be arranged by other means; for the editor permits approved ones to state that they would like to correspond with their selections through the medium of specified journals, after which their place in the column knows them no more.

Unfortunately the Flycatcher is not perfect. Some of the answers are vague, some contradictory, and others idiotic. Polly is informed that "it is lawful for a man to marry his widow's cousin;" W. H. B. is told that "when a young man obtains a sum of money from a young lady for the purpose of furnishing a home previous to their marriage, and absconds with it, he is guilty of obtaining money under false pretenses," as though there could be any doubt about it; W. C. L. is assured, in a manner which smacks strongly of Joseph Surface, that "the man who can not gain the affections of some woman must be either an idiot, an ass, or a scoundrel;" S. P. T. is told that it is a wart growing on his nose; P. J. C. that "the length of the nose has a good deal to do with character but not with honesty;" and J. Hay, a cripple one would imagine, is informed that a "wooden-legged emigrant would not be allowed to land in any port of the United States." E. C. V., apparently a New York servant-girl, is assured that she did wrong in paying for refreshments, "when out on an excursion;" and although John Edwards is cautioned against advice gratis as generally being worthless, an Ignorant One is directed to "take two compound squill pills every night," and A Sufferer from Weakness is advised to "leave off blackguardism." Who shall decide when doctors disagree? Upon the etiquette of courtship the editor seems to be at sea. J. B. is told that "propriety does not sanction any kissing between young people who are only friends, and between lovers it only allows of the chaste salute at meeting and parting," and Constant Reader is directed not to return the kiss of his or her intended until they are married; but another correspondent is taught the difference between kissing and being kissed, the impropriety of the latter being insisted upon, and the former permitted only between children and their parents. Susan Edith Waters is informed that, "so far from being improper, it is natural for lovers to kiss each other at parting;" and Mademoiselle is assured that "kissing during courtship is allowed—why not?" and is treated to a little of the Joseph-Surface moralizing: "Young hearts have young sympathies, and young sympathies are the parents of kind and tender sentiments."

The Flycatcher, however, is undeniably and unapproachably great in the art of puffing, and the excellency of its own wares is vaunted in a manner which irresistibly reminds one of the literature of the anti-necessity-for-life-insurance pill, and other quack medicines. A Working Man writes to say that when he began to subscribe to the Flycatcher he was only an apprentice with two dollars per week, and that he has risen to be an employer, "with a prospect of being before long in comfortable circumstances;" his success in life being attributable to the "high principles so ably inculcated" in the Flycatcher.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Thursday Morn.—Heard "The Grand Duchess of Gerolstein" last evening. The house was well filled, though by no means crowded. The manager stated that Mademoiselle Tostee was suffering from a slight cold, and begged them to bear the fact in mind. She, however, sang with vivacity and effect, and carried out her part with an enthusiasm and piquancy that won much applause. Many gems of song were loudly encored—none more so than "Le Sabre de mon père." Prince Paul, General Boum, and Barons Puck and Grog created much amusement. There is a sparkle about this French opera that is very pleasing; yet, personally, I like serious rather than comic operas. Noticed that an English version of "The Grand Duchess" is announced to be produced in Philadelphia.

Madame Kapp-Young, the new prima donna who has made her appearance in Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," is a German lady of English parentage, it is said, Young being her maiden and Kapp her married name—a transposition of names which seems odd to Americans. She is a pupil of the Conservatory of Vienna, and has been very successful in Germany and Italy. Her voice is a rich and mellow soprano, both sweet and powerful. She sings easily and naturally, and her appearance on the stage is prepossessing.

Thursday Eve.—Dined at Mrs. Nooley's. Felt rather disgusted at the scandal which circulated so freely among the ladies in the drawing-room, after dinner. Whose business is it if Mrs. Smith did leave her invalid husband to the care of servants and go to Niagara? Perhaps her husband wanted her to go. Am sure, if I had been nursing Mr. T. for four months, he would send me off somewhere to rest; and I should think it hard if my neighbors called me "cruel." And how can any one know for a certainty, with double walls intervening, that Mrs. Jones is "barbarously beating her poor little girl" every time she is heard to scream? And what if the minister's children don't behave with strict propriety in church—must his wife's management of them be discussed so unfeelingly? Could not help thinking, as I was an unwilling listener to such matters, of a recipe I lately saw to cure scandal:

"Take of good-nature one ounce; of the herb 'Mind your own business' one ounce—mix them with a little charity for others, and two or three sprigs of 'Keep your tongue between your teeth.'"

Should add to this, Take as often as occasion requires.

The custom which the ladies have nowadays of wearing two long curls hanging down their backs seems to be of poetical origin—or at least to be sanctioned by a poet. Alexander Pope, in his description of "Belinda," in the second canto of the "Rape of the Lock," says:

"This nymph, to the destruction of mankind,
Nourished two locks, which graceful hung behind
In equal curls, and well conspired to deck
With shining ringlets the smooth ivory neck."

Friday.—Of all the little annoyances that I experience in housekeeping, I believe one of the most vexatious is in connection with my ash-barrel! Am ashamed to acknowledge it, but 'tis really so. If our pleasant house was only a little less pleasant I would beg Mr. T. to move out of the range of a public-school. I really spent a small fortune in getting barrels—and such a difficult thing as it is to buy a barrel nowadays—before I obtained this nice iron contrivance, which I thought would be boy-proof. Barrels were of no account whatever; as sure as three o'clock came, mischievous school-boys would rush along and kick over every ash-barrel on the block. No policeman ever saw them do it—oh no! near as the station is. So I had to get a new barrel every few days. But my iron barrel, that I thought so substantial, won't stand it long. Have just heard it kicked over into the gutter! Must not allow such trifles to fret me, I suppose.

A wonderful machine has been invented in Germany which will remove the pits from one hundred cherries per minute. How handy that would have been when I made cherry-preserves last summer! Hope specimens will be imported.

The Queen of Spain does not seem to be very popular with her subjects. It was announced after her recent return to Madrid that she would on a given day attend service at a church, and the hope was expressed that she would be cordially greeted. When the time came the streets were almost wholly deserted. Indeed, Isabella has given her subjects very little cause for gratitude or love. Social life in Spain is connected with much that is unattractive and revolting. Not long since I came across an account of Spanish bull-fighting, in one of the papers. Could not read it all—it was too horrible; but it was stated that the Spaniards themselves declare that the first time a Senora goes to the Plaza de Toros she faints away. On her second visit she is only a little sick. The third time she screens her face with her fan, but peeps intently round the corner at the combat going on below. After her fourth corrida she becomes a confirmed bull-fighter. The present Queen of Spain, however, has rarely, if ever, attended a bull-fight, and among the higher ranks of the female aristocracy in Madrid the brutal pastime has ceased to be fashionable. But among the middle classes and the mass of the people—men, women, and children—there is as strong a passion as ever for the sanguinary spectacles.

In discussing the question of woman's right to vote, Dr. Holland, in his recent lectures in Boston, utterly repudiated the notion that there was a superior sex, in any proper sense of the term; nor did he deny the abstract right of woman to vote. The question, he maintained, was simply one of expediency. It would not be well for both husband and wife to vote, nor was it necessary, because in the family unit the husband is, in theory and indeed in fact, the fit representative of the family. An excellent "theory" that! But how is the "fact" if the husband, for example, is a Democrat and the wife a Republican in feeling? Must the wife convert the husband? or the husband the wife? Must they compromise the matter? Or is the wife to yield and let the husband represent the family?

Saturday Eve.—Have been reading a melancholy account of the customs of courtship in Greenland. It seems that when a Greenlanders has fixed his affections upon a "Greenlandess" he acquaints his parents with the state of his heart. They apply to the parents of the girl, and if the several parents agree the next proceeding is to broach the subject to the young lady. The ambassadors do not shock her by any sudden or abrupt avowal of the awful subject of their mission. Instead of this they launch out in praises of the gentleman who seeks her hand. They speak of the splendor of his hut, the sumptuousness of his stock of blubber, his courage in catching seals, and other like advantages. The lady, pretending to be affronted even at these remote hints, runs away, tearing the ringlets of her hair as she retires, while the ambassadors pursue her, drag her from her concealment, take her by force to the house of her destined husband, and there leave her. Compelled to remain, she sits for days with disheveled hair, silent and dejected, refusing every kind of sustenance, till at last, if entreaties do not prevail, she is compelled by force, and even blows, to submit to the detested union.

In some cases Greenland women faint at the proposal of marriage; in others they fly to the mountains, and return when compelled to by cold and hunger. If one cuts off her hair it is a sign that she intends to resist till death. The reason for this aversion to marriage may result from the fact that the Greenland wife is the slave of her husband, doomed to a life of toil, drudgery, and privation.

When will persons upon whom is cast the dangerous and unpleasant duty of cleaning wells, vaults, and other places long closed up, learn to take precautions against the foul air which such places accumulate. For years and years there have been frequent deaths from carelessness in this respect; yet people seem to grow no wiser. Lately in Illinois there was a well which required cleaning, and a son of the owner volunteered to go down for that purpose. A rope was procured, and the boy began the descent. When about fifty feet down he suddenly released his hold upon the rope and fell to the bottom. Probably not aware of the cause of his son's fall, the father immediately began the descent to aid him, but on reaching the point where his son let go of the rope, he, too, fell to the bottom. A young man begged to be allowed to go down the well after the bodies of the man and his son, and, after some persuasion, was allowed to make the attempt, and met a similar fate. Like the other two, he fell a victim to the foul air of the well.

Read an interesting description of a costly cabinet which the Czar of Russia recently presented to Eugénie, as an acknowledgment of the magnificent hospitality with which he was received at the Tuilleries. The flowers and fruit that decorate this cabinet—which was made by the first artists of St. Petersburg—are raised from the surface, and the stones of which they are formed are chosen so that their lines may as nearly as possible compare to those of the originals. Thus the leaves and flowers of the jasmine and other plants, the fruit of the raspberry and blackberry, the currant and strawberry, are represented with a truth of coloring and an apparent softness and transparency that almost rival nature herself. They rest upon slabs of lapis lazuli and other precious marbles, separated from each other by delicate lines of twisted gold.

The recent Mexican war developed its heroines, as most wars do. None of them, however, was so well known as Ignacia Richy, a native of Jalisco, and daughter of Spanish parents. She entered the ranks of the Liberal army when the French invaded the country. She performed many prodigies of valor, and became an aid on the staff of General Arteaga, who was executed by Mendez at Uruapan in October, 1865, and became a prisoner with him. When Arteaga and his companions were shot she refused to be present at the execution, and blew out her own brains with a pistol in prison sooner than remain a prisoner in the hands of the Imperialists.

A curious custom exists in Venice. Years ago an old lady left, at her death, some money to be expended in feeding the pigeons of that city at a regular hour every day. Two o'clock is the time; and just as the two brown men on the town clock are about to strike the hour down come the pigeons, flying from all directions over the palaces. The arms of the bronze men rise slowly and strike the bell; then, in a moment, before the last stroke of two dies away, come the pigeons sailing over the walls and fluttering down on the window-sills and at the foot of the columns in the corner of the square. Rolling and tumbling and pushing and crowding in a great mass together, they present in this, the busiest part of Venice, a most curious sight.

A subject of Victor Emmanuel has invented a breast-pin from which, by touching a little spring, one can extract a number of choice airs from favorite operas.

Monday Eve.—"Mr. Typeset," said I this evening, as the good man was busy with his memorandum-book. I felt some compunction at interrupting him—but then it was really important, I thought to myself. Mr. T. looked up, with his eyes—apparently—full of figures, and greenbacks, and all manner of accounts.

"What is it, my dear?"

"Do you think I had better try this method of getting a new bonnet and cloak?" And I read the following: An affectionate but playful wife in a New England city sent a note to her husband recently, written in a disguised hand, signed with a fictitious name, stating that she had often seen and admired him, and asked to become better acquainted. Husband answered the note at once, appointing time and place of meeting. Both parties met at the appointed time and place, the lady heavily veiled, and proceeded to the rooms, where the veil was removed, and a grand tableau not down in the bills ensued. Assurance made on the part of the husband that it was nothing but a joke, and that he knew it was her all the time; wife is having a stylish bonnet, new cloak and elegant silk dress made.

Mr. Typeset immediately devoted himself to his accounts with great assiduity, remarking dryly, "Possibly it might be safer for me to order you the bonnet and cloak at once."

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER VII.

MANUSCRIPT FOUND IN A BOTTLE.

"BRIG 'VISHNU,' ADRIPT IN THE CHINESE SEA.
July 10, 1828.

"WHOEVER finds this let him know that I, Lionel Despard, Colonel of H. M. 37th Regiment, have been the victim of a foul conspiracy performed against me by the captain and crew of the brig Vishnu, and especially by my servant, John Potts.

"Expecting at any time to perish, adrift helplessly, at the mercy of winds and waves, I sit down now before I die, to write all the circumstances of this affair. I will inclose the manuscript in a bottle and fling it into the sea, trusting in God that he may cause it to be borne to those who may be enabled to read my words, so that they may know my fate and bring the guilty to justice. Whoever finds this let him, if possible, have it sent to my friend, Ralph Brandon, of Brandon Hall, Devonshire, England, who will do more than any other man to cause justice to have its due.

"To further the ends of justice and to satisfy the desires of my friends, I will write an account of the whole case.

"In the name of God, I declare that John Potts is guilty of my death. He was my servant. I first found him in India under very remarkable circumstances.

"It was in the year 1826. The Government was engaged in an effort to put down bands of assassins by whom the most terrific atrocities had been committed, and I was appointed to conduct the work in the district of Agra.

"The Thuggee society is still a mystery, though its nature may yet be revealed if they can only capture the chief* and make him confess. As yet it is not fully known, and though I have heard much which I have reported to the Government, yet I am slow to believe that any human beings can actually practice what I have heard.

"The assassins whom I was pursuing eluded our pursuit with marvelous agility and cunning, but one by one we captured them, and punished them summarily. At last we surrounded a band of Thugs, and to our amazement found among them a European and a small boy. At our attack the Hindus made a desperate resistance, and killed themselves rather than fall into our hands; but the European, leading forward the little boy, fell on his knees and implored us to save him.

"I had heard that an Englishman had joined these wretches, and at first thought that this was the man; so, desirous of capturing him, I ordered my men whenever they found him to spare his life if possible. This man was at once seized and brought before me.

"He had a piteous story to tell. He said that his name was John Potts, that he belonged to Southampton, and had been in India a year. He had come to Agra to look out for employ as a servant, and had been caught by the Thugs. They offered to spare his life if he would join them. According to him they always make this offer. If it had only been himself that was concerned he said that he would have died a hundred times rather than have accepted; but his little boy was with him, and to save his life he consented, hoping that somehow or other he might escape. They then received him with some horrible ceremonies, and marked on his arm and on the arm of his son, on the inner part of the right elbow, the name of Bowhani in Hindu characters. Potts showed me his arm and that of his son in proof of this.

"He had been with them, according to his own account, about three months, and his life had been one continuous horror. He had picked up enough of their language to conjecture to some extent the nature of their belief, which, he asserted, would be most important information for the Government. The Thugs had treated him very kindly; for they looked upon him as one of themselves, and they are all very humane and affectionate to one another. His worst fear had been that they would compel him to do murder; and he would have died, he declared, rather than consent; but, fortunately, he was spared. The reason of this, he said, was because they always do their murder by strangling, since the shedding of blood is not acceptable to their divinity. He could not do this, for it requires great dexterity. Almost all their strangling is done by a thin, strong cord, curiously twisted, about six feet in length, with a weight at one end, generally carved so as to represent the face of Bowhani. This they throw with a peculiar jerk around the neck of their victim. The weight swings the cord round and round, while the strangler pulls at the other end, and death is inevitable. His hands, he said, were coarse and clumsy, unlike the delicate Hindu hands; and so, although they forced him to practice incessantly, he could not learn. He said nothing about the boy, but, from what I saw of that boy afterward, I believe that nature created him especially to be a Thug, and have no doubt that he learned then to wield the cord with as much dexterity as the best strangler of them all.

"His association with them had shown him much of their ordinary habits and some of their beliefs. I gathered from what he said that the basis of the Thuggee society is the worship of Bowhani, a frightful demon, whose highest joy is the sight of death or dead bodies. Those who are her disciples must offer up human victims killed without the shedding of blood, and the more he can kill the more of a saint he becomes. The motive for this is never gain, for they rarely plunder, but purely religious zeal. The reward is an immortality of bliss hereafter, which Bowhani will secure them; a life like that of the Mohammedan Paradise, where there are material joys to be possessed forever without satiety. Destruction, which begins as a kind of duty, becomes also at last, and naturally perhaps, an absorbing passion. As the hunter in pursuing his prey is carried away by excitement and the enthusiasm of the chase, or, in hunting the tiger, feels the delight of braving danger and displaying courage, so here that same passion is felt to an extraordinary degree, for it is man that must be pursued and destroyed. Here, in addition to courage, the hunter of man must call into exercise cunning, foresight, eloquence, intrigue. All this I afterward brought to the attention of the Government with very good results.

"Potts declared that night and day he had been on the watch for a chance to escape, but so infernal was the cunning of these wretches, and so quick their senses, sharpened as they had been by long practice, that success became hopeless. He had fallen into deep dejection, and concluded that his only hope lay in the efforts of the Government to put down these assassins. Our appearance had at last saved him.

"Neither I, nor any of my men, nor any Englishman who heard this story, doubted for an instant the truth of every word. All the newspapers mentioned with delight the fact that an Englishman and his son had been rescued. Pity was felt for that father who, for his son's sake, had consented to dwell amidst scenes of terror, and sympathy for the anguish that he must have endured during that terrific captivity. A thrill of horror passed through all our Anglo-Indian society at the revelation which he made about Thuggee; and so great was the feeling in his favor that a handsome subscription was made up for him by the officers at Agra.

"For my part I believed in him most implicitly, and, as I saw him to be unusually clever, I engaged him at once to be my servant. He staid with me, and every month won more and more of my confidence. He had a good head for business. Matters of considerable delicacy which I intrusted to him were well performed, and at last I thought it the most fortunate circumstance in my Indian life that I had found such a man.

"After about three years he expressed a wish to go to England for the sake of his son. He thought India a bad place for a boy, and wished to try and start in some business in his native land for his son's sake.

"That boy had always been my detestation—a crafty, stealthy, wily, malicious little demon, who was a perfect Thug in his nature, without any religious basis to his Thuggeeism. I pitied Potts for being the father of such a son. I could not let the little devil live in my house; his cruelty to animals which he delighted to torture, his thieving propensities, and his infernal deceit, were all so intolerable. He was not more than twelve, but he was older in iniquity than many a gray-headed villain. To oblige Potts, whom I still trusted implicitly, I wrote to my old friend Ralph Brandon, of Brandon Hall, Devonshire, requesting him to do what he could for so deserving a man.

"Just about this time an event occurred which has brought me to this.

"My sweet wife had been ill for two years. I had obtained a faithful nurse in the person of a Mrs. Compton, a poor creature, but gentle and affectionate, for whom my dear love's sympathy had been excited. No one could have been more faithful than Mrs. Compton, and I sent my darling to the hill station at Assurabad in hopes that the cooler air might reinvigorate her.

"She died. It is only a month or two since that frightful blow fell and crushed me. To think of it overwhelms me—to write of it is impossible.

"I could think of nothing but to fly from my unendurable grief. I wished to get away from India any where. Before the blow crushed me I hoped that I might carry my darling to the Cape of Good Hope, and therefore I remitted there a large sum; but after she left me I cared not where I went, and finding that a vessel was going to Manilla I decided to go there.

"It was Potts who found out this. I now know that he engaged the vessel, put the crew on board, who were all creatures of his own, and took the route to Manilla for the sake of carrying out his designs on me. To give every thing a fair appearance the vessel was laden with stores and things of that sort, for which there was a demand at Manilla. It was with the most perfect indifference that I embarked. I cared not where I went, and hoped that the novelty of the sea voyage might benefit me.

"The captain was an Italian named Cigole, a low-browed, evil-faced villain. The mate was named Clark. There were three Lascars, who formed the small crew. Potts came with me, and also an old servant of mine, a Malay, whose life I had saved years before. His name was Uracao. It struck me that the crew was a small one, but I thought the captain knew his business better than I, and so I gave myself no concern.

"After we embarked Potts's manner changed very greatly. I remember this now, though I did not notice it at the time, for I was almost in a kind of stupor. He was particularly insolent to Uracao. I remember once thinking indifferently that Potts would have to be reprimanded, or kicked, or something of that sort, but was not capable of any action.

"Uracao had for years slept in front of my door when at home, and, when traveling, in the same room. He always waked at the slightest noise. He regarded his life as mine, and thought that he was bound to watch over me till I died. Although this was often inconvenient, yet it would have broken the affectionate fellow's heart if I had forbidden it, so it went on. Potts made an effort to induce him to sleep forward among the Lascars, but though Uracao had borne insolence from him without a murmur, this proposal made his eyes kindle with a menacing fire which silenced the other into fear.

"The passage was a quick one, and at last we were only a few days' sail from Manilla. Now our quiet came to an end. One night I was awakened by a tremendous struggle in my cabin. Starting up, I saw in the gloom two figures struggling desperately. It was impossible to see who they were. I sprang from the berth and felt for my pistols. They were gone.

"What the devil is this?" I roared fiercely. "No answer came; but the next moment there was a tremendous fall, and one of the men clung to the other, whom he held downward. I sprang from my berth. There were low voices out in the cabin.

"You can't," said one voice, which I recognized as Clark's. "He has his pistols."

"He hasn't," said the voice of Cigole. "Potts took them away. He's unarmed."

"Who are you?" I cried, grasping the man who was holding the other down.

"Uracao," said he. "Get your pistols or you're lost!"

"What the devil is the matter?" I cried, angrily, for I had not even yet a suspicion.

"Feel around your neck," said he.

"Hastily I put my hand up. A thrill of horror passed through me. It was the Thuggee cord.

"Who is this?" I cried, grasping the man who had fallen.

"Potts," cried Uracao. "Your pistols are under your berth. Quick! Potts tried to strangle you. There's a plot. The Lascars are Thugs. I saw the mark on their arms, the name of Bowhani in Hindu letters."

"All the truth now seemed to flash across me. I leaped back to the berth to look under it for my pistols. As I stooped there was a rush behind me.

"Help! Clark! Quick!" cried the voice of Potts. "This devil's strangling me!"

"At this a tumult arose round the two men. Uracao was dragged off. Potts rose to his feet. At that moment I found my pistols. I could not distinguish persons, but I ran the risk and fired. A sharp cry followed. Somebody was wounded.

"Damn him!" cried Potts, "he's got the pistols."

"The next moment they had all rushed out, dragging Uracao with them. The door was drawn to violently with a bang and fastened on the outside. They had captured the only man who could help me, and I was a prisoner at the mercy of these miscreants.

"All the remainder of the night and until the following morning I heard noises and tramping to and fro, but had no idea whatever of what was going on. I felt indignation at the treachery of Potts, who, I now perceived, had deceived me all along, but had no fear whatever of any thing that might happen. Death was rather grateful than otherwise. Still I determined to sell my life as dearly as possible, and, loading my pistol once more, I waited for them to come. The only anxiety which I felt was about my poor faithful Malay.

"But time passed, and at last all was still. There was no sound either of voices or of footsteps. I waited for what seemed hours in impatience, until finally I could endure it no longer. I was not going to die like a dog, but determined at all hazards to go out armed, face them, and meet my doom at once.

"A few vigorous kicks at the door broke it open and I walked out. There was no one in the cabin. I went out on deck. There was no one there. I saw it all. I was deserted. More:

the brig had settled down so low in the water that the sea was up to her gunwales. I looked out over the ocean to see if I could perceive any trace of them—Potts and the rest. I saw nothing. They must have left long before. A faint smoke in the hatchway attracted my attention. Looking there, I perceived that it had been burned away. The villains had evidently tried to scuttle the brig, and then, to make doubly sure, had kindled a fire on the cargo, thinking that the wooden materials of which it was composed would kindle readily. But the water had rushed in too rapidly for the flames to spread; nevertheless, the water was not able to do its work, for the wood cargo kept the brig afloat. She was water-logged but still floating.

"The masts and shrouds were all cut away. The vessel was now little better than a raft, and was drifting at the mercy of the ocean currents. For my part I did not much care. I had no desire to go to Manilla or any where else; and the love of life which is usually so strong did not exist. I should have preferred to have been killed or drowned at once. Instead of that I lived.

"She died on June 15. It was the 2d of July when this occurred which I have narrated. It is now the 10th. For a week I have been drifting I know not where. I have seen no land. There are enough provisions and water on board to sustain me for months. The weather has been fine thus far.

"I have written this with the wish that whoever may find it will send it to Ralph Brandon, Esq., of Brandon Hall, Devonshire, that he may see that justice is done to Potts, and the rest of the conspirators. Let him also try, if it be not too late, to save Uracao. If this fall into the hands of any one going to England let it be delivered to him as above, but if the finder be going to India let him place it in the hands of the Governor-General; if to China or any other place, let him give it to the authorities, enjoining them, however, after using it, to send it to Ralph Brandon as above.

"It will be seen by this that John Potts was in connection with the Thugs, probably for the sake of plundering those whom they murdered; that he conspired against me and tried to kill me; and that he has wrought my death (for I expect to die). An examination of my desk shows that he has taken papers and bank bills to the amount of four thousand pounds with him. It was this, no doubt, that induced him to make this attempt against me.

"I desire also hereby to appoint Henry Thornton, Sen., Esq., of Holby Pembroke, Solicitor, my executor and the guardian of my son Courtenay, to whom I bequeath a father's blessing and all that I possess. Let him try to secure my money in Cape Town for my boy, and, if possible, to regain for him the four thousand pounds which Potts has carried off.

"Along with this manuscript I also inclose the strangling cord.

"May God have mercy upon my soul! Amen.

LIONEL DESPARD."

"July 28.—Since I wrote this there has been a series of tremendous storms. The weather has cleared up again. I have seen no land and no ship.

"July 31.—Land to-day visible at a great distance on the south. I know not what land it may be. I can not tell in what direction I am drifting.

"August 2.—Land visible toward the southwest. It seems like the summit of a range of mountains, and is probably fifty miles distant.

"August 5.—A sail appeared on the horizon. It was too distant to perceive me. It passed out of sight.

"August 10.—A series of severe gales. The sea always rolls over the brig in these storms, and sometimes seems about to carry her down.

"August 20.—Storms and calms alternating. When will this end?

"August 25.—Land again toward the west. It seems as though I may be drifting among the islands of the Indian Archipelago.

"September 2.—I have been sick for a week. Unfortunately I am beginning to recover again. A faint blue streak in the north seems like land.

"September 10.—Open water.

"September 23.—A series of storms. How the brig can stand it I can not see. I remember Potts telling me that she was built of mahogany and copper-fastened. She does not appear to be much injured. I am exceedingly weak from want and exposure. It is with difficulty that I can move about.

"October 2.—Three months adrift. My God have mercy on me, and make haste to deliver me! A storm is rising. Let all Thy waves and billows overwhelm me, O Lord!

"October 5.—A terrific storm. Raged three days. The brig has run aground. It is a low island, with a rock about five miles away. Thank God, my last hour is at hand. The sea is rushing in with tremendous violence, hurling sand upon the brig. I shall drift no more. I can scarcely hold this pen. These are my last words. This is for Ralph Brandon. My blessing for my loved son. I feel death coming. Whether the storm takes me or not, I must die.

"Whoever finds this will take it from my hand, and, in the name of God, I charge him to do my bidding."

This was the last. The concluding pages of the manuscript were scarcely legible. The entries were meagre and formal, but the handwriting spoke of the darkest despair. What agonies had this man not endured during those three months!

Brandon folded up the manuscript reverentially, and put it into his pocket. He then went back into the cabin. Taking the bony skeleton hand he exclaimed, in a solemn voice, "In the name of God, if I am saved, I swear to do your bidding!"

He next proceeded to perform the last offices to the remains of Colonel Despard. On removing the sand something bright struck his eye. It was a gold locket. As he tried to open it the rusty hinge broke, and the cover came off.

It was a painting on enamel, which was as bright as when made—the portrait of a beautiful woman, with pensive eyes, and delicate, intellectual expression; and appeared as though it might have been worn around the Colonel's neck. Brandon sighed, then putting this in his pocket with the manuscript he proceeded to his task. In an hour the remains were buried in the grave on Coffin Island.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SIGNAL OF FIRE.

THE wreck broke in upon the monotony of Brandon's island life and changed the current of his thoughts. The revelations contained in Despard's manuscript came with perfect novelty to his mind. Potts, his enemy, now stood before him in darker colors, the foulest of miscreants, one who had descended to an association with Thuggee, one who bore on his arm the dread mark of Bowhani. Against such an enemy as this he would have to be wary. If this enemy suspected his existence could he not readily find means to effect his destruction forever? Who could tell what mysterious allies this man might have? Cigole had tracked and followed him with the patience and vindictiveness of a blood-hound. There might be many such as he. He saw plainly that if he ever escaped his first and highest necessity would be to work in secret, to conceal his true name, and to let it be supposed that Louis Brandon had been drowned, while another name would enable him to do what he wished.

The message of Despard was now a sacred legacy to himself. The duty which the murdered man had imposed upon his father must now be inherited by him. Even this could scarcely add to the obligations to vengeance under which he already lay; yet it freshened his passion and quickened his resolve.

The brig was a novelty to him here, and as day succeeded to day he found occupation in searching her. During the hotter part of the day he busied himself in shoveling out the sand from the cavern with a board. In the cool of the morning or evening he worked at the hatchway. Here he soon reached the cargo.

This cargo consisted of staves and short boards. All were blackened, and showed traces of fire. The fire seemed to have burned down to a depth of four feet, and two or three feet under the sides; then the water coming in had quenched it.

He drew out hundreds of these staves and boards, which were packed in bundles, six boards being nailed together as box-shooks, and thirty or forty staves. These he threw out upon the deck and on the sand. What remained he drew about and scattered loosely in the hold of the vessel. He did this with a purpose, for he looked forward to the time when some ship might pass, and it would then be necessary to attract her attention. There was no way of doing so. He had no pole, and if he had it might not be noticed. A fire would be the surest way of drawing attention, and all this wood gave him the means of building one. He scattered it about on the sand, so that it might dry in the hot sun.

Yet it was also necessary to have some sort of a signal to elevate in case of need. He had nothing but a knife to work with; yet patient effort will do much, and after about a week he had cut away the rail that ran along the quarter-deck, which gave him a pole some twenty feet in length. The nails that fastened the boards were all rusted so that they could not be used in attaching any thing to this. He decided when the time came to tie his coat to it, and use that as a flag. It certainly ought to be able to attract attention.

Occupied with such plans and labors and purposes as these, the days passed quickly for two weeks. By that time the fierce rays of the sun had dried every board and stave so that it became like tinder. The ship itself felt the heat; the seams gaped more widely, the boards warped and fell away from their rusty nails, the timbers were exposed all over it, and the hot, dry wind penetrated every cranny. The interior of the hold and the cabin became free from damp, and hot and dry.

Then Brandon flung back many of the boards and staves loosely; and after enough had been thrown there he worked laboriously for days cutting up large numbers of the boards into fine splints, until at last a huge pile of these shavings were accumulated. With these and his pistol he would be able to obtain light and fire in the time of need.

The post which he had cut off was then sharpened at one end, so that he could fix it in the sand when the time came, should it ever come. Here, then, these preparations were completed.

After all his labor in the cabin nothing was found. The bedding, the mattresses, the chests, the nautical instruments had all been ruined. The tables and chairs fell to pieces when the sand was removed; the doors and wood-work sank away; the cabin when cleared remained a wreck.

The weather continued hot and dry. At night Brandon flung himself down wherever he happened to be, either at the brig or at the rock. Every day he had to go to the rock for water, and also to look out toward the sea from that side. At first, while intent upon his work at the ship, the sight of the barren horizon every day did not materially affect him; he rose superior to despondency and cheered himself with his task. But at length, at the end of about three weeks, all this work was done and nothing more remained. His only idea was to labor to effect his escape, and not to insure his comfort during his stay.

Now as day succeeded to day all his old gloom returned. The excitement of the last few weeks had acted favorably upon his bodily health, but when this was removed he began to feel more than his old weakness. Such diet as his might sustain nature, but it could not preserve health. He grew at length to loathe the food which he had to take, and it was only by a stern resolve that he forced himself to swallow it.

At length a new evil was superadded to those which had already afflicted him. During the first part of his stay the hollow or pool of water on the rock had always been kept filled by the frequent rains. But now for three weeks, in fact ever since the uncovering of the Vishnu, not a single drop of rain had fallen. The sun shone with intense heat, and the evaporation was great. The wind at first tempered this heat somewhat, but at last this ceased to blow by day, and often for hours there was a dead calm, in which the water of the sea lay unruffled and all the air was motionless.

If there could only have been something which he could stretch over that precious pool of water he might then have arrested its flight. But he had nothing, and could contrive nothing. Every day saw a perceptible decrease in its volume, and at last it went down so low that he thought he could count the number of days that were left him to live. But his despair could not stay the operation of the laws of nature, and he watched the decrease of that water as one watches the failing breath of a dying child.

Many weeks passed, and the water of the pool still diminished. At last it had sunk so low that Brandon could not hope to live more than another week unless rain came, and that now he could scarcely expect. The look-out became more hopeless, and at length his thoughts, instead of turning toward escape, were occupied with deliberating whether he would probably die of starvation or simple physical exhaustion. He began to enter into that state of mind which he had read in Despard's MSS., in which life ceases to be a matter of desire, and the only wish left is to die as quickly and as painlessly as possible.

At length one day as his eyes swept the waters mechanically out of pure habit, and not expecting anything, he saw far away to the northeast something which looked like a sail. He watched it for an hour before he fairly decided that it was not some mocking cloud. But at the end of that time it had grown larger, and had assumed a form which no cloud could keep so long.

Now his heart beat fast, and all the old longing for escape, and the old love of life returned with fresh vehemence. This new emotion overpowered him, and he did not try to struggle with it.

Now had come the day and the hour when all life was in suspense. This was his first hope, and he felt that it must be his last. Experience had shown that the island must lie outside the common track of vessels, and, in the ordinary course of things, if this passed by he could not hope to see another.

Now he had to decide how to attract her notice. She was still far away, yet she was evidently drawing nearer. The rock was higher than the mound and more conspicuous. He determined to carry his signal there, and erect it somewhere on that place. So he took up the heavy staff, and bore it laboriously over the sand till he reached the rock.

By the time that he arrived there the vessel had come nearer. Her topsails were visible above the horizon. Her progress was very slow, for there was only very little wind. Her studding-sails were all set to catch the breeze, and her course was such that she came gradually nearer. Whether she would come near enough to see the island was another question. Yet if they thought of keeping a look-out, if the men in the tops had glasses, this rock and the signal could easily be seen. He feared, however, that this would not be thought of. The existence of Coffin Island was not generally known, and if they supposed that there was only open water here they would not be on the look-out at all.

Nevertheless Brandon erected his signal, and as there was no place on the solid rock where he could insert it he held it up in his own hands. Hours passed. The ship had come very much nearer, but her hull was not yet visible. Still he stood there under the burning sun, holding aloft his signal. Fearing that it might not be sufficiently conspicuous he fastened his coat to the top, and then waved it slowly backward and forward.

The ship moved more slowly than ever; but still it was coming nearer; for after some time, which seemed to that lonely watcher like entire days, her hull became visible, and her course still lay nearer.

Now Brandon felt that he must be noticed. He waved his signal incessantly. He even leaped in the air, so that he might be seen. He thought that the rock would surely be perceived from the ship, and if they looked at that they would see the figure upon it.

Then despondency came over him. The hull of the ship was visible, but it was only the uppermost line of the hull. He was standing on the very top of the rock, on its highest point. From the deck they could not see the rock itself. He stooped down, and perceived that the hull of the ship sank out of sight. Then he knew that the rock would not be visible to them at all. Only the upper half of his body could by any possibility be visible, and he knew enough of the sea to understand that this would have the dark sea for a back-ground to observers in the ship, and therefore could not be seen.

Still he would not yield to the dejection that was rapidly coming over him, and deepening into despair every minute. Never before had he so clung to hope—never before had his soul been more indomitable in its resolution, more vigorous in its strong self-assertion.

He stood there still waving his staff as though his life now depended upon that dumb yet eloquent signal—as though, like Moses, as long as his arms were erect, so long would he be able to triumph over the assault of despair. Hours passed. Still no notice was taken of him. Still the ship held on her course slowly, yet steadily, and no change of direction, no movement of any kind whatever, showed that he had been seen. What troubled him now was the idea that the ship did not come any nearer. This at first he refused to believe, but at last he saw it beyond doubt, for at length the hull was no longer visible above the horizon.

The ship was now due north from the rock, sailing on a line directly parallel with the island. It came no nearer. It was only passing by it. And now Brandon saw that his last hope of attracting attention by the signal was gone. The ship was moving onward to the west, and every minute would make it less likely that those on board could see the rock.

During the hours in which he had watched the ship he had been busy conjecturing what she might be, and from what port she might have come. The direction indicated China almost undoubtedly. He depicted in his mind a large, commodious, and swift ship, with many passengers on their way back to England. He imagined pleasant society, and general intercourse. His fancy created a thousand scenes of delightful association with "the kindly race of men." All earthly happiness seemed to him at that time to find its centre on board that ship which passed before his eyes.

The seas were bright and sparkling, the skies calm and deeply blue, the winds breathed softly, the white swelling sails puffed out like clouds against the blue sky beyond. That ship seemed to the lonely watcher like Heaven itself. Oh! to pass beyond the limits of this narrow sandy waste! to cross the waters and enter there! Oh! to reach that ship which moved on so majestically, to enter there and be at rest!

It was not given him to enter there. Brandon soon saw this. The ship moved farther away. Already the sun was sinking, and the sudden night of the tropics was coming swiftly on. There was no longer any hope.

He flung the staff down till it broke asunder on the hard rock, and stood for a few moments looking out at sea in mute despair.

Yet could he have known what was shortly to be the fate of that ship—shortly, only in a few days—he would not have despaired, he would have rejoiced, since if death were to be his lot it were better to die where he was than to be rescued and gain the sweet hope of life afresh, and then have that hope extinguished in blood.

But Brandon did not remain long in idleness. There was yet one resource—one which he had already thought of through that long day, but hesitated to try, since he would have to forsake his signal-station; and to remain there with his staff seemed to him then the only purpose of his life. Now since the signal-staff had failed, he had broken it, as some magician might break the wand which had failed to work its appropriate spell, and other things were before him. He took his coat and descended from the rock to make a last effort for life. He walked back through the gathering gloom toward the wreck. He did not run, nor did he in any way exhibit any excitement whatever. He walked with a firm step over the sand, neither hastening on nor lagging back, but advancing calmly.

Before he had gone half-way it was dark. The sun had gone down in a sea of fire, and the western sky, after flaming for a time, had sunk into darkness. There was no moon. The stars shone dimly from behind a kind of haze that overspread the sky. The wind came up more freshly from the east, and Brandon knew that this wind would carry the ship which he wished to attract further and further away. That ship had now died out in the dark of the ebon sea; the chances that he could catch its notice were all against him, yet he never faltered.

He had come to a fixed resolution, which was at all hazards to kindle his signal-fire, whatever the chances against him might be. He thought that the flames flaring up would of necessity attract attention, and that the vessel might turn, or lie-to, and try to discover what this might be. If this last hope failed, he was ready to die. Death had now become to him rather a thing to be desired than avoided. For he knew that it was only a change of life; and how much better would life be in a spiritual world than life on this lonely isle.

This decision to die took away despair. Despair is only possible to those who value this earthly life exclusively. To the soul that looks forward to endless life despair can never come.

It was with this solemn purpose that Brandon went to the wreck, seeking by a last chance after life, yet now prepared to relinquish it. He had struggled for life all these weeks; he had fought and wrestled for life with unutterable spiritual agony, all day long, on the summit of that rock, and now the bitterness of death was past.

An hour and a half was occupied in the walk over the sand to the wreck. Fresh waves of dark had come over all things, and now, though there were no clouds, yet the gloom was intense, and faint points of light in the sky above showed where the stars might be. Where now was the ship for which Brandon sought? He cared not. He was going to kindle his signal-fire. The wind was blowing freshly by the time that he reached the place. Such a wind had not blown for weeks. It would take the ship away farther. What mattered it? He would seize his last chance, if it were only to put that last chance away forever, and thus make an end of suspense.

All his preparations had long since been made; the dry wood lay loosely thrown about the hold; the pile of shavings and fine thread-like splinters was there awaiting him. He had only to apply the fire.

He took his linen handkerchief and tore it up into fine threads, these he tore apart again and rubbed in his hand till they were almost as loose as lint. He then took these loose fibres, and descending into the hold, put them underneath the pile which he had prepared. Then he took his pistol, and holding it close to the lint fired it.

The explosion rang out with startling force in the narrow hull of the ship, the lint received the fire and glowed with the sparks into spots of red heat. Brandon blew with his breath, and the wind streaming down lent its assistance.

In a few moments the work was done. It blazed!

But scarcely had the first flame appeared than a puff of wind came down and extinguished it. The sparks, however, were there yet. It was as though the fickle wind were tantalizing him—at one time helping, at another baffling him. Once more Brandon blew. Once more the blaze arose. Brandon flung his coat skirts in front of it till it might gather strength. The blaze ran rapidly through the fine splints, it extended itself toward the shavings, it threw its arms upward to the larger sticks.

The dry wood kindled. A million sparks flew out as it cracked under the assault of the devouring fire. The flame spread itself out to a larger volume; it widened, expanded, and clasped the kindling all around in its fervid embrace. The flame had been baffled at first; but now, as if to assert its own supremacy, it rushed out in all directions, with something that seemed almost like exultation. That flame had once been conquered by the waters in this very ship. The wood had saved the ship from the waters. It was as though the WOOD had once invited the FIRE to union, but the WATER had stepped in and prevented the union by force; as though the WOOD, resenting the interference, had baffled the assaults of the WATER, and saved itself intact through the long years for the embrace of its first love.

Now the FIRE sought the WOOD once more after so many years, and in ardor unspeakable embraced its bride.

Such fantastic notions passed through Brandon's fancy as he looked at the triumph of the flame. But he could not stay there long, and as he had not made up his mind to give himself to the flames he clambered up quickly out of the hatchway and stood upon the sand without.

The smoke was pouring through the hatchway, the black voluminous folds being rendered visible by the glow of the flames beneath, which now had gained the ascendancy, and set all the winds at defiance. Indeed it was so now that whatever wind came only assisted the flames, and Brandon, as he looked on, amused himself with the thought that the wind was like the world of man, which, when any one is first struggling, has a tendency to crush him, but when he has once gained a foothold exerts all its efforts to help him along. In this mood, half cynical, half imaginative, he watched the progress of the flames.

Soon all the fine kindling had crumbled away at the touch of the fire, and communicating its own heat to the wood around, it sank down, a glowing mass, the foundation of the rising fires.

Here, from this central heart of fire, the flames rushed on upon the wood which lay loosely on all sides, filling the hull. Through that wood the dry hot wind had streamed for many weeks, till every stave and every board had become dry to its utmost possibility. Now at the first breath of the flame the wood yielded; at the first touch it flared up, and prepared to receive the embrace of the fire in every fibre of its being.

The flame rolled on. It threw its long arms through the million interstices of the loose piles of wood, it penetrated every where with its subtle, far-reaching power, till within the ship the glow broadened and widened, the central heart of fire enlarged its borders, and the floods of flame that flowed from it rushed with consuming fury through the whole body of the ship.

Glowing with bright lustre, increasing in that brightness every moment, leaping up as it consumed and flashing vividly as it leaped up. A thousand tongues of flame streamed upward through the crannies of the gaping deck, and between the wide orifices of the planks and timbers the dazzling flames gleamed; a thousand resistless arms seemed extended forward to grasp the fabric now completely at its mercy, and the hot breath of the fire shriveled up all in its path before yet its hands were laid upon it.

And fast and furious, with eager advance, the flames rushed on devouring everything. Through the hatchway, around which the fiercest fires gathered, the stream of flame rose impetuously on high, in a straight upward torrent, hurling up a vast pyramid of fire to the ebon skies, a φλογος μέγαν πύλωνα which, like that which once illumined the Slavonic strait with the signal-fire first caught from burning Troy, here threw its radiance far over the deep.

While the lighter wood lasted the flame was in the ascendant, and nobly it did its work. Whatever could be done by bright radiance and far-penetrating lustre was done here. If that ship which had passed held any men on board capable of feeling a human interest in the visible signs of calamity at sea, they would be able to read in this flame that there was disaster somewhere upon these waters, and if they had human hearts they would turn to see if there was not some suffering which they might relieve.

But the lighter and the dryer wood was at last consumed, and now there remained that which Brandon had never touched, the dense masses which still lay piled where they had been placed eighteen years before. Upon these the fire now marched. But already the long days and weeks of scorching sun and fierce wind had not been without their effects, and the dampness had been subdued. Besides, the fire that advanced upon them had already gained immense advantage; for one half of the brig was one glowing mass of heat, which sent forth its consuming forces, and withered up, and blighted, and annihilated all around. The close-bound and close-packed masses of staves and boards received the resistless embrace of the fire, and where they did not flame they still gave forth none the less a blazeless glow.

Now from the burning vessel the flame arose no more; but in its place there appeared that which sent forth as vivid a gleam, and as far-flashing a light. The fire had full sway, though it gave forth no blaze, and, while it gleamed but little, still it devoured. From the sides of the ship the planks, blasted by the intense heat and by the outburst of the flames, had sprung away, and now for nearly all the length of the vessel the timbers were exposed without any covering. Between these flashed forth the gleam of the fire inside, which now in one pure mass glowed with dazzling brightness and intense heat.

But the wood inside, damp as it was, and solid in its fibre, did not allow a very swift progress to the fire. It burned, but it burned slowly. It glowed like the charcoal of a furnace from behind its wooden bars.

The massive timbers of mahogany wood yielded slowly and stubbornly to the conflagration. They stood up like iron bars long after all the interior was one glowing mass. But, though they yielded slowly, still they had to yield with the passage of hours to the progress of the fire. And so it came to pass that at length the strong sides, sapped by the steady and resistless assault, surrendered. One by one the stout timbers, now wasted and weakened, gave way and sank down into the fervid mass beneath. At last the whole centre was one accumulation of glowing ashes, and all that remained were the bow, covered with sand, and the stern, with the quarter-deck.

The fire spread in both directions. The stern yielded first. Here the strong deck sustained for a time the onset of the fire that had consumed every thing beneath, but at last it sunk in; the timbers of the sides followed next, and all had gone. With the bow there was a longer and a harder struggle. The fire had penetrated far into that part of the vessel; the flames smouldered there, but the conflagration went on, and smoke and blue flames issued from every part of that sandy mound, which, fiercely assailed by the heat, gave way in every direction, broke into a million crevices, and in places melted and ran together in a glowing molten heap. Here the fires burned longest, and here they lived and gleamed until morning.

Long before morning Brandon had fallen asleep. He had stood first near the burning wreck. Then the heat forced him to move away, and he had gone to a ridge of sand, where this peninsula joined the island. There he sat down, watching the conflagration for a long time. There the light flashed, and if that ship for whom he was signaling had noticed this sign, and had examined the island, his figure could be seen to any one that chose to examine.

But hours passed on. He strained his eyes through the gloom in the direction in which the ship had vanished to see if there were any sign there. None appeared. The progress of the fire was slow. It went on burning and glowing with wonderful energy all through the night, till at last, not long before dawn, the stern fell in, and nothing now was left but the sand-mound that covered the bows, which, burning beneath, gave forth smoke and fire.

Then, exhausted by fatigue, he sank down on the sand and fell into a sound sleep.

In the midst of thronging dreams, from the depths of that imaginary land where his weary spirit wandered in sleep, he was suddenly roused. A hand was laid on his shoulder, which shook him roughly, and a hoarse voice shouted in his ear, "Mess-mate! Halloo, mess-mate! Wake up!"

Brandon started up and gazed with wild, astonished eyes around. It was day. The sun was two or three hours above the horizon. He was surrounded by half a dozen seamen, who were regarding him with wondering but kindly faces. The one who spoke appeared to be their leader. He held a spy-glass in his hand. He was a sturdy, thick-set man of about fifty, whose grizzled hair, weather-beaten face, groggy nose, and whiskers, coming all round under his chin, gave him the air of old Benbow as he appears on the stage—"a reg'lar old salt," "sea-dog," or whatever other name the popular taste loves to apply to the British tar.

"Hard luck here, mess-mate," said this man, with a smile. "But you're all right now. Come! Cheer up! Won't you take a drink?" And he held out a brandy-flask.

Brandon rose mechanically in a kind of maze, not yet understanding his good fortune, not yet knowing whether he was alive or dead. He took the flask and raised it to his lips. The insipid draught gave him new life. He looked earnestly at the Captain as he handed it back, and then seized both his hands.

"God Almighty bless you for this, noble friend, whoever you are! But how and when did you get here? Who are you? Did you not see my signal on the rock yesterday—?"

"One question at a time, mess-mate," said the other, laughingly. "I'm Captain Corbet, of the ship Falcon, bound from Sydney to London, and these are some of my men. We saw this light last night about midnight, right on our weather-bow, and came up to see what it was. We found shoal water, and kept off till morning. There's the Falcon, Sir."

The Captain waved his hand proudly to where a large, handsome ship lay, about seven miles away to the south.

"On your bow? Did you see the fire ahead of you?" asked Brandon, who now began to comprehend the situation.

"Yes."

"Then you didn't pass me toward the north yesterday?"

"No; never was near this place before this morning."

"It must have been some other ship, then," said Brandon, musingly.

"But how did you get here, and how long have you been here?"

Brandon had long since decided on the part he was to play. His story was all ready.

"My name is Edward Wheeler. I came out supercargo in the brig Argo, with a cargo of hoghead staves and box shooks from London to Manilla. On the 16th of September last we encountered a tremendous storm and struck on this sand-bank. It is not down on any of the charts. The vessel stuck hard and fast, and the sea made a clean breach over us. The captain and crew put out the boat, and tried to get away, but were swamped and drowned. I staid by the wreck till morning. The vessel stood the storm well, for she had a solid cargo, was strongly built, and the sand formed rapidly all about her. The storm lasted for several days, and by the end of that time a shoal had formed. Several storms have occurred since, and have heaped the sand all over her. I have lived here ever since in great misery. Yesterday a vessel passed, and I put up a signal on the rock over there, which she did not notice. In despair I set fire to the brig, which was loaded with wood and burned easily. I watched till morning, and then fell asleep. You found me so. That's all I have to say.

On hearing this story nothing could exceed the kindness and sympathy of these honest-hearted seamen. The Captain insisted on his taking another drink, apologized for having to carry him back to England, and finally hurried him off to the boat. Before two hours Brandon stood on the deck of the Falcon.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE LITTLE SICK KITTEN.

"AUNTIE, will you tell me about your little white kitty that was sick?"

And little Alice climbed into Aunt Mary's lap, and rested her head wearily on her shoulder.

"Don't you feel very well, dear?"

"No, I don't feel very well; but will you tell me about your little sick kitty?"

"Yes, I will. When Auntie was a little girl she had two beautiful little white kittens. They were just alike. They had soft white fur, and long curling tails. They were all white except their paws, which were black, just like Alice's slipper."

"Like my slipper!" repeated Alice, putting out one little foot, and looking at it carefully, to see if it was like a kitten's paw.

"Yes, black, like your slipper. My white kittens had nice times playing together. They would frolic on the floor, and run around after their own tails trying to catch them."

Alice laughed. "Could they catch them?"

"Sometimes they could. They had some blue ribbon tied around their necks, and they were very pretty."

"I want a little white kitten with a blue ribbon around her neck, Auntie?"

"I wish I had one to give you," said Aunt Mary.

"Perhaps you will have one sometime as pretty as mine. But one day one of my white kittens was sick. She did not play, but said 'Mew, Mew,' very piteously. I asked Grandmamma what I could do to make her well again, and she told me to give her some catnip tea, as a medicine. So I went up stairs and found some catnip in a paper. I brought some of it down, and put it into a tin dish, and poured some hot water on it, and set it on the stove. When it was done, I poured it into a saucer, and put some milk with it. Then I put the saucer on the floor, and called 'Kitty, kitty!' And my little white kitty came walking slowly along. She was too sick to run. Then I said to her, 'Poor kitty, here is some medicine for you.' And she put her tongue into the saucer and lapped the medicine all up."

"I can take medicine," said Alice.

"Yes, you always take medicine very nicely. So did kitty. Then I took kitty carefully in my arms and carried her into the shed where her bed was. Her bed was a basket, with a soft piece of carpet in the bottom of it. I put her into the basket, and she shut up her eyes and curled up her tail, and went to sleep. Early the next morning I went to see kitty. She was just waking up. I stroked her soft fur, so."

Aunt Mary stroked Alice's little fat arm, to show her how she stroked kitty's back.

"And she began to say 'Purr, purr, purr,' then I knew she was better."

"All better?" asked Alice.

"No, not 'all better,' but a little better. I thought she must take some more medicine to get 'all better.'"

"Some catnip tea?" said Alice.

"Some catnip tea. So I made her some more catnip tea, and put some milk with it, and poured it into a saucer for her. Then I called 'Kitty! kitty!' and she came and lapped it all up. In a little while my sick kitty was quite well, and could frolic about as gayly as ever."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. M. H. C.—Both trailing and short dresses are worn for church. The latter have the preference, the former being chiefly confined to carriages.

An ordinary train for home wear should be from ten to twenty inches longer behind than in front. Trains for full-dress parties and brides are from a yard and a half to a yard and three-quarters in length. Empress and poplin dresses may be trimmed with passementerie, fringe, or satin rouleaux or folds; the satin, however, is apt to fray on woollen goods. Some very pretty styles of trimming will be seen in the Home Toilettes on our first page.

THE TENANTS OF MALORY. A Novel. By J. S. LE FANU, Author of "Uncle Silas," "Guy Deverell," "All in the Dark," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

No writer more fully fulfills the odd idiomatic expression of "carrying the reader along with him." The reader is "carried along" wherever Mr. Le Fanu pleases—by the strangest and most out-of-the-way routes, by the most simple and flowery paths, by the most doleful, difficult, and mysterious tunnelings, swiftly, certainly, and willingly, to the end. So swiftly and so eagerly, indeed, that sometimes when he has finished it he indulges himself, after a breathing halt, with a slower examination of his favorite chapters, and begins reading the novel a second time, musing over it, smiling at it, wondering he did not foresee this and comprehend that, conscious of meanings missed and prophetic hints overlooked in his great hurry, and finding the second perusal even more pleasant than the first.—London Times.

ALEC FORBES OF HOWGLEN. A Novel. By GEORGE MACDONALD, M.A., Author of "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," "Guild Court," &c. 8vo., Paper, 75 cents.

No account of this book would give any idea of the profound interest that pervades it from the first page to the last.—Athenaeum.

A more beautifully written story never came from even this author's pen.—Illustrated News.

A really noble book.—Edinburgh Courant.

It is the production of a man of cultivated mind, of sterling sympathy, of keen appreciation of humor, of tender sympathies, of truly poetic feeling. It will win its way by slow and sure degrees, appealing to thoughtful readers by its purity of tone, the elevation of its teachings, the touching simplicity of its narration.—The Round Table.

CIRCE; or, THREE ACTS IN THE LIFE OF AN ARTIST. A Novel. By BABINGTON WHITE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

The book is a good and clever one, remarkably readable, and above the average of ordinary works of fiction.—Globe.

A romance that, once commenced, will not be readily laid aside till the last page is perused. The interest is wonderfully well sustained.—Era.

The story is written with cleverness, and will be read with considerable interest.—Observer.

Not only readable, but interesting in an eminent degree.—Court Circular.

The story itself is charming.—Cosmopolitan.

A more powerfully written novel, with a more simple and well constructed story, has not lately come before us. We here lay down "Circe," confessing that its perusal has enthralled us.—Morning Advertiser.

This novel is one of the best of the day.—News of the World.

Those who have not yet read "Circe" have a great pleasure to come. It is one of the most brilliant productions of modern times, written with a rare elegance and power, and telling a plain unvarnished story, in a manner which leads the reader on with deep interest and pleasant suspense till the last page. There is also much scholarship shown, but scholarship deprived of pedantry, and a moral deduced which is worthy of being widely disseminated and taken to heart.—Court Journal.

This is an extraordinary book. It is a story of character, not of incident, and it is fraught with a terrible moral.—Edinburgh Daily Review.

GUNPOWDER, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.
Coffee roasted and ground daily.
Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY), we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIRS OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. Grey. Two Portraits on Steel. Large 12mo. Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

"This pathetic book—glowing with household fondnesses, and plain to boldness in its resolute wish to let nothing go of the dead that can be saved—will speak to millions the things they understand best. A certain surprise will be felt on the part of some that a Queen can be so wholly a woman and a wife; but all will be glad that her Majesty makes friends of her readers, and tells them, like one who is not afraid to put her love to the test of the uttermost truth, how much she loved this man, and what good reason she had for her devotion."

HARPER'S BAZAR.
The Publishers have just commenced the issue of HARPER'S BAZAR, a Weekly Illustrated Family Journal, devoted to Fashion and Home Literature. Their aim is twofold: to supply the existing need of a Weekly Fashion Newspaper, and to combine therewith a first-class literary journal, which will be indispensable to every household.

It is the first Weekly Journal of Fashion ever published in the United States. The Publishers have made arrangements, at great cost, with the most celebrated of the Fashion Papers of Europe, especially with the famous Bazar of Berlin, which supplies the fashions to the leading journals of Paris, to furnish the same to them in advance, so that henceforth the fashions will appear in HARPER'S BAZAR simultaneously with their publication in Paris and Berlin—an advantage enjoyed by no other journal in the country.

The patrons of HARPER'S BAZAR will receive every fortnight large pattern-plates, containing from forty to fifty full-sized patterns of ladies', misses', and children's bonnets, cloaks, dresses, under-clothing, and other articles, accompanied with the necessary descriptions and directions, and occasionally an elegant colored fashion plate.

HARPER'S BAZAR, besides being the leading Fashion Journal in this country, will also aim to present before its readers the very best specimens of Household Literature. It will contain original and selected Serial Stories, Poetry, Novels, Articles on the Topics of the Day (excluding Politics), on Books, Art, Morals, Familiar Science, Education, Amusements, Hygiene, Etiquette, Housekeeping, Gardening, with Home and Foreign Gossip. No subject of household interest will be excluded from its columns.

HARPER'S BAZAR will contain 16 folio pages, of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superlative calendered paper, and will be published weekly.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the World."

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

We can account for its success only by the simple fact that it meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructive variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A Complete Pictorial History of the Times."

"The best, cheapest, and most successful Family Paper in the Union."

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
SPLENDIDLY ILLUSTRATED.

The MODEL NEWSPAPER of our country—complete in all the departments of an American Family Paper—HARPER'S WEEKLY has earned for itself a right to its title, "A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION."—New York Evening Post.

This Paper furnishes the best illustrations. Our future historians will enrich themselves out of HARPER'S WEEKLY long after writers, and printers, and publishers are turned to dust.—New York Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY from week to week form a remarkable series of brief political essays. They are distinguished by clear and pointed statements, by good common sense, by independence and breadth of view. They are the expression of mature conviction, high principle, and strong feeling, and take their place among the best newspaper writing of the time.—North American Review, Boston, Mass.

The Publishers have perfected a system of mailing by which they can supply the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR promptly to those who prefer to receive their periodicals directly from the Office of Publication. Postmasters and others desirous of getting up Clubs will be supplied with a Show-Bill on application.

The postage on HARPER'S WEEKLY is 20 cents a year, on the BAZAR 20 cents, and on the MAGAZINE 24 cents, which must be paid at the subscriber's post-office.

PEASANTS OF SABLES D'OLONNE, VENDÉE.

ALSATIANS FROM THE SUBURBS OF STRASBOURG, RHENISH FRANCE.

NATIONAL COSTUMES AT THE PARIS EXPOSITION.

ONE of the most interesting sights in the great Paris Exposition, soon to close, is the different sections appropriated to the various nations, wherein are found not only the products of these countries but also the people in their national costumes. The picturesque and unique effect produced by these varied styles of dress thus brought into juxtaposition is described by visitors as striking in the extreme. Here are found grouped the Chinaman, the Japanese, the Arab, the Persian, the Nubian, the Turk, the Siberian, the Russian, and all the peoples of both continents, in short, who are gathered together for the space of a few months, then again to be dispersed over the surface of the globe. The confusion of tongues must equal the confusion of dress, and make the place seem a real Tower of Babel.

We give illustrations of some of these costume-figures, showing the people of the Lower Loire, the country round Strasbourg, and the villages of Mecklenburg, in their home dress. The first of these are among the most singular specimens of costume now remaining among the peasantry of Europe. This is the jaunty dress of the peasants of Sables d'Olonne, the ancient Arenæ Aulonenses, in the Vendée. Sables d'Olonne is a sea-port town on the Bay of Biscay, which stands partly on a sandy peninsula almost separated from the sea, and partly on an elevated rock, and consists of three or four long streets, with a port for vessels of moderate size. The dress of its peasants is a kind of cross between that of the Breton peasants and the Spanish peasantry. A marked contrast is presented by the sedate yet quaint Alsace dress of the dwellers in the suburbs of Strasbourg, in Rhenish France, that debatable land, half French and half German, which France has always claimed and so often lost and won. Close by is the clean-shaved Mecklenburg peasant, in his smart postillion dress, which the pretty and piquant-looking girl by his side, in her holiday costume, evidently considers becoming.

CROCHET LAMBALLE FANCHON.
For pattern see Supplement, No. III., Fig. 15.

Knitted Hood.

Material, $4\frac{1}{2}$ oz. white single zephyr, 3 oz. red double zephyr, a small quantity of black double zephyr, and two fine wooden needles.

This hood is made of white single zephyr, knitted backward and forward on the right side. The trimming consists of a knitted stripe of red double zephyr, with points of white single zephyr crocheted along the edge. Fig. 28 gives the pattern of one-half of the hood, which must be closely followed. Begin the back of the hood with a chain of 32 stitches, and knit according to the pattern in the manner above described. The necessary widening and narrowing is done at the outer edge. For the trimming, which is knit crosswise, make a chain of 4 stitches with the red zephyr, and proceed as follows:

1st row, *. Drop the next stitch from the needle, knit the following on the right side, then take up the stitch before dropped and knit on the right side also, making the two cross each other on the right side of the hood. Repeat from * to end.
2d row. Cast off *, slip, and purl 1, thus making the two last cross on the right side. Repeat from * to the end, purling the last stitch. Repeat these two rows till the border has attained the requisite length. Then crochet with white zephyr 1 single crochet in each loop along the whole edge of the strip lengthwise; in the following row, crochet 1 single crochet in every single crochet, with 10 chain stitches between, which must be quite loose. Knit every three of these chain stitches together with a single stitch of black worsted, to form the points, and set the lace on the edge of the hood, as seen in the illustration, holding the latter somewhat full from the middle of the front on both sides to *. Run a white worsted cord along the dotted line so that the ends may meet in the middle behind, and finish them with red tassels, having first arranged the cord in four loops on each side, which are combined with four loops of black velvet sewn on the hood. Two buttons and a loop of white worsted fasten the hood under the chin.

GONE.

LITTLE Mamie, fresh and fair,
Laughing eyes and curly hair,
How I loved you, darling sweet!
And the patter of your feet
Through the entry up the stairs,
Bringing smiles, beguiling cares;
Ever ready for some play
From the dawn till close of day:
Lovely, beaming, childish face,
Shining with a nameless grace!

Little Mamie, cold and pale,
Shadowed with the mystic veil,
On her brow and lip and hand
The signet of the Better Land.
Who would wake the pulse's beat,
Call the life to those still feet?
Know ye not those curls at rest
Are pillowed on an angel's breast?
That the still and marble face
Is shining with a fadeless grace?

So we reason, thus we speak,
But we can not dry our cheek;
We shall miss her till the day
God doth wipe all tears away.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1867.

Ladies in the Country will be supplied gratuitously through the mails with the FIRST SIX NUMBERS OF HARPER'S BAZAR upon written application to the Publishers.

Single Subscribers to HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied from the beginning to the end of the year 1868, which will complete the first Volume, for the yearly price of Four Dollars.

MANNERS OF OUR CHILDREN.

YOUNG AMERICA, thanks to our excellent elementary schools, our broad parks with skating-ponds and ball-fields, and every possible provision by church and family for religious training, promises to be as robust, smart, and good a child, perhaps, as any paterfamilias could desire. His manners, however, though we are loth to confess it, require a great deal of mending.

American children have a pertness, which, with proud papa and fond mamma, passes doubtless for proof of cleverness, but which, to those influenced either by maternal or paternal interests, appears simply an evidence of ill-breeding. The cause of this unseemly behavior of our little ones is apparent. They come out too soon. They have hardly cut their incisor teeth before they are introduced into society. We are not for keeping Master Augustus forever in the nursery, with a bib and tucker under his dimpled chin, and a daisy of pap in his pretty mouth. Far from it: we like to see him occasionally in the drawing-room. It is better for him and his parents, too, that they should be often together, for they have much to learn from each other. He, however, for his own good, and for the comfort of others, should be kept more than he is from general society. He is now not only brought down to "see company," however indiscriminate it may be, in the paternal house, but is allowed to have the run, and take his seat at the miscellaneous table of the hotel. Here his manners and digestion are both spoiled. A youngster the other day, whose stretched toes barely reached the top-most round of the chair, was closing a frightfully voracious hotel dinner with a mixture of lobster-salad and custard-pie, when a patriarchal old gentleman, who sat opposite to him, ventured to suggest that that choleraic compound might possibly disagree with him. "I don't see it," answered the precocious darling.

Complaints are constantly heard, not merely from crusty old bachelors, but from good-natured people whose parental instincts are in full bloom, of the intrusiveness and insubordination of our children, who are allowed to have their say and a free run, and give full vent to their ebullish boisterousness on all occasions. Thus in every public place, whether in car, steamboat, or hotel, we are liable to have our conversation interrupted, our legs tripped up, or our quietude disturbed by our untamed juveniles. We are so fond of our "little dears" that we pray their parents not to allow them, as is too often the case, to be turned into gigantic nuisances.

It would be well if our little children were to catch a grace from the Lilliputian gentlemen and ladies of courtly France. It is astonishing how well-mannered these little Monsieurs and Mademoiselles are, whether in company of those of their own age or of their elders. Look at them playing together, trundling a hoop, tossing a ball, jumping a rope, or what not. They are not only as graceful in their movements, but as polite toward each other as so many courtiers and their dames dancing at the court of Louis XIV. How deferential, too, are these little beings to their elders, however inferior may be their social position! They are so to servants no less than to their parents. So thoroughly, and at so early an age, are they imbued with politeness, that it appears almost innate, and shows itself even in their moments of ill-humor. The emphatic Anglo-Saxon "I sha'n't," "I won't," and "I can't," are translated by no stronger phrases of Gallic childhood in passion than "Excusez-moi, s'il vous plait," "C'est impossible," "If you please," and "I thank you," so seldom uttered by Young America, are always offered by the courtly little ones of France for any service asked or received.

The French child is much indebted to his nurse for his graceful behavior. She has not only the good-manners of her race, but, being brought into more intimate relations in France with her mistress than is the custom with us, she receives a reflected refinement from her superior polish. Most American children are in this respect at a great disadvantage, as those to whom is confided their first training are apt to be the rudest kind of she-bears, either from the bogs of Tipperary or the jungles of the Black Forest. American mothers, though it must be confessed that the task would be hard, should strive to polish their servants somewhat if they wish to improve the manners of their children. Much could be done by lessening the prevailing reserve between mistress and maid, and thus bringing the latter, by more intimate daily association, under the influence of the better manners of the former.

This is not only a question of how to make a bow or a courtesy. It is of much higher importance. The docility of a child depends greatly upon its manners. When these are endowed with an early yielding grace, more than half the difficulty of education is overcome.

AIR AND EXERCISE FOR LADIES.

PURE air is as potent as wine. Possessing none of the injurious qualities of the latter, it gives elasticity to the frame, imparts a ruddy glow to the cheeks, and drives the sluggish blood even to the finger-tips. The idea that air is detrimental to the complexion is an erroneous one, for the very habit of inhaling it reddens the blood, and renders the complexion clear. The redder the blood the more cheerful the disposition; while, on the contrary, the darker the blood the more melancholy the sensations. Late dinners and late hours should be looked upon as a pestilence, and avoided with horror. An ill-spent youth generally ends in a regretful old age; and this is brought about by a non-attendance to the common duties of health.

There is an ancient rule of health which reads as follows:

"Rise early, and take exercise in plenty,
But always take it with your stomach empty."

Exercise in the open air is indispensable. Hence a woman who does not work to maintain her family must work to maintain her life. She should employ her limbs as well as her mind, for without exercise the body becomes enfeebled. It is recorded that in the reign of Henry III. of England, Lady Joan Berkeley "in her elder years used to saw billets and sticks in her chamber for a part of physic, for which purpose she bought certain fine hand-saws"—a custom which might be adopted with beneficent results by the ladies of the present day. It is a well-known fact that idle persons are always unhappy, for mental vigor can not be preserved without bodily exercise.

To ride a horse well should be an essential point in a lady's education. In all countries but our own horsemanship has been brought to a high state of perfection. In England, especially, the ladies are fearless riders. It is stated that, on May 3, 1758, a wager was laid at Newmarket by a young lady that she would ride 1000 miles in 1000 hours, which she accomplished in a little more than a third of the time. Horsemanship is a combination of amusement and exercise, for while it cheers the spirits it adds muscular power to the frame. In no city are better opportunities offered for the pursuit of this noble art than in our own. The bridle-paths of Central Park are famed for their romantic loveliness. There birds sing merrily in the trees, and the breeze is redolent with the perfume of flowers. There the eye dwells on a constant change of scene, and there the lungs drink in the pure air of heaven.

Health is the greatest treasure on earth, but one, at the same time, that is least valued by its owner. It is only when this jewel is lost that it is sought after with a zeal equal to its real value. Those who are unable to find it on land generally recover it in the water. Like the fish, they pine away upon shore, but renew their life in the deep. Bathing, by rejuvenating the body, clearing the skin, and allaying the nerves, contributes to health, beauty, and good-temper. Although the ladies of this nation can not bathe in the open air as they do in some countries, still an excellent substitute is afforded them by the introduction of baths in private houses. Let them remember that the famous painters and sculptors of all times have represented Venus in the act of bathing as their beau-ideal of womanly beauty.

The preservation of health should be one of the chief aims of life, for "That which makes us have no need Of physic, that's physic indeed."

Breakfast at a reasonable hour, and do not eat to satiety. Make a hearty meal at noon, and sup sparingly. Take exercise, but do not walk too long at one time. Retire early, and be up with the lark. By the adoption of these rules you will secure the best of all cosmetics, health, at a cheap rate.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to some Young Friends upon Broadway.

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS,—If you have taken the trouble to stroll through the Bazar, whose pretty doors were opened to all the world only a month ago, you have possibly remarked the modest letters of your correspondent. He has been writing to several of our young friends of both sexes, upon their conduct in the cars, in hotels, and so forth, and venturing to offer a little criticism and advice which his years and experience justify. But this morning, as he was coming down Broadway, and watching the great crowd that flows and flows undiminished along that channel—undiminished, at least, during the hours when ladies are abroad—your most humble servant reflected that this famous thoroughfare is the most frequented road upon this continent, and the gay crowd—these lovely ladies in wonderful bonnets, these loitering men of every age and dress and occupation—are only travelers. Indeed it is a road upon which we all travel. And looking in at the shop-windows, and around upon our fellow-voyagers, do we not seem to pass through every zone and country? Yes, it is a road that leads around the world. The city, as Mr. C. W. Elliott said in his lecture before the Historical Society, is a perpetual fair, and every climate and country has its booth in it.

As we stroll along the road we stop at the Japanese booth, and the Chinese booth, and that of the Arctic regions. Still traveling on the same pavement, we coast along the spice islands of the tropics and the shores of Lake Superior. If we are warm, let us pause a moment here in Switzerland; if cool, let us dip into the soft air of the Gulf. Now we are in Germany; and a few paces bring us into France, and into the gay capital of the world. All this, dear friends, as we travel along Broadway, which is certainly the most thronged road and the most famous, as we were saying, upon this continent, but not very interesting nor picturesque as a road merely, or a street. It is all new. It was built yesterday. There are many huge and imposing buildings, and painfully costly, but there is not one of them which is not fatally deformed by shop-signs. It is only a prolonged marble booth. It is a street of shop-keepers.

In saying so do I sneer at my fellow-citizens? Am I a haughty aristocrat, despising honest labor? "Shop-keepers, forsooth!" I hear some one of you exclaim, "and what is his High Mightiness Our Correspondent?" A shop-keeper also, gracious Sir or Madam, precisely like your honorable selves. We are all, I hope, engaged in honestly selling our wares, whatever they may be. But your exclamation is a good illustration of our bad manners upon the road. Why are we so "touchy" that we are ashamed of our business, and resent calling things by their right names? There is my good friend the apple-woman at the corner of the Post-office. She sells you at this season sound pippins, or comely gilliflowers, or greenings, or russets, or Baldwins. You look over her stock, you make your selection, you buy; terms, cash on delivery, or approved promise to pay to-morrow. She sells her goods upon her barrel-head at the curbstone upon her own terms. My excellent friend Mr. Stewart, in his noble palaces of trade, does no more. She is a shop-keeper. So is he. So are you, perhaps. So am I, certainly. Now why do you fire up with indignation as if I had insulted somebody or something when I call Broadway a street of shop-keepers? What else is it? There is the long, sombre Metropolitan Hotel, its basement bedraggled with signs of every kind. What is it? A shop in which they sell excellent accommodations. Or the gay St. Nicholas? A shop. Or the theatres? Shops. The omnibuses? Shops. I repeat, therefore, Broadway is a street of shops, and we who travel upon it, and who have booths for trading along its sides, are shop-keepers.

I repeat, also, my young friends, that there is no harm in keeping shop, but there is great harm in being ashamed of it. And that reminds me of another point of exceedingly bad manners which I observe in many of our fellow-travelers upon this road of Broadway. It is the assumption of Mrs. O'Flaherty upon one sidewalk that she is superior to Mrs. M'Fenian upon the other, because while she sells Baldwins and greenings by the dozen, Mrs. M'Fenian sells Baldwins only, and singly. She is a very absurd old apple-woman, is she not, this Mrs. O'Flaherty? So she is; and now the misery and the joke is, that it is not Mrs. O'Flaherty and Mrs. M'Fenian at all, but it is you and I. What says the old Latin phrase? De te fabula narratur. Thou art the man! The truth is, as you know, that I am an importer and manufacturer, and you are a retail dealer.

I, therefore, am of the bluest blood of the nobility, and you, poor pariah, you are a hopeless plebeian. Don't you understand what I am saying? Well, then, this is what I mean. Here is De Boots, who is some-kind of clerk, perhaps salesman with Poplin & Company, the great dry-goods house in Church Street is it, or just round the corner? And he stops at Paton's, perhaps, to buy a necessary garment, and he patronizes the clerk—the affable and gentlemanly salesman behind the counter. Why so? For the same reason precisely that Mrs. O'Flaherty looks down upon Mrs. M'Fenian. It is because De Boots sells the goods by the case, and the other salesman by the yard. It is the affair of the dozen apples and the single apple. I hope my excellent young friend will mend his manners in this respect, and will understand that he is no more respectable, no more a gentleman, of no more account whatever, because he sells cloth by the hundred yards than if he sold it by the single yard.

But he is not the only sinner of this kind. I went last evening to a delightful little party, where I had the happiness of meeting Polly Poplin, or, as she prefers to be called (and I don't wonder), Miss Mary Poplin. She is the daughter of Peter Poplin, the dry-goods merchant, of whom we were just speaking. She wears very rich and often very beautiful clothes, and she is so very handsome when she is superbly dressed that it is a pleasure to behold and admire her. But she has seriously damaged that pleasure for me, I confess, for she said to me last evening, when a modest and sweet-mannered and prettily-dressed young woman came in, "Now, Mr. Bachelor, I vow and declare! Did you ever? Why, that is Jane Crump, the daughter of our grocer! I should like to know what society is coming to!" And I should like to know what Polly Poplin's uncle is. He is a grocer: what they call a provision merchant. Polly's uncle sells mackerel by the half-barrel, and Jane Crump's father sells them singly. So Jane's father's daughter is not good enough company for Polly's uncle's niece. Thus Mrs. Polly O'Flaherty upon one sidewalk sniffs at Mrs. Jane M'Fenian upon the other. My dearest Polly, I have seen the day when the leader of fashionable society was the daughter of a shoemaker. Yes, I assure you, and foreign princes chose her daughter for a partner in the dance. Why shouldn't she be the daughter of a shoemaker? There is no more useful calling. It is almost as useful a business as gambling in the Gold Room. You, Miss Polly, would have given your opal ring to have been the bosom friend of the shoemaker's grand-daughter. But you find the grocer's daughter quite intolerable to your ladyship's gentility. If your grandmother, the mother of the grocer, were living, she would say to you, "Polly Poplin, don't be a fool." And I say, Amen!

Again, dear young friends, as you travel along the famous road of Broadway, whether it be the New York Broadway or any other, try to show your good-manners in your attire. I don't mean that you are always to cloud yourself with dull, cold, gray colors and neutral tints. In a world of asters, and roses, and golden-rod, and carnations, and laburnums, and dahlias; in a world of green leaves, and crimson, and yellow; of blue sky, and sunshine, and stars, and a sparkling ocean, don't be afraid of bright and beautiful colors, nor of taste and grace in form and material. Neither offend by despising the fashion, and lagging behind it, and protesting against it. You might as well protest against the changing seasons or the moulting of the birds. You will only make yourselves grotesque and ludicrous; and your very refusal to conform will only be a glaring and perpetual advertisement of the importance you ascribe to dress. But be sensible and moderate—never out of the fashion, never too much in it. There are young Broadway travelers of the male sex who seem to be merely the handiwork of barbers and tailors. They are as much walking advertisements as the old men who carry placards of corn-plasters and other useful commodities. And there are travelers of the female sex who are equally mere advertisements of the dress-makers. If your fellow-travelers upon Broadway turn and stare at your dress, reform it. It is conspicuous either by too great richness or the reverse. Follow in dress the rule of pronunciation, which is the best usage.

As for smoking in the street—smoking in Broadway—it is the very height of bad-manners upon the road. It is offensive to every lady to receive a whiff of smoke from your mouth. It prejudices against you those whose opinion is most agreeable and useful to you. It shows that a delightful recreation has become a despotic habit, and that you are the slave of the pipe or the cigar instead of its master. Indeed, smoking upon the street has, upon this busy road of Broadway at least, an indescribable appearance of "loafishness" and rowdiness. Mose may smoke of course, and so may you, if you wish to be mistaken for him.

Good-by, dear friends, and, as we journey together around the world down Broadway, let us all honestly strive to mend our manners.

Your servant to command,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

AMONG those pretty knitted garments which afford such graceful employment for leisure hours and add so much to one's comfort as the cold weather advances, we have seen some beautiful Afghans, shawls, hoods, and jackets. The Berlin zephyr wools, split, single, double fold, and triple, are principally used in their manufacture. The black and white Shetland wools, formerly preferred for shawls, have given place to the various zephyrs. Fine Saxony wool is used for knitting infants' under wear.

Zephyr wool varies in price according to color. White is sold at three dollars twenty-five cents a pound, plain colors at four dollars, and high colors at five. Clouded or shaded wools, and the different chinchillas, the tiger chinchilla with large black and white spots, and the speckled œil de Perdrix or guinea hen wool, are sold at four dollars and a half. Tinsel wool of all the bright shades interwoven with gilt is six dollars a pound.

Afghans require from four to five pounds of double zephyr with some extra wools for embroidery. An outlay of thirty or forty dollars will purchase materials for a large Afghan that would cost ready made seventy-five or a hundred dollars. Striped patterns and plain grounds with figures in the centre are preferable to those in blocks, as the blocks do not wear well. A very handsome one at a hundred and twenty-five dollars was of white stripes embroidered in brilliant colors, alternating with a narrow black stripe wrought with white single zephyr to imitate lace. An infant's Afghan at twenty-five dollars had a white ground with bouquet centre and a rose-colored border with wreath of large white field daisies. A knotted fringe surrounded it. Another had blue stripes embroidered in a Grecian pattern, alternating with a vine of roses on white ground.

A coquettish little Fanchon hood was of white single zephyr with puffs of scarlet and white. A jacket for wearing under a cloak was in the Afghan stitch of double zephyr, chinchilla with a purple border. This garment was rounded in front and sloped on the shoulders with as much precision as if shaped with scissors. Toilette mats and tidies on Manila canvas were in striped Persian patterns, or embroidered in one color only, or in bouquets with Grecian borders and fringed. Cushion covers and bracket draperies in gay-colored Persian patterns were pretty and ornamental.

CALICOES AND MUSLINS.

We are glad to chronicle a still further reduction of prices in all kinds of cotton goods, calicoes, muslins, domestics, etc. French chintzes that sold two weeks since at 75 cents a yard are now sold at 60 cents; these are the high colors and plain stripes. Plain colors with chintz figures are 50 cents. Hoyle's English calico, the double purple, an excellent article, is sold at 30 cents. Merrimac W, the best brand, is 16 cents, and Merrimac D 14 cents. Sprague's prints and Pacific Mills have once more become shilling-calicoes.

Thrifty housewives, who delight in having shelves and drawers laden with snowy white garments, will be rejoiced at the declension to anti-war prices of all the standard muslins. The best heavy muslins for shirtings are, we believe, acknowledged to be the New York Mills and Waumutt. New York Mills is now 27 cents, and Waumutt 22 cents. The Utica, another favorite brand, is 23 cents. For ladies' and children's use the Androscoggin Z, the Lonsdale, and Blackstone muslins are preferred, as they are a lighter material. There are two qualities of the Lonsdale brand, one at 20 cents, suitable for all garments except skirts, and a cambric at 28 cents, intended expressly for skirts. A Lowell muslin seven-eighths wide, sold at 12½ cents, is a very fair article, quite worth making up. There are cambric long-cloths at 30 and 40 cents, and soft fine cambrics at 50 cents. Very pretty white brilliants are sold at 25 cents, and medium jacenets at 50 cents.

LINGERIE.

There is a reduction of 25 per cent. on linen goods. A fair article for under-linen may now be bought at 50 or 60 cents a yard. Cluny, guipure, and Maltese laces are the most serviceable laces for trimming. Valenciennes and thread are very frail, but nothing else looks so handsome in conjunction with very sheer linen, lawn, and cambric. Tucks that have the effect of being cut on the bias are pretty and durable trimming. They should be stretched lengthwise of the linen, and inserted diagonally. If cut bias they will not iron smoothly. Puffs and ruffles of cambric are also arranged diagonally. The old-fashioned Kenting is a good material for puffs, as it is stronger than linen-cambric. Embroidery on linen does not wear so well as that done on thick cambric. It is always best to select a pattern without herring-bone, as the strain on the thread in open work is too great, and it breaks easily. The machine embroidery is in pretty patterns, but we can not recommend it, as it frays easily.

Sets of linen made up for sale consist of five pieces, the night-dress, trimmed petticoat, plain under-skirt, chemise, and drawers, all of the same material and trimmed to match. They vary in price from fifty to three hundred dollars, according to quality of the material and ornament. They can, of course, be made up at home at much less expense, and with more attention to the nice details, such as rolled ruffles, overseamed selvages, and neatly-scraped gathers. It is too much the practice in our lingerie establishments to use the sewing-machine for all kinds of seams.

Petticoats, like skirts of dresses, are now gored to fit the figure below the waist. One of soft-finished cambric is trimmed with narrow diagonal tucks, twelve in a cluster, separated by insertions of Cluny. This border of tucks has on both sides a narrow cambric band, corded. A ruffle without edging terminates the skirt.

A dressing sacque of jaconet is trimmed down the front with a row of embroidery and guipure edging. Turned down collar, pointed in front. Loose coat-sleeves. Collar and cuffs trimmed like front of garment.

A chemise of Irish linen was open on the shoulder. The sleeves buttoned over from the back, and both they and the band were trimmed with Valenciennes insertions and edging. Another had a deeply-pointed yoke of narrow tucks, stitched lengthwise of the cloth, but set bias in the yoke, arranged in slanting lines so as to form a point in the centre. Narrow fluted ruffle of linen cambric edged with thread around the neck and sleeves. Still another, with neckbands of linen embroidery and Maltese edging, had in front and back a corset cover attached to the garment only at the neck, made of alternate puffs of linen, lawn, and Maltese insertion. Drawers trimmed to match accompanied each garment. A night-dress, handsome enough for a morning robe-de-chambre, was of fine cambric, with a tablier trimming across the whole front width, of puffs of cambric, separated by Valenciennes insertion. Standing collar of puffs and lace. Loose coat-sleeve, with puffs to the elbow. Another had a deeply-pointed yoke, back and front, of horizontal tucks. A row of jaconet edging surrounded the yoke, cuffs, and collars.

A sleeping-cap of India muslin was ornamented with guipure bands and edging. A draw-string in the crown enlarged or decreased the size of the cap. A day-cap, intended for an invalid, had something of a Fanchon shape. Strips of embroidery, edged with Valenciennes, and lined with rose-colored satin ribbon, served to hold up the chignon, and dispensed with a crown. Broad strings of lace, fastened low down with a small bow of ribbon.

An elegant negligée wrapper was made of cambric, trimmed with Cluny guipure insertion and edge. A square shallow yoke had the skirt gathered into it. Three pointed bands of insertion over the satin ribbon, and bordered with edging, extended from the yoke below the waist, both back and front. The trimming around the yoke, neck, and cuffs, was similarly managed.

A pretty trimming for flannel skirts is a braiding pattern chain-stitched by hand or machine with silk floss. It washes better than embroidery or braiding, and is very ornamental. Gilbert and Ballard vale flannels are good brands—a medium quality a yard wide and all wool is sold at seventy-five cents. For heavier garments the Shaker flannel is best. Woven merino vests do not shrink as those made of flannels and gauze. Embroidered corsets are not so much worn as those stitched with white satin twist. The French Coutille corsets are expensive, but are of the best material and shape, and wear well. The colored prunella and silk corsets are convenient for ladies when traveling, as it is a difficult matter to get white corsets properly washed.

HOUSEHOLD LINEN.

For the benefit of housewives we must mention some of the beautiful varieties of the season in household goods. Among piles of snowy table-linen the master-piece is an eight-yard cloth of exquisitely fine damask, as smooth and glossy as satin, with Prince of Wales plumes in the centre, and a wide shamrock border. Two dozen large napkins of corresponding design accompany the cloth. The price for the set is a hundred and twenty-five dollars. Very fair linen damask is sold at a dollar a yard; and napkins of good size and material vary from two dollars and a half a dozen to the beautiful Ardayne at thirty dollars. Brocaded dessert cloths, silk and linen mixed, with napkins to match, are exceedingly ornamental. They are in most delicate colors, blue brocaded with white, and white with amber. Breakfast cloths of pink and white, or buff and white, are pretty by way of variety. Printed wine cloths and toilettes in all widths for dessert cloths are from two dollars and a half to five dollars a yard.

We have seen an exquisite Marseilles counterpane from the French Exposition, with small raised figures strewn with pink roses. An imitation Gobelin tapestry piano cover, and smaller cloth for table to correspond, also from the Exhibition, were marvelously wrought with griffins and ghouls and elves. Thick, warm, soft Schuylkill blankets are twelve dollars a pair, and ten-quarter linen sheetings a dollar and twenty-five cents a yard; pillow linens, and a forty-inch width for bolsters at seventy-five cents and a dollar.

We have given Stewart's prices as a fair standard. These may vary somewhat according to quality or circumstances, but will be found on the average correct.

NOVELTIES.

Cloaks and muffs are worn to correspond. A black velvet sacque, half-adjusted to the figure, is short in the back, and long and scarf-like in front. A border of sable fur constitutes the trimming. Velvet muff with band of sable near each end. Sacques of sealskin and Astrakhan have muffs and toquets to match made of the same material.

The handsomest Opera sacque we have seen this season was of white corded silk. The garment was cut bias in front and folded over the breast instead of buttoning. The sleeves were open. It was exquisitely embroidered with white chenille and seed-pearls, and was bordered with snowy down. Long embroidered lappets passed over the shoulders and were fastened under the sleeves with tassels. The lining was white satin, quilted in clusters of diamonds. The price asked for this unique garment was one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

An Oriental cloak is of black Thibet cloth; the shape a loose sacque, the sleeves long and pointed. The gay trimming consists of a border of long leaves, embroidered in bright-colored purse-silks and variegated braid.

A pretty dress of blue Irish poplin, gored in the Princess style, is trimmed with rouleaux of satin of a darker blue. A low, square corselet is simulated by a rouleau about the shoulders. Short straps of the trimming are sewn in straight lines across the bodice with a large button in the centre. Similar straps are sewn on the sleeves from the wrist to the arm-hole. A rouleau edges the skirt and trims the pocket-flaps.

Satin rouleaux of all colors may be bought by the yard. The prices range from fifty cents to two dollars and a half, according to width. This trimming is made of satin pipings plaited together. It is newer than folds and bands, and does not fray so easily. It is a suitable trimming for all fine woollens, as velours, Empress cloth, etc.

Ten yards of velveteen will make a short gored dress, single skirt, and short jacket. The spotted English velvet with silk finish is the newest. Black ground with tiny white or blue spots.

A stylish dinner dress is of violet gros grain, with long trained skirt gored in the usual manner and ornamented with a robe trimming of gimp of the same shade as the silk, intermingled with jet. High corsage and close sleeves. A black velvet jacket without sleeves is worn with this dress. Long velvet sash tied behind and fringed with jet.

French cloth is much worn for dresses. It is not so lustrous as English cloth, and will not spot with rain. It is a yard and a half wide. Six yards are sufficient for a gored dress. Napoleon blue and Bismarck are the prettiest colors. Black worsted braid an inch wide, arranged à la militaire, is a suitable trimming. It may also be bordered with fur.

PERSONAL.

That good PRINCESS OF WALES has established herself thoroughly in the hearts of the English people, and more than makes up for the unprincipled ways of her husband. Right royally does she discharge every duty imposed upon her as the lady next in rank to the Queen, while as a wife and mother she is admirable. She is very domestic, and trains her children with the utmost care. They are very popular in London; every costermonger and street-sweeper lifts his hat to the little creatures as they pass by; and the salutation is returned by the children with a grace worthy of GEORGE IV. The Princess is very beneficent. She is kind to the poor. She has under her charge a hospital for sick children. She daily visits the pallet of the sick, and distributes little tokens of kindness, fruits and flowers. Some of the London poor when they died begged that the flowers given them by the Princess might be buried with them in their graves. Such acts deeply affect the English heart. They call out the deep love and admiration of the nation.

—COUNT PEPOLE, just deceased (ALBONI's husband), was a handsome person, and passionately beloved by the great contralto. While in this country they were always together, and seemed as happy a married couple as were ever seen. Poor man! he lost his mind, and his "life's brief candle" went out in a private madhouse.

—CHARLES DICKENS had the honor of being dined, on the 2d inst., by a company of gentlemen, embracing a larger number of legal, literary, artistic, military, and clerical notabilities than ever before gathered together to do honor to a literary man. The following list of stewards of the entertainment is of itself remarkable: The Lord Chief Baron, Jules Benedict, John Blackwood, Sir John Burgoyne, The Chaplain General of Her Majesty's Forces, Fred. Chapman, Wilkie Collins, Alderman Cotton, Sir Chas. Wentworth Dilke, Bart., W. Hepworth Dixon, Rev. Alexander Dyce, Thomas Faed, Charles Fechter, Sir William Ferguson, Bart., John Forster, W. P. Frith, Frederick Goodall, Sir Francis Grant, B. A. Glass, Rev. W. Harness, W. Charles Hood, Lord Houghton, The Lord Chief Justice of England, Charles Kent, Charles Knight, Sir Edwin Landseer, Austen H. Layard, Edward Levy, T. Longman, Frederick Locker, The Hon. Spencer Lyttleton, Daniel Maclise, W. C. Macready, Sir Roderick Murchison, Bart., A. J. Otway, Frederic Ouvry, Prof. Owen, Sir Benjamin Phillips, The Right Hon. Sir Frederick Pollock, B. W. Procter, J. R. Robinson, Sir Charles Russell, George Russell, F. C. Skey, George Smith, Capt. W. Houston Stewart, Marcus Stone, Alfred Tennyson, Sir Henry Thompson, Anthony Trollope, Benjamin Webster, W. H. Wills, Erasmus Wilson, Forbes Winslow, and Edmund Yates.

—We see it announced that Dr. R. SHELTON MACKENZIE, of Philadelphia, is about to bring out a volume of his miscellaneous writings. There is scarcely a man connected with the American or foreign press who knows so many things about so many clever people, or who is so familiar with the inside history of literary matters, at home or abroad, as Dr. MACKENZIE. Any book from his pen will be capital reading.

—A Miss DAMON has been invited to the pastorate of the Universalist Church in Cavendish, Vermont. Wonder if she will find her Pythias there?

—The Rev. Dr. MUELENBURG, rector of St. Luke's Hospital, is seventy-one, and lively and cheery as ever. Although he wrote that beautiful hymn,

"I would not live away," the probability is that he will not refuse to stand it out for some time to come.

—ADELINA PATTI has authoritatively defined her position on the connubial question, by publishing in the Gazette des Etrangers a card stating that she "has no thought of marrying, and believes she violates no propriety in thus giving the most formal contradiction to the falsest conjectures. She is betrothed only to art." When marriage is mentioned she becomes an austere patty.

—MRS. ELIZA BATES, who died a few days since at Glastonbury, Connecticut, was renowned throughout all that region for her kindness and charity to the poor. Over a thousand people, from various parts of the State, attended her funeral.

"Only the memory of the just Smells sweet and blossoms in the dust," was in the thoughts if not on the lips of the multitude who paid the last sad tribute to her memory.

—As the time for the arrival of Mr. DICKENS draws near, all sorts of little things are said about him. One is that he will not lecture anywhere for less than $1500 per night; another that he eats "hashes," and that some of his finest compositions have been formed under its influence. If for "hashes" the writer had written "hash," probably it would have been nearer the truth.

—MENOTTI GARIBALDI, generalissimo of the forces operating against Rome, is only twenty-eight years of age—just about the age of UPSON, CUSTER, BARLOW, AMES, and scores of other young West Pointers, who have won their double stars on the battle-field, and commanded divisions and corps ten times larger than the young Italian is ever likely to lead.

—THURLOW WEED and CHARLES M'DEVITT met at a type-setters' festival last week, after a separation of fifty years. There was much old codger present—cheery old gentlemen varying from five-and-sixty to five-and-seventy. T. W. was once a pressman upon the first tracts published by the American Tract Society.

—MR. SAMUEL BOWLES, of the Springfield Republican, who went bowling "Across the Continent," has made forty thousand dollars, so said, from his copyright describing the manœuvre.

—We feel to admire HENRY WARD BEECHER just for saying that "when men go to church and get nothing but cut straw, and straw raised five hundred years ago, and are dissatisfied at that, and will not come again, he honors them. As long as human nature remains true to what it is, he does not believe the herds will refuse to come to the rack when there is juicy fodder there; and if they do not come it is because there is nothing to eat."

—As the Bazar is especially a paper for the ladies, it would be impolite to hide away a paragraph said to have been spoken by Mr. WILLIAM R. ALGER. Alluding to the two sexes, he says: "It is evidently God's law that they should be equal, and not one to be subservient to the other, but both together to serve their common Maker. Logically speaking, woman has a right to help frame the laws which govern her, and the doctrine of universal suffrage would give her that right. Either all should vote, or only those who are qualified; and if this be admitted, then thousands of men would be excluded from the ballot-box, while thousands of women would be admitted."

—MRS. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE has a love of a place in Florida—four hundred acres, half a mile of river front, good house, grove of one hundred orange-trees, with an annual production of sixty thousand oranges, worth $1800; and the whole concern cost only $10,000! An ascetic Puritan once asked a Catholic acquaintance which he would rather do—kiss the Pope's toe or HARRIET BEECHER STOWE? The Roman remained reticent.

—What a very old lady WEALTHY WHIPPLE is! "going on" 105, and lively as a cricket; lives up in Union Village, Saratoga County, and draws a pension of ninety-six dollars, greenbacks, from Mr. McCULLOCH's Department. She has the very sad honor of standing at the top of the list of widows in this country.

—MR. MARSHALL O. ROBERTS is laying hands on all the choice works of art coming hitherward. Miss EMMA STEBBINS has chiseled for him a statue of COLUMBUS, which has just come over from Italy, and will be on view at the approaching exhibition of the National Academy of Design.

—THE COLLECTOR GREENE is a sanguinary lot. Papa GREENE is called Major; one son was second officer of the original Monitor, built by that lively young engineer, THOMAS F. ROWLAND; another lost a leg at Chickamauga; and the third leads his class at West Point.

—J. ROSS BROWNE, one of the cleverest, activist, merriest, pleasantest writers of travels now stalking over the earth, is vibrating between New York and Washington, posting up the Government on the mining regions, and preparing copy for Harper's Magazine.

—THAT MR. OFFENBACH, whose pretty opera, "The Grand Duchess," is now having a great run at Mr. BATEMAN's theatre in Fourteenth Street, is making no end of money. In Berlin, at a single theatre, he has received $4000, copyright for 400 performances of "La Vie Parisienne"—or $10 per night; which is just what JOHN BROUGHAM gets for a performance of some of his pieces; for others he gets $15 and $20.

—PRINCE ALBERT's brother—Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha—the "little Ernest" whom Queen Victoria mentions so frequently in her book—is coming to the United States next spring.

—We insist upon it that LOUISA MUEHLBAUGH has shed more ink than any female since the flood. The woman has twenty-three novels still in press in this country! And the King of Prussia has given her the great gold medal for "Art and Literature"—the first ever given to a German female author.

—LOUIS NAPOLEON has become a newspaper man, just like Mr. RAYMOND or Mr. MARBLE; writes leaders every week for the Paris Monitor; price per column not stated. American letter-writers in Paris say that L. N. has twenty-three mortal diseases. Each correspondent attributes to him some fatal malady, yet the imperial victim still lives.

—THE REV. NEWMAN HALL's church, in London, is a Christian business establishment, worked on a large scale. It has 1400 members, 13 Sunday-schools, 5000 scholars, 450 teachers, 5 day-schools, and 6 mission-aries, who hold open-air services in different localities. Besides these it maintains a system of lectures, sacred and secular, concerts, public readings, and tea-drinkings, and keeps the laboring people of the vicinity so pleasantly occupied, out of work hours, that it makes bad business for the "publicans and sinners" who keep the "corner grocery."

—In brief: GOTTSCHALK's sisters are concertizing in England.—JULIA WARD HOWE is coming to New York to live.—RISTORI was a gipsy; father and mother belonged to a wandering company; first appeared on the stage at two months old in a basket of flowers.—Grand Duchess OLGA is to have $200,000 down on marrying the King of Greece, and the same figure per annum afterward.—PRINCE OF WALES is a bad boy; has a private entrance to his box at the theatre, and a smoking-room attached lined with white satin.—MISS BALDWIN, age 21, professes Greek in the Baker University, Kansas.—WENDELL PHILLIPS says he finds no livelier entertainment any where than to see a third-rate man undertake to define and measure the capacity and intellect of Madame DE STAEL, or MARY SOMERVILLE, or HARRIET MARTINEAU, or FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE, or LYDIA MARIA CHILD.

—LONGFELLOW is a very noticeable man as he walks along the street. He looks the bard in the full affluence of years and the full wealth of genius. His silvered hair is long and wavy. His beard grows white and thick beneath his chin, looking more like a deep lace ruff than any thing else. His voice is melodious as an organ, and his features, handsome as ever, have been touched with new lines by the action of thought and sorrow. His manners are very beautiful to all persons, and he carries about him that indescribable atmosphere that marks the perfectly-cultured gentleman.

—In a general way we are rather inclined to concur with the Rev. Dr. BAXES, who, at the Unitarian Convention recently held at Chicago, said he had "studied the subject with deep thought and anguish, but had never been able to find any reason why sin was let loose upon the world."

Worsted Trimmings, Stitches, etc.

We give illustrations and descriptions of the various stitches, borders, etc., used in the manufacture of the useful knitted and crocheted articles described in the present Number, beginning with Trimmings for Hoods, Capes, etc.

The first figure in these illustrations is executed in the following manner: Take a splinter of wood or strip of pasteboard a quarter of an inch wide, wind it from the right to the left with four strands of split zephyr, and crochet a foundation on both sides with one strand of split zephyr, making alternately one single crochet and one chain in four strands of the wound thread together. Having knitted together the thread on the splints, roll the thick part under, and make a second strip in a similar manner, winding the wool from the left to the right. Both strips lie with their edges against each other, and are crocheted together by means of one single crochet in the two corresponding chain, between which make one chain. This row, which is on the left side of the trimming, must be quite loose. The trimming is finished by two rows of gray double zephyr crocheted on each of the free edges of the strips knit together. For these, crochet in gray double zephyr, one double crochet in every chain of the edge, with three chain between.

CLASP TRIMMING.—Make a foundation of white single zephyr of the requisite length, on which knit two rows in Victoria stitch. Then make the first row as follows: Crochet alternately in each stitch of the preceding row one single crochet and one loop as follows: draw the crochet needle through the loop of the single crochet; make in single crochet in the next stitch of the preceding row, make a loop in the same stitch, put the thread over the needle, and draw it through both loops; × a loop on the aforesaid loops, and again draw the needle through both together; repeat five times from ×. Then draw the needle again through the loop, take the loop of the single crochet in front of the figure on the needle, and afterward the loop of the figure, and knit both together. Finish the row of loops with a row of Victoria stitch (one stitch in every stitch of the preceding row); and make another row of loops in the manner before described. The loops must set one above another. Lastly, crochet a chain with scarlet zephyr on both sides of the trimming.

CROCHET BORDER.—This is crocheted lengthwise, with a foundation of white zephyr in double crochet, continued with shells of black and white zephyr as follows: Make a foundation of the requisite length, and crochet thereon * three double crochet on the next three stitches; es; follow with two rows of shells; put the thread once over the needle, and take up three loops in the next stitches of the foundation, putting the thread over the needle between each one. On the stitches thus formed crochet two rows of shells. Repeat from *, knit three rows of white shells and one of black. In the following rows, which are knit in the same manner, make alternately one row with and one without black shells.

WOOLEN FRINGE FOR TRIMMING HOODS, CAPES, ETC.—The illustrations show this fringe finished and in the process of execution. First prepare a piece of pasteboard as seen in the engraving, and wind it with three strands of drab split worsted, which has first been strung with jet beads, letting one bead come at the bottom of every turn. This done, crochet the threads together with black worsted, in the manner shown, with one single and one chain alternately. Care must be taken to keep the thread on the under side.

VICTORIA STITCH.—This simple and beautiful stitch, is seen crocheted backward and forward, two rows making one complete row. On a foundation of the requisite length crochet the first row, from right to left. In every stitch one stitch which remains as a loop on the needle. Second row from left to right. Loop the thread over the needle and knit two stitches of the last row together, as seen in the illustration.

WAVED CROCHET STITCH.—This differs but little from the Victoria stitch, which forms its foundation.

NET STITCH.—Two illustrations show the method of making this stitch, which is represented of the original size.

SCALE STITCH.—This is crocheted from right to left, wholly on one side; beginning with the thread anew for every row. Begin with a foundation as usual, and crochet the first row as follows: Miss the last stitch of the foundation, and take up a loop from the four following stitches, then draw the needle through the whole five together. Follow with 1 chain which forms the whole figure. For the next figure, crochet * 1 stitch with the thread looped under the chain; 1 with the thread looped behind the five stitches of the figure; then 1 stitch in the next two stitches of the foundation. The needle is drawn through the whole 5 stitches as before, and 1 chain is made. Repeat from *, and cut off the thread at the end of the row. To begin the next row fasten the thread in the superfluous stitch of the preceding row; crochet 3 chain, miss the last of the same, take a loop from the next two stitches, and continue as in the first row.

Lady's Crochet Boot.

MATERIALS for the pair 7 oz. purple, 3 oz. black, and 2 oz. gray chinchilla, 12 fold zephyr, 1 oz. white woolen yarn.

This boot is an admirable protection in the house from cold weather, and can also be worn as an over-shoe in the street. It is crocheted in ribbed stitch, of black and purple 12-fold zephyr. The sole is of black worsted. The lower part of the boot is trimmed with a row of points. Buttons are set up the front, which is also trimmed with two rows of knit as a stitch. Purl 1 row, knit 6 rows, and lastly purl 1 row, all of lilac zephyr. For the edge crochet 1 single in every 3d stitch, with 2 chain between, of white zephyr, then a second similar row of white zephyr, crocheting a single in every chain of the preceding row. Finish with lilac ribbon run through the open-work band and tied in a bow in front.

WORESTED FRINGE FOR HOODS, CAPES, ETC.

Knit Cuff.

MATERIALS: 1 oz. scarlet single zephyr. This simple and pretty cuff is knit round, in patent stitch, as follows: 1st round *, make 1, slip 1, as if about to purl, knit 1, and repeat from *, 2d round * purl loop and stitch of preceding round together, make 1, slip 1, and repeat from *. Continue to repeat both rounds.

For the cuff, cast on 50 stitches on four needles, knit 20 rounds in the manner described, then alternately knit and purl 12 rounds; then 64 rounds in patent stitch, then alternately knit and purl 12 rounds; and, lastly, 20 rounds in patent stitch. The bottom of the cuff is finished with a row of black worsted scallops in chain stitch, formed by crocheting 1 single crochet in every slip stitch and loop on the needle, with 5 chain between.

at the toe, cast on a foundation of 14 chain of black worsted, crochet thereon for the first row, slipping the last stitch, 6 single in the first 6 stitches, 3 single in the next stitch, and 6 single in the last 6 stitches, thus adding 2 stitches in the middle. The next 5 rows are widened in the same manner. Of these 17 rows, knit from the 2d to the 5th with black worsted. With the 9th row begin the points around the bottom. Crochet only the first and last 4 stitches of the 9th and 10th rows with black, and the remainder with purple zephyr: in the 11th to the 16th row add 2 black stitches in each rib, so that the 11th and 12th rows may number each 6, the 13th and 14th each 8, and the 15th and 16th each 10 black stitches, which completes the point. Repeat this proceeding, making in each rib of the next 6 rows 2 black stitches more, in each rib of the following 6 rows 2 black stitches less, and so on. The 18th row completes the front piece. Then knit the first 23 stitches of this row for the right side 16 rows, noting the points at the bottom, for which decrease 1 stitch at the end of the 23d, 27th, and 33d rows each. At the end of the 35th row cast on a new foundation of 24 stitches, and knit 38 rows on the 50 stitches thus obtained. Having knit the left side piece, beginning with the last 23 stitches of the 18th row of the front, in the same manner, sew the quarters together in the back, and proceed to crochet the sole of black worsted, in ribbed stitch, crosswise. The sole is widened and narrowed to fit the top; a paper pattern should first be cut of the requisite size and shape, and followed in knitting the sole. The lining of the shoe is knit of white yarn with coarse wooden knitting-needles precisely like a stocking, to fit the shape of the boot. The upper edge of the boot is trimmed with a border of purple zephyr, made as follows: 1 double crochet in every other stitch of the edge, with 1 chain between;

Infant's Knitted Sock.

MATERIALS for the pair: 1 oz. white and 3/4 oz. lilac single zephyr; narrow lilac ribbon; middle-sized steel knitting-needles.

These socks are knit whole; the under part with lilac and white and the upper part with white worsted. Begin the sock with a foundation of 77 stitches, and knit 15 rows backward and forward in plain knitting stitch. Put the 77 stitches on three needles, so that there may be 32 stitches on each of the side needles, and 13 on the middle one, then knit on 13 stitches the middle needle, 28 rows for the toe, 2 rows with white and 2 with lilac alternately, and knitting 3 rows and purling 4, so that both the white rows may always come on the outside of the sock. From the 1st to the 15th of these 28 rows knit 3 stitches at the end of each row from the side needles; from the 16th to the 26th row 2 stitches each, and in the 27th and 28th rows the last remaining stitches. At the same time decrease 2 in every other row, beginning with the second, in which knit the first and last of the 13 stitches with one of the stitches from the side needles, continuing in the same manner, so that 11 stitches may constantly remain between the narrowings. This done, sew the knitted parts together at the sides and around the bottom, on the wrong side, and knit the border with white worsted as follows: 2 rows in plain knitting stitch, 12 rows, alternately knitting and purling 2 rows, purl 1 row. Then follow 3 bands of open-work bands, each consisting of 5 rows. The first two of these five rows are in plain knitting stitch, in the third row 1 stitch is made and 2 knit together alternately, and the 4th and 5th rows are knit like the 1st and 2d, each loop in the 3d being knit as a stitch. Purl 1 row, knit 6 rows, and lastly purl 1 row, all of lilac zephyr. For the edge crochet 1 single in every 3d stitch, with 2 chain between, of white zephyr, then a second similar row of white zephyr, crocheting a single in every chain of the preceding row. Finish with lilac ribbon run through the open-work band and tied in a bow in front.

Knit Cuff.

MATERIALS: 1 oz. scarlet single zephyr. This simple and pretty cuff is knit round, in patent stitch, as follows: 1st round *, make 1, slip 1, as if about to purl, knit 1, and repeat from *, 2d round * purl loop and stitch of preceding round together, make 1, slip 1, and repeat from *. Continue to repeat both rounds.

For the cuff, cast on 50 stitches on four needles, knit 20 rounds in the manner described, then alternately knit and purl 12 rounds; then 64 rounds in patent stitch, then alternately knit and purl 12 rounds; and, lastly, 20 rounds in patent stitch. The bottom of the cuff is finished with a row of black worsted scallops in chain stitch, formed by crocheting 1 single crochet in every slip stitch and loop on the needle, with 5 chain between.

Crochet Cuff.

MATERIALS: 1 oz. scarlet and 1 oz. gray chinchilla, single zephyr. This cuff is crocheted crosswise in Victoria stitch, and is closed by a row of buttons on the side. The trimming consists of a triangular piece on the top and a straight strip on the bottom, crocheted of chinchilla in loop stitch. Begin the cuff at the top with a foundation of 7 stitches of chinchilla and 50 stitches of scarlet worsted; work on these 13 rounds on the 7 gray stitches in loop stitch, and on the 13 scarlet stitches in Victoria stitch, in the manner shown in the illustrations on this page. Decrease in the middle of every other one of the 13 scarlet rounds—that is, in the second row of the same round make 1 chain in 2 upright stitches. With the 14th round begin the triangular piece in loop stitch, alternating the scarlet and chinchilla. The cuff is finished on the bottom and around the edge of the trimming with a row of single crochet.

Lady's Knitted Sandal Legging, with Knee-Warmer.

MATERIAL for the pair: 8 oz. black yarn; a strip of leather 7 inches long and 2 inches wide.

This legging is knit of black yarn. Begin at the top by casting on 58 stitches, with steel knitting-needles of a suitable size, and knit 36 rounds, alternately knitting and purling 2 stitches, for the following part of the legging, alternately knit and purl 1 round, so that it bottom of the scallop, as well as the 1st and 20th rounds, widen and narrow 2 stitches, so that the 3 rounds may lie in a straight line. As the left side of the cape begins in the middle of a scallop, it is necessary to begin by narrowing. The 40 rounds finished, work 4 rounds, in each of which, for the rounding of the neck, 1 stitch must be narrowed at the end of the 2d row by making 1 chain in 2 loops, the same being dropped in the next row. Work 11 rounds, without widening or narrowing for the neck, on which work the shoulder gore with 21 rounds, as follows: In the 2-9 of these 21 rounds miss the last 2 upright loops of the previous row, and in the 10th and 11th the 3 last of the same; in the 12th round knit the missed stitches of the 11th with the 2d row, as those of the 10th; in the 13-21st rounds cast off 2 of the missed loop-stitches. The second half of the cape is made like the first, beginning at the point in the middle of the back, and taking up the stitches on the edge of the left side, one after another. A row of scarlet loops are crocheted on the front of the cape, and the bottom is finished with a deep fringe of scarlet worsted. A cord and tassels of scarlet worsted is passed round the neck and ties the cape.

may appear as if purling altogether. Work 26 rounds in this manner. In the 27th round begins the gore, which forms the knee-warmer, and which is knitted backward and forward in plain knitting stitch. For this, take off the 10 middle stitches, and knit thereon 50 rows, taking up 1 of the other stitches at the end of every row, so that the gore in the 50 rows numbers 60 stitches. Then again knit and purl alternately 144 rounds, widening the 21st, 24th, 27th, 30th, 33d, 36th, 39th, and 42d rounds one stitch at the beginning and end. Narrow the 32d and 75th rounds by knitting 2 stitches together at the beginning and end of the rounds, and repeat this narrowing eleven times at the end of every five rounds. Knit 4 rounds, purl 2 rounds, and knit 4 rounds, narrowing twice in the last. Knit and purl 2 stitches alternately for 30 rounds; then separate 38 stitches at the back of the knitted part for the heel, and knit backward and forward 24 rows. Cast off the heel; take up the stitches on the edge with a needle, and, with the remaining stitches of the leg, knit the foot, in seams, according to the illustration. Knit 24 rounds, narrowing once in the 18th, 20th, and 22d round; take all the stitches on, alternately knit and purl 4 rows, and cast off the stitches. A strip of leather, as seen in the illustration, completes the sandal legging.

Lady's Crochet Scarf.

MATERIALS: 2½ oz. white single zephyr; ½ oz. lilac filloselle.

This shawl is crocheted with white single zephyr in ribbed stitch, a variety of the Victoria stitch, with a row of chain and single crochet round the edge. The fringe can be made of white zephyr and lilac filloselle, or of white zephyr alone. The original is 20 stitches wide and 160 rounds long.

Crochet Scarf, Embroidered with Silk.

MATERIALS: 3 oz. white single zephyr; ½ oz. pink filloselle.

This scarf is crocheted lengthwise of white worsted, in a sort of Victoria stitch, and is then embroidered with cross-bars of split

Crochet Sontag for Girl from 8 to 10 Years old.

See illustration on double page.

MATERIALS: 4½ oz. gray and white double zephyr; ¾ oz. black and white double zephyr; and 1 oz. white single zephyr.

The body of this Sontag is crocheted in Victoria stitch, of gray zephyr, intersected with rows of black and white chain stitch, which form squares. A shell border of white zephyr and black and white worsted encircles the lower edge. Fig. 30 gives one-half the pattern, the straight line marking the place where the border is to be set on. Begin at the lower edge of the back with a foundation of as many stitches as the pattern requires. The original is commenced with five stitches. Knit 32 rows for the back, adding 1 stitch at the beginning and end of every row in the usual manner, by making a loop between the two first and the last meshes. After finishing the 32 rows, the last of which has 69 stitches, begin the front by crocheting on the first 30 stitches, first on the right side and next on the left. Each front has 51 rows. The narrowing is to be done according to the pattern, first on the outer edge of the front, and on the last four or five rows on both edges, so as to form a point. Having completed the body, the before-said squares of chain stitch are set on it, the lines running crosswise being first sewed on at intervals of three rows of stitches. It is well to mark the squares by threads, in order to insure regularity. For the border of white zephyr, begin the 1st row with a row of single crochet, all round the edge, crocheting 1 single in each stitch, 2d row, 1 single crochet in every other stitch; then make a shell by putting the thread round the needle three times and drawing the needle through it, forming a loop. Repeat from *. Continue round the whole edge, the neck excepted, as follows: 4th row 1 single crochet in each stitch of the previous row. Repeat the 3d and 4th rows twice; thus extending the shells, which span two rows. In the first repetition of the shell rows, every second stitch is crocheted filloselle. The fringe on the ends is of white worsted and pink filloselle, banded with filloselle. Begin with a chain of the desired length of the scarf, and work on this as in the Victoria stitch, only from the 2d round the loops are not to be taken from the upright, but from the flat stitches of the round. When the scarf has attained the requisite width, make a row of single crochet around the edge, and embroider it with filloselle in button-hole stitch, as shown in the illustration. Finish round the edge with a row of chain stitching in pink filloselle, and set on the fringe.

Lady's Crochet Breakfast Cape.

MATERIALS: 10 oz. white, and 9 oz. scarlet double zephyr.

This cape is crocheted in the ordinary Victoria stitch and wave stitch (see illustrations on opposite page), thus forming stripes, as seen in the engraving. Three rounds are of white, and 1 round of scarlet worsted. The left side is made first. Begin at the lower edge of the middle of the back by casting on a foundation of 3 chains, the last of which serves as a loop for the next row, and work 40 rounds thereon in the manner before described. The last loop of the scarlet round must be crocheted with white, and the last loop of every third white round with scarlet. At the beginning of every one of these 40 rounds and at the end of every turn, make 3 new chain, whereof 2 loops are taken up in the following row, so that every round is increased 3 stitches. The other side of the work is also continually widened and narrowed, to form the scallops. For every scallop, which consists of 20 rounds, every row is widened 1 stitch from the 2d to the 10th round, and then narrowed 1 stitch from the 11th to the 19th round. At the with black and white worsted; the stitch, however, is knotted with white, the black thread being carried on the wrong side from one shell to another. Lastly, the whole Sontag is worked round with a row of loops of chinchilla, formed by crocheting 1 single in every second stitch, between which 4 chain stitches and 1 treble crochet are knit in every one of the former. A cord, crocheted in chain stitch of gray double zephyr, is fastened to the bottom of the back and ties in front.

Crochet Sontag for Ladies.

See illustration on double page.

MATERIALS: 7 oz. brown; 1 oz. white, and 2 oz. gray and white 12 fold zephyr; 1 oz. black and white double zephyr.

The body of this Sontag is worked in scale stitch with brown 12 fold zephyr. The border, which widens on the shoulders in the form of epaulettes, is of black and white double zephyr. Fig. 29 gives half the pattern of the body and border together; the latter is indicated by a broken line on the pattern. Begin at the bottom of the back with a foundation of 11 stitches. Purl the 1st row on this in scale stitch, with 2 chain stitches at the end. The widening begins in the 2d row; this must be done in accordance with the pattern, and, as usual, at the beginning and end of each row, adding there one more figure of the design. Fasten the thread to the last foundation stitch before the design begins; make 5 chain and work a figure of the design in the next 4 chain stitches; then crochet the next figure on the figure on the preceding row. At the end of the row, widen by crocheting the last 12 stitches of the figure, around the two chain at the end of the preceding row, and make therein 2 chain for the widening of the next row. Proceed in this manner, closely following the pattern. On reaching the neck, crochet the two fronts in close connection with the back, casting off the stitches as may be required. The body finished, begin the border with a row of single crochet of white wool: 2d row *, 1 single crochet in the second stitch of the preceding row; then a loop is drawn through the second to the next. Crochet 3 chain and knot the loops on the needle together, then crochet 1 single in the following stitch. Repeat from *, 3d row. Lay aside the coarse worsted, and crochet 1 single crochet in 1 single of the preceding row; make a shell by taking up 3 stitches on the needle, forming a loop by turning the thread round between every one, so that there are six in all, which are knotted together by drawing the needle through the whole; follow with 1 chain; then work a shell in the second stitch, and so on. The narrow border around the back is finished with these three rows; the wide border, which begins at the back, has 10 additional rows. The fourth row begins at ●● on the pattern. The succeeding rows are widened to fit the pattern as the work proceeds. 4th row, 1 single crochet in each chain of the preceding row; * 1 chain; 2 double crochet in the next chain. Repeat from * to the corresponding side of the back, 5th-8th rows. Like the 2d; the 5th and 8th, however, are in white, and the 6th and 7th in black and white wool; the chain stitches, moreover, must be continued. 9th and 10th, like the 3d and 4th rows. 11th row (white) 1 crochet in 1 double crochet *, 4 crochet to 2 double crochet, separated by 1 chain, in every chain of the preceding row; 1 chain, extending over 2 or 3 double crochets of the row preceding. Repeat from * 12th and 13th row crocheted in like manner, the first with black and the second with white wool. The figures formed by the double crochet are always worked in a chain of the preceding row between the other double crochet. 14th row begins at * in Fig. 29. The rows being widened several stitches each, a scallop is made, formed of 8 double crochet, 1 chain, and 3 double crochet, of the chinchilla, to the place where the double crochet of the 11th and 13th rows form a straight line. After making four of these scallops, instead of making 1 single crochet, crochet 2 chain on the preceding row; and again 2 chain on the chain of the 12th row in a straight line; follow again with 2 chain, in the corresponding place on the 11th row, then 2 chain, and 1 single crochet round the two double crochet between the chain of the 10th row. Continue in this way till the 13th row, so that the scallops and rows are separated in each place by two long chain loops. The border finished, a cord and tassels is fastened on the bottom of the back, and is used to tie the Sontag.

Knitted Fanchon of Black Fleecy Wool.

See illustration on double page.

MATERIALS: 1½ oz. black fleecy wool; 2 fine wooden needles.

This Fanchon is knitted throughout on the right side, to fit the pattern, Fig. 31, and is widened and narrowed on the outer edge alone. The lace border that forms the edge is made of the same wool, in the following manner: Make a foundation, the length of the edge, then knit the 1st row, 1 stitch, with the thread over the needle, 1 stitch in the same manner, 1 slip stitch, 2 knitted together, and the slip stitch drawn over the last, thus narrowing two; 1 knitted. Repeat from * to end. 2d row, purl, the thread over the needle being always knitted as a stitch. Repeat these two rows nine times, and cast off the stitches. Sew on the lace as seen in the illustration.

Crochet Tippet.

See illustration on double page.

MATERIAL: 2½ oz. white double zephyr; 1 oz. purple double zephyr.

This collar is crocheted of white zephyr, with a purple border, and is fastened in front with two buttons and a loop. Fig. 32 gives half the pattern; to suit which, it is widened and narrowed on the outer edge. Begin the tippet at the bottom of the back with a foundation of the necessary length, and proceed as follows: 1st row, * take up the thread between the first two stitches, make a loop, and fasten in the next stitch but one. Repeat from * to end. 2d row, 1 slip stitch; 1 chain stitch; put the thread over the needle and slip the next two. Repeat from * to end. Slip 1; knit 2 on right side with thread over needle; purl 2. Repeat from * to end. 3d row, knit 3; purl 3; the thread which was turned over the needle always knit as a stitch. 4th row, 3 knit, 3 purl. 5th row, * 3 knit, with thread over needle; 3 purl, in the same manner. Repeat from * to end. 6th to 8th rows. Knit on the right side, and cast off the stitches. The lace when finished forms a little ruffle, and is sewed on the outer edge of the collar, along the smooth line on the pattern. Finish with buttons and loops as described.

MRS. SOLOMON'S SILKS.

"THE lot will bring money" (pronounced monish), observed Mr. Solomon to his partner in life, and business as well, turning over the pile of goods upon the dingy counter of his little shop reflectively.

"I shall see to that," replied Mrs. Solomon, emphasizing the last word with an energetic nod of her disheveled head, calculated to reassure her spouse, who was desponding by nature.

A feeble ray of gaslight served to illuminate the place, shining on the case of tawdry jewelry by the show-window, where imitation diamonds, rubies, and emeralds were heaped together in dazzling profusion, glimmering weirdly over avenues of ready-made clothing swinging aimlessly about, like limp ghosts; tinging ribbons, gilded china, carved fans, parasols faded by time, and antique craved furniture; for it would have been difficult to find a suitable name under which to confine the trade of this establishment, and bringing into relief the profiles of the two people leaning across the counter.

That of Mr. Solomon expressed some doubt and indecision as he thoughtfully rubbed the tip of his hooked nose; that of Mrs. Solomon unswerving resolution from her bead-like black eyes to her firm double-chin.

At the sudden jar of the cracked bell, which announced the advent of visitors, Mr. Solomon started nervously and glanced over his shoulder, but not a muscle of his wife's face moved. Who did he expect might swoop down upon his humble premises, where many a rare gem from the palaces of wealth found its way?

Not the inoffensive youth who now presented himself, certainly, and at whose entrance discordant music upon a tin-pan of a piano in the back room suddenly ceased, when Miss Rebecca emerged from behind an old cloak, which served as a curtain to conceal her private retreat from the public eye, but which could not also prevent the escape of an unctuous, rich odor, compounded of fish, garlic, and rancid butter.

The young lady was attired in gorgeous raiment; long, brassy rings depended each side of her somewhat prononcée features; her jet-black hair was gathered into a high chignon, surmounted by a blue apology for a hat, known as a "skimmer," and the rest of her costume embraced the varying hues of the rainbow with pleasing effect, although they were somewhat tarnished. Nor was her attendant swain, Mr. Moses, less elegant in his way. Perfumes more powerful than those of "Araby the blest" exhaled from his oily locks; a broad chain of the precious metal meandered across his plaid waistcoat, giving him the appearance of being corded together with gold; his coat bore the stamp of Chatham Square; in his right hand, covered with rings, he negligently twirled a yellow kid glove and cane. So the young people went to the Bowery Theatre to enjoy the rant of brigands and gloomy assassins, and the graceful evolutions of gauze and spangled damsels in the giddy dance, while the old ones, with whom the romance had rusted off long before, addressed themselves to the business of life.

The next morning Mrs. Solomon might have been seen on her way down the crowded thoroughfare—Catherine Street—attired in a long cloak and comfortable poke bonnet, carrying a large basket upon her arm.

Embarking upon the ferry-boat, she was speedily landed on the not less dirty opposite shore of Brooklyn. One would imagine she might have felt more at home in the narrow streets of this quarter, which, indeed, was the case; yet ambition led her instead to the Heights. Leaving her at the door of a handsome house, we will peep up the polished staircase into the luxuriously-appointed room, where, shrouded by rich curtains before a cheerful fire, sat the lady of the house in a charming negligée of soft cashmere and satin, reading the last novel.

Mrs. John Willard was a fat, pretty woman, who, with a mental capacity of inferior standard, had done remarkably well for herself in this world's goods, and had waxed great accordingly. Time was when Mrs. Willard, of obscure family, had filled the position of nursery-governess, and, as such, had won the admiration of Mr. Willard, a bluff, good-natured man, by her meekness and amiability to her young charge. Society ignored these trifles so long as the past was hidden by the golden shimmer and glitter of the present. Mrs. Willard became a connoisseur in art and music, enriching her drawing-room walls with the choice productions of famous masters at fabulous prices; she dressed exquisitely, and gave superb entertainments, taking care to keep her illiterate husband in the back-ground at such times.

Still Mrs. Willard had her Mordecai in the gate; she was not recognized by Mrs. Littleton, who held higher rank yet for wealth, and was a lady by birth in addition.

This was the thorn in the silken pillow—to be regarded as a parvenu—never to be recognized in public by her great neighbor! Fortune eventually favored her in this misfortune—the crust of icy reserve thawed in the most delightful and unexpected manner.

Mrs. Willard had the good-fortune to sit directly in front of Mrs. Littleton at the opera, in a new camel-hair shawl, thus enabling the latter lady to examine its marvelous richness of design and fineness of texture. Mrs. Littleton was not proof against this insidious attack, the shawl was worthy of acquaintance; the ladies exchanged calls, dined together, "my deared" each other, and became, in short, bosom friends. What more need Mrs. Willard desire in life, having overcome the last obstacle in the pathway of prosperity?

"A person below wishes to show some silks, ma'am," said the genteel waitress, appearing at the door.

"Silks," repeated her mistress, with a languid yawn, "I believe I will look at them."

She was prompted by a desire to keep her husband's fortune in active circulation, which she generally accomplished to the entire satisfaction of every body, save the gentleman himself, not unmingled with a feminine keenness for bargains.

Mrs. Solomon was duly presented, and proceeded to unpack her wares, her sharp eyes glancing about the room, noting the toilette-bottles, jewel-boxes, and embroidered cushions thrown carelessly about, and perhaps wishing Miss Rebecca might enjoy similar luxury some fine day.

The silks were exquisite, soft pearl-gray, delicate creamy-brown, and magnificent purple, shading into the varying lights of plum and ripened grape.

Mrs. Willard's eyes sparkled with animation, while Mrs. Solomon's tongue ran along nimbly with the smoothest story.

"Her brother was a sailor and had just returned from Calcutta, where these watered-silks were made. All silk in the weaving? Oh yes, certainly—just ravel this outer edge—see! The brother had brought these dress-patterns as a speculation, but as he was taken ill she sold them for him. A great chance—only twenty-five dollars apiece, and part payment taken in old clothes."

Mrs. Willard grew enthusiastic, she could not detect any thing amiss with the silks, and she was certainly a judge, so she proceeded to select various articles of her wardrobe for Mrs. Solomon's critical inspection.

"This cloak was very much worn, it would be robbery to her family if she allowed more than five dollars for it; that shawl was out of style, still it could go for three; the ball-dress was torn," and so on, through all the phases of haggling peculiar to the people who await the restoration of Jerusalem. In the midst of these transactions the door-bell rang sharply, and the silvery voice of Mrs. Littleton sounded below.

"I will go right up stairs," she said, affably.

Her friend turned pale, and shuddered at the possibility of being discovered hobnobbing with an old clo' woman! Stung to desperation at the sudden emergency, Mrs. Willard bundled the Israelite unceremoniously into the bath-room, basket and all; then, turning the key upon her, returned to throw the scattered articles of dress hastily into a convenient wardrobe.

She met Mrs. Littleton with a somewhat flushed and guilty countenance after these exertions; yet she greeted the visitor with a kiss, and was so glad to see her.

Mrs. Littleton was a soft, cat-like woman in public, with sleepy eyes, and an affected simplicity of manner which was pronounced to be charming; but in private it was rumored she could un-sheath the sharpest claws.

She had come to consult Mrs. Willard about inviting a certain young lady to her party of the following evening.

"Her singing is so fine, you know," said Mrs. Littleton, folding her soft, white hands together; "she would be an entertainment to the company. Still she has so little style or presence—"

"Yes; her voice is of good quality," returned Mrs. Willard, guarded as to her praise. "What a pity it is that her head-notes should be veiled, though!"

"We do not expect her to equal you, dear," purred Mrs. Littleton. "Do promise us that delicious aria from Il Barbiere for the occasion." The two ladies chatted and gossiped together, the hostess in an agony of suspense the while, wishing her guest at the bottom of the Red Sea, the highest pinnacle of the Andes, or any other remote locality, and hoping that the incarcerated animal in the bath-room would remain quiet.

In both cases disappointment awaited her.

Mrs. Littleton, although gifted with no extraordinary powers of penetration, saw at a glance something was wrong, and determined, with placid curiosity, to ascertain the cause, while Mrs. Solomon waxed impatient at her imprisonment—for with her time was money—and began to knock on the door in a threatening way.

Mrs. Willard turned several shades more rosy from annoyance and vexation under her companion's calm glance of inquiry; but the French maid, embroidering Madame's chemisette in the sewing-room, came to the rescue.

"What do you want there?" she asked, peeping through the key-hole, apprehensive of a caged burglar.

"Let me out!" demanded the inignant Jewess.

Awed by her tone, and not a little curious as to the result, Mademoiselle Félicie turned the key, and in another moment Mrs. Solomon stood revealed.

"Add ten dollars and I will take the things," she said, resuming the thread of the bargain just where it had been snipped off previously. She probably believed in the "dignity of labor," for she was unabashed at the aristocratic presence of Mrs. Littleton.

"It is really absurd," exclaimed Mrs. Willard, with an embarrassed laugh, "but I have been amusing myself looking at this woman's silks. They are quite pretty—don't you think so? Might answer for linings, or wrappers perhaps."

The other lady recalled the story of how, in the governess days gone by, a dyed black satin had been a cherished article of adornment; still she maintained a discreet silence, and fell to admiring the contents of the wonderful basket, which now revealed some fine pieces of linen also.

Mrs. Littleton expressed her admiration of the India silks by the immediate purchase of one, together with a piece of the linen, and Mrs. Willard breathed a sigh of relief; she would not be considered economical, as she had feared.

A peculiar smile flitted across the hardened features of the old Jewess as she departed the richer for the parcel of Mrs. Willard's wardrobe.

She then paused at the next door just as the lady of the house was returning from early service in the chapel of St. —, for Mrs. Newton was a devout churchwoman.

As a principle the latter relied upon A. T. Stewart or Madame Pinchon for her supplies; she never felt quite comfortable in any raiment which emanated from other sources; she fancied the Miss Longworths, related to a Western bishop by marriage, who occupied the pew behind her in church, were keen to detect and comment upon imitations of any sort. A tempting glimpse, which Mrs. Solomon artfully insisted upon showing, induced Mrs. Newton, against her better judgment, to reflect upon a pearl-gray, and while she hesitated her sister-in-law appeared on the scene.

Miss Newton was an old maid, who lived by her wits, strictly speaking, visiting her rich friends and relatives to enjoy their bounty, yet hating them for their prosperity while flattering their weaknesses. Vanity had never been wholly extinguished in her breast as years passed on, and by altering such finery as was given her she contrived to present a very creditable appearance in fashionable circles, with the aid of a stylish coiffure, during such portions of the season as she was permitted to appear; the rest of the time she vented the accumulated spite and venom of her nature upon a meek sister in the country who was a poor clergyman's wife.

Miss Newton regarded the silks with a wistfully regretful gaze. She had the required sum quitted into her stays for safety at that very moment. Should she indeed invest it in such magnificence? Dearly as the ancient maiden loved dress she loved money better, and in this instance her prudence was rewarded, as we shall presently see.

Again Mrs. Solomon departed in triumph; to have coined money out of the skeptical Mrs. Newton was a still greater achievement than in the former case, because Mrs. Willard delighted in spending money, if only for the pleasure of hearing her husband grumble.

A policeman came sauntering along in the sun, and Mrs. Solomon dodged suddenly down into an area, for reasons best known to herself, and knocked at the door. A cook with an inflamed and determined countenance obeyed the summons, while her mistress, a faded, hopeless-looking woman, hovered at the top of the stairs, giving some order. Poor Mrs. Brown was a widow and kept a boarding-house. Upon her faded features were legibly written all the cares and trials of such a lot—the back-parlor not rented, old Mrs. Scrimp, on the third-floor, insisting upon a new rocking-chair, skirmish with the cook because Mr. Atwood declared he would not remain unless the gravy was better, and an exacting landlord. What need to tell how the Jewess beguiled the irresolute lady into taking two pieces of the linen, and a charming purple silk, in which Mrs. Brown already fancied herself arrayed, to the hopeless distraction of a certain rich bachelor she had been angling after for many a day, giving recklessly in exchange of her son's wardrobe (poor fellow!), who returned at night only to find himself defrauded of a pair of summer boots, an excellent coat, some gray inexpressibles which were the pride of his heart, and contained twenty dollars of his salary in the bank besides. What need to describe how Mrs. Brown took refuge in tears when he upbraided her, and displayed the marvelous bargains in hopes of averting wrath, which the son regarded, however, in a gloomy light.

In the next house dwelt the Mackey family, consisting of thrifty twin sisters and an invalid, who had a fortune, and was to be respected accordingly. The little twin dames labored under certain disadvantages in the matter of dress, their respective husbands were simply gourmands, and on the table was lavished every thing, to the exclusion of personal adornment. Nature, fortunately, had endowed them with a large share of ingenuity. They revealed year in and year out in turning, twisting, dyeing, or scrubbing with vinegar and molasses old rags, and flattered themselves that the result was highly fashionable, although it was not in the least.

Mrs. Solomon was cordially received by the Mackeys, and immediately conducted into the invalid's apartment that she might be entertained as well. As a family they delighted in the by-ways of traffic, prowling into all manner of auction stores for lace and damask, and ornamenting the parlor with smart gilded vases or bottles, exchanged for odd traps of some kind. Even the younger branches showed a relish for tops and dolls purchased in unexpected places at low prices.

It was full an hour before Mrs. Solomon was suffered to depart. Such a chirping clatter of voices surrounded the invalid's bed as various articles were spread out for her inspection, such a flutter of excitement pervaded the whole establishment, that the little girls even ran in from their play, and stood on tip-toe hugging their small elbows, their round eyes expressive of admiration, and their hair braided in long tails after the manner of Chinese mandarins.

The twin sisters ran wildly about producing materials for trade, or whispered mysteriously in corners, with many nods of intelligence, and all the while Mrs. Solomon remained unmoved by the bustle. There was no need of the sailor story here; the Mackeys would only have listened abstractedly while they mentally calculated gores and flounces.

We do not propose following the clo' woman through the whole of her journey, fearing that the reader may weary of a repetition of her successes. Suffice it that she returned to the ferry once more laden with spoils, and was there met and congratulated by Mr. Solomon, as appointed.

In the language of Mr. Swiveler Brooklyn Heights would be an avenue hereafter closed to her. Imagine the disgust and amazement of Mrs. John Willard and Mrs. Littleton when, on the following morning, a police-officer demanded the linens, which were stolen. Both ladies felt a shock to the inmost centre of their propriety and respectability, wishing all manner of evil upon the devoted head of Mrs. Solomon.

They maintained a dignified silence upon the subject toward each other, and so icy did Mrs. Littleton become, when reminded of the affair by a glimpse of the unlucky silk in the hands of Mademoiselle Félicie (to whom it had been donated at once), that Mrs. Willard almost feared she had lost caste in society. In the mean while Mrs. Newton had not dared venture in person with her exquisite pearl-gray to her French dress-maker up town, whose supercilious glance might possibly detect her deceit, so she sent it, with carte blanche as to trimmings, and nervously awaited the result.

The dress-maker speedily wrote a badly-spelled note, signifying in straggling, angular characters that the pattern was short. Accordingly Miss Newton was dispatched to a certain large establishment on Broadway (never mind which of the multitude) to match the dress if possible.

"Have you gray silk—wide?" she inquired of a fascinating clerk, with his hair parted in the middle.

"No such silk comes," replied the clerk, airily. "You probably think so," retorted Miss Newton, sharply. She acknowledged herself to be peculiarly fond of taking Young America down a peg, from a virtuous animosity to youth, she being no longer young.

The clerk shrugged his shoulders with a contemptuous air.

"The article I mean comes from India," pursued Miss Newton, "and is worn by very elegant people."

The clerk had hooked her now, but he played out the line with a free hand previous to lauding her high and dry on the bank of despair.

"It seems to me I have heard of them," said he, with the most seductive sweetness of manner. "They are brought by sailors, and the quality is very rich, if I am not mistaken."

"Yes," assented Miss Newton, eagerly. "Where can I find them?"

"They are carried about by the sisters of sailors," he pursued, maliciously; "and I imagine you will find, Miss, they are Paisley goods, with a silk border, which are watered down in Jersey, and cost about five dollars the dress pattern." Miss Newton was struck dumb, and Young America, with the aid of facts, proved victorious.

Hastening home she broke the tidings, gently, as possible, at the lunch table. Mrs. Newton received the intelligence with a sigh of resignation. She felt herself to be merely receiving justice for her folly in purchasing any thing cheap. Her husband, who appeared just at the wrong time, was disposed to be funny over the affair—at least in his own estimation, but then men never sympathize under such circumstances. "You had better give it to Maria," he said.

"Certainly," assented his wife, regretfully, as she sipped her tea. So Miss Newton inherited the dress, and comforted herself with the reflection that it would last some time, judiciously worn, under gaslight, and then the trimmings would answer for something else; besides, her own money was still in her stays for future emergencies.

The officer pursued his way down the street, scattering desolation and despair in his wake—so many castles, ruffled and embroidered, had already been built on the stolen linen!

Mrs. Brown fled into the Mackey establishment with the tidings, a friend over the way having sent her news of the advance of Justice in brass buttons. The ladies consulted together, overwhelmed with consternation, until the invalid, with more animation than she had shown for years, insisted upon defeating the law by secreting the family purchases about her bed.

Poor Mrs. Brown hastened back to defend her own dominions, and feebly attempted some similar expedient, but signally failed, thus exposing herself to humiliation before her household, who plucked her remorselessly, as the last morcean of gossip, and to the derision of her injured son as well. How the Mackeys quieted their conscience in setting the rising generation so dangerous an example (in fibbing) is inexplicable, still they did most stoutly defend themselves, and the invalid reposed in triumph upon her concealed treasures. Mrs. Solomon will long be remembered; and, as she sowed the wind, so future clo'-women will reap a whirlwind of coldness and neglect.

MISS CARELESS.

A Fairy Story by Jean Macé.

[Jean Macé's book of "Home Fairy Tales" was declared by Edouard Laboulaye—himself the author of many exquisite fairy stories for children—to be one of the most successful books of the kind ever published in France. It has been translated by Miss Mary L. Booth, the translator of Laboulaye, and is now in the press of HARPER & BROTHERS. We give from the advance sheets one of the shorter stories, for the benefit of the readers of the Bazar. "The fairies here," writes Miss Booth in her preface to the book, "are good fairies—honey fairies—each of whom has a mission to correct some childish fault, but who does her work so attractively and unobtrusively that the children for whom it is designed never think of rebelling against the moral which it is sought to convey. The stories are singularly pleasing and original, and older readers than the audience for whom they are written can not fail to be charmed with their ingenuity."]

MISS CARELESS was a good little girl, who loved her papa and mamma dearly, but, as her name shows, she had one bad fault—she took no care of any thing. When her parents scolded her she hung her head, her large blue eyes filled with tears, and she looked so lovely and so unhappy that they almost reproached themselves for having given her pain, and involuntarily set to work to comfort her; but, their backs turned, all traces of repentance disappeared, and the disorder became worse than ever.

Careless had a brother a year older than herself, whose example and advice had a bad influence over her. It was the custom in that country, when boys had hardly begun to cut their second teeth—at the age when it is so pleasant to hear them prattling about the house in their pretty frocks, with their long curls falling over their shoulders—it was the custom, I say, to send them to great houses, built like barracks, where, after cropping their heads, they were dressed in military coats buttoned to the chin, patent-leather belts, and soldiers' caps perched over the ear, lacking nothing but swords to be equipped for battle. The poor children learned there to play men, and to look down on their sisters. It was a thing agreed upon in this little world that a man who respects himself puts nothing in its place, and the example of the most celebrated personages, renowned for their absent-mindedness, who always put on their trowsers wrong side before, was quoted as a proof of genius. The grown persons of the house had told this to the tall lads, who had told it to the smaller boys, who had told it to the little ones, and Careless's brother, who was one of the latter, had repeated it to her.

Armed with this imposing testimony, Careless thought it very absurd to require of her such minute attention to details so insignificant, and nothing seemed to her so tiresome as to put things in order one day which must be disturbed the next. She did not suspect what need she would have of order in after-years, when she should become a mother herself, and how disgraceful it is to a woman to have nothing in its place in her house. Her mamma, who was well acquainted with her faults, and who loved her too well to suffer this fatal habit to become rooted in her, knew not what to do to break her of it: she had exhausted every thing—warnings, prayers, threats, and even tears, and she finally resolved to punish her.

It was not a difficult task to punish the dear little girl; her heart was so tender that a harsh look made her unhappy, and the sight of her mother in tears threw her in despair. Unhappily, all this sorrow was wasted, since she would not feel the importance of what was required of her. It always seemed to her that her parents were very wrong in making such a fuss about things that were so little worth the trouble, and that they made her unhappy without rhyme or reason. They were obliged, therefore, to have recourse to more direct punishments, in order to make a stronger impression on her mind. If her bed was in disorder, she was forced to wear her night-cap all day. Every time she overturned her inkstand, and this often happened, the end of her nose was inked. Whenever she left a handkerchief, or any thing else, lying about the house, it was fastened on her back; I even believe that a shoe was hung there one day, which had been found far from its fellow, astray on the stairs.

All this mortified her greatly, but did not reform her. She finally persuaded herself, indeed, that her parents no longer loved her, since they persisted in tormenting her in this way, and this unhappy thought hardened her in her disorderly habits. One day, at length, when her brother had a holiday, and, between them, they had put every thing out of place in the parlor and dining-room, Miss Careless was told that she must not leave her room all the next morning. This was a punishment which she felt keenly, for the young gentleman's presence was a rare event since he had joined the regiment, and he now introduced into their plays those cavalier and domineering airs which rendered him still larger in the eyes of his little sister. The dear child was too good.

The next morning the rising sun found her seated on her bed in tears, looking despairingly about her room, her prison till dinner. Her pretty new dress, put on for the first time the night before in compliment to her brother's arrival, was thrown in a corner, half on the floor and half on a chair. One of her boots was under the door, and the other against the door. Two pretty gray silk mitts were on each end of the mantle-piece, and the little black velvet hat, of which she had been so proud, was lying on its side on the top of the water pitcher, with its great white plume falling into the basin.

Careless saw all this confusion with profound indifference, and only thought how tiresome it would be to stay alone for long hours in a room with nothing to do, since it did not occur to her to put things in order.

"How unhappy I am!" she cried. "Every one here hates me, and treats me badly. No-body loves me but my dear Paul, and they won't let me play with him."

The fairy Order was at that moment making her rounds through the house. She had always avoided this neglected room, for she had a profound contempt for giddy and negligent little girls, and the young lady was not one of her favorites; but when she heard her gentle voice moaning so pitifully, she had compassion on her, and, believing that she had repented at last, opened the door.

You may imagine how she frowned at the sight of the disorder. "Are you not ashamed?" she exclaimed, harshly, advancing to the foot of the bed.

"Of what, Madam?" answered the little girl, tremblingly.

"Just take the trouble to look around this room."

"Well, what is the matter with it?"

"What! don't you see the frightful disorder that every thing is in? There is not a single article of your dress in its place."

"Oh! if that is all, there is no great harm done. Paul says that it makes no difference where we put our things at night, provided that we find them in the morning."

"So you believe Master Paul, and think that it makes no difference where you put your things!" cried the fairy, angrily. "Well, you shall see."

With these words she touched the child with her wand, and behold! little Careless flew into pieces in every direction. The head went in search of the hat on the water-pitcher, the body plunged into the dress across the chair, each foot regained its boot, the one under the bed and the other against the door, and the hands made their way into the mitts on each end of the mantle-piece: it was the work of an instant.

"Now," said the fairy, "I am going to send Master Paul to put all this in order. You shall see whether it makes no difference where you put things."

She went down into the court-yard, where Master Paul was taking advantage of his mamma's absence to try to smoke the end of a cigar that his papa had forgotten the night before. "Go up stairs to your sister's room," said she: "she needs you."

Paul was not very sorry to be disturbed in an attempt which he was beginning to find unpleasant; nevertheless, he carefully laid the precious cigar-stump on the window-sill, and went to his sister's room, his head somewhat heavy.

"Well, what is the matter?" said he on entering. He saw no one in the room. "Where are you?" he cried, furious at what he thought a trick insulting to his dignity.

"Here," groaned the head. "Come and help me quickly, my dear Paul; I am very uncomfortable on this water-pitcher."

"No, come here," howled the body. "I can't bear this any longer; the corner of the chair is piercing me through and through."

"Don't leave me under the bed," said the right foot.

"Look against the door," said the left foot.

"Don't forget us on the mantle-piece," shouted the hands, with all their might.

Another little boy might have been frightened, but Paul was already strong-minded. Picking up the feet, hands, and head in the twinkling of an eye, "Don't be alarmed, my dear sister," said he, in an important tone; "I will set you to rights; it will not take me long. The deuce!"

This was one of his words, borrowed from a friend that had taken him under his protection, a young man of eleven, who had long since renounced the refinement of good language. Yet it was not six months, since, seated on his mamma's knee every evening before going to bed, with his hands clasped, he had promised God to be a good boy. But we will return to the work of putting together the scattered limbs of poor Careless.

The feet, head, and hands were soon laid by the side of the body, and, as Master Paul had said, the operation was quickly performed. Raising his sister on her feet, "There you are!" he exclaimed.

But scarcely had he looked at his work than he uttered a loud cry. The head was turned awry; one of the feet, in its boot, hung on the left arm, while one leg staggered, supported by a poor little hand that looked as if it were crushed beneath the weight.

"Oh! Paul, what have you done?" cried the unhappy Careless. And as she attempted to wipe her eyes, the toe of her boot caught in the braids of her hair.

The giddy boy stood thunder-struck before the disaster which he had caused. He attempted at first to repair the evil by pulling his sister's head with all his might to put it in the right place; but it was too firmly fixed. He twisted the little girl's neck in every direction, and only succeeded in making her cry. Then fright and grief triumphed over all his courage, and he burst into a good hearty fit of crying, like a genuine little boy. The servants of the house ran thither at his screams, but they could think of no other remedy than to send for a physician. Some proposed Doctor Pancratus, who had cured so many little children; others the celebrated Doctor Cut-all, who knew so well how to perform an operation. Every body talked at once, and they were trembling for fear of the arrival of the parents, when such a sight might have brought to the tomb, when the fairy Order appeared in the middle of the room in all the lustre of her holiday attire.

"Well," said she to the poor little girl, "do you think now that it makes no difference where you put things, and that children are to be trusted who despise order? Let this be a lesson to you! I forgive you because you are a good girl, whom every body loves; but always remember what it may cost you to pay no attention to what you are doing."

Saying this, the fairy touched her once more with her wand, and head, body, feet, and hands found their right places.

After this terrible adventure the little girl became so careful and attentive that the fairy Order made her her favorite, and married her in after-years to a prince as beautiful as the day, who was anxious above every thing to see his house in perfect order, and who chose her as much for her neatness in all things as for her goodness and beautiful face.

As to Paul, he ceased to believe that it made no difference where he put things, and refused to listen to the boys, on his return to school, when they made speeches that would have displeased his mamma.

MY KING.

When and how shall I meet him? if ever:

What are the words he first will say?

How will the barriers now that sever

Our kindred spirits be broken away?

This self-same daylight on him is shining.

Shining somewhere the while I sing,

The only one who, my will resigning,

Could I acknowledge my king, my king.

Whether his hair be golden or raven,

Whether his eyes be dark or blue,

I know not now; but 'twould be engraven

On that white day as my perfect hue.

Many a face I have liked for a minute—

Been chain'd by a voice with a pleasant ring—

But ever and aye there was something in it,

Something that could not be his, my king.

I will not dream of him handsome and strong,

My ideal love may be weak and slight;

It matters not to what class he belong,

He would be noble enough in my sight;

He may not be brilliantly gifted, my lord!

And he may be learned in every thing;

But if ever he comes he will strike the chord,

Whose melody waits for the hand of its king.

But he must be courteous toward the lowly;

To the weak and sorrowful, loving too;

He must be courageous, refined, and holy,

By nature exalted, and firm, and true:

To such I might fearlessly give the keeping

Of love that would never outgrow its spring:

There would be few tears of a woman's weeping,

If they loved such men as my king, my king.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE BLACK-AND-WHITE KITTEN.

"Should you like to hear about my black-and-white kitten that used to do such funny things?"

"Oh yes! I should!" exclaimed Alice, dropping the blocks with which she had been playing. "I can not make this bridge stand up."

"You have played long enough," said Aunt Mary. "Some other day you can make the bridge stand up. Now let us pick up all the blocks and playthings on the floor and put them in the basket."

Alice and Aunt Mary quickly picked up all the playthings; and then Alice took hold of the handle of the basket and helped her Auntie carry it into the closet.

"There!" said Aunt Mary, "now the room looks all nice and pleasant. Come, sit on the sofa by me, and I will tell you a story."

"Please let me sit in your lap."

"Are you very tired?" asked Aunt Mary, bringing Alice over into her lap.

"Yes," said Alice, drawing a long sigh, "I could not make my bridge stand up."

"Never mind. Sometime I will help you make it stand up."

"But Arthur can make his bridges stand up, all by himself," said Alice.

"Arthur is older than Alice. By-and-by Alice can do it as well as Arthur. Now I will tell you about my black-and-white kitten. I loved my black-and-white kitten very much. She used to play with me a great deal when I was a little girl. In the evening, when it was cold, and we had a bright fire in the fireplace, she would curl herself up into a little round ball on the rug, and shut up her eyes, and go to sleep, so."

Aunt Mary slowly shut up her eyes, as if she were going to sleep. Alice looked up.

"Don't, Auntie, don't go to sleep!"

"Well, I won't, if you don't want me to," said Aunt Mary. "But my kitty used to go to sleep on the rug, purring, purring all the while. When it was time for her to go to bed I would say, 'Come, Kitty, it is bedtime. Kitty! Kitty!' And she would get up off the rug and run after me into the wood-shed. There was a box with some soft shavings in it in the shed, and that was kitty's bed. She thought it was a very nice bed, and liked it very much. She would jump into the box, curl herself up, and go to sleep."

Alice looked up quickly, to see if Aunt Mary was going to sleep again.

"No, I won't go to sleep again, if you don't want me to," said Aunt Mary, replying to Alice's look.

"My black-and-white kitten used to wake up very early in the morning. Just as soon as the doors were opened she would come in, and run across the dining-room—patter, patter, went her soft paws on the floor—and she would come right into Auntie's room. If Auntie had not got up, Kitty would jump up into a chair, and then from the chair on to a table which was close by the bed. Then she would begin to purr very loud—"

"Pur-r, pur-r," interrupted Alice. "Was that the way she purred?"

"Very much like that," said Aunt Mary, laughing to hear Alice purr. "After she had purred a little while, if I did not get up, she would put one of her soft paws on my face to make me open my eyes."

"But here comes Maggie to put Alice to bed. So I must tell you the rest about my black-and-white kitten another time. Good-night."

MY AUNT'S PEARL RING.

"THAT pearl ring, Mabel, you prefer that to all the others?"

I fancied my aunt spoke in a slightly regretful tone, although she had emptied the contents of her little jewel-casket into my lap so carelessly, and bid me select the trinket which should be her gift to me on my approaching wedding-day.

"You know I have a strange fancy for pearls, aunt; but if you have the slightest affection for this ring I would not take it for the world; and indeed," I added, setting the delicate little circlet aside, and turning again to its more glittering fellows, "I dare say I can find one which pleases me equally amidst such a collection."

But with a little hasty movement my aunt threw it back, saying, "No, no, my dear; if you like it, take it. I have no affection for it. Heaven knows I have little cause ever to wish to see it or hear of it again." And then, seeing that I looked up in some amazement at her unusual energy, she added, with almost a scornful smile, "What are jewels to me now?"

We were silent a moment or two, and somehow I felt that, in spite of the quiet manner with which my still beautiful aunt sank back in her chair and resumed her embroidery, I had inadvertently touched on some painful memory, and roused some emotion which it required all her strength of will to repress.

She was no ordinary character, as I well knew. Self-possessed and reserved to a remarkable degree, she had always inspired me with more awe and respect than loving confidence; but as she sat there, with the evening light falling on her delicate face, her lips firmly compressed, her brows slightly frowning, something seemed suddenly to thaw my heart toward her; and in spite of her frigid manner I drew closer to her, and, laying my head on her knee, said, softly, "I fear I have pained you, aunt Magdalen."

Her needle went very fast for a few stitches, and then, as if with some resolution which cost her an effort to make, she laid down her work, and fixing her eyes on mine, gazed at me for some moments thoughtfully and intently.

"I am not superstitious, Mabel, as you know," she began slowly, and laying her light cold hand on my head; "but I think before we quite conclude the matter of the pearl ring I should like to tell you its history. I am not sure that you will think it an auspicious talisman gift when you know all about it, and—and me."

Her voice dropped painfully as she said the last words, and I saw by her face that the memory of some past sorrow was pressing upon her with a force that even her strong will could scarcely meet and master.

"It is not a pleasant story to tell, Mabel, and it is one which, though known to others, my lips have never before told; and—"

"If it is painful to you, dear aunt," I interrupted, quickly, "do not make such an effort for me, then. Never mind about the ring, aunt Magdalen; give me that little cross you used to wear—indeed, the only ornament I have ever seen upon you; I shall treasure it even more than the pearl ring."

"Hush, my dear—hush!" she answered, more kindly, however, than was her wont. "I have made up my mind to tell you this story. Do not interrupt me, but listen quietly; and if you can draw any lesson for your own future guidance in life do; and then, at any rate, some good may result from my pain."

I was very handsome when I was your age, Mabel; I was, moreover, accomplished; and, having lived a good deal with a fashionable cousin in London, I had acquired all the polish of manner, at least, which the habitual contact of good society gives. So when, on one of my rare visits home, I met and became engaged to Lord Rutherford, the possessor of Rutherford Park, no one was very much surprised, except, perhaps, myself.

Your mother was many years my senior, and, though an angel in disposition, she had never been remarkable for beauty; neither was she accomplished; and she, therefore, regarded me as a marvel, and thought no position too high for me to aspire to. My father shared her enthusiasm, and the consequence was, when I occasionally came to spend a month or two at the quiet country rectory, I was treated as a kind of divinity by my own family, and fêted and admired as a superior being by the quiet country neighbors.

In justice to myself, however, I must say that although, naturally enough, I was willing and pleased to be flattered, my head was not altogether turned by it; and I had acquired enough worldly knowledge in my London experiences to know that beauty was not the sole charm by which husbands were to be won—especially noble husbands—or fate ruled. And when, therefore, Lord Rutherford asked me to be his wife I was very much delighted, and certainly a little surprised.

I accepted him without a moment's hesitation; or, rather, I should say, I accepted his coronet and fortune; for of himself, except as a necessary appendage to these desirable blessings, I thought nothing.

He was dark, and stern, and rather cold in manner; and certainly had he been a simple nobody I should never have dreamed of preferring him to a light-hearted captain of dragoons who happened to be staying in the neighborhood, and who for some time had been paying me devoted attention.

Guy Deveril was one of those men to whom the term "fascinating" may be truly applied. He certainly thoroughly understood the art of making himself agreeable; and if he did not win hearts quite so quickly or constantly as he fancied, he won without difficulty those first vivid fancies which a little constancy on his part could soon have made firm, even fierce, love.

I certainly liked Guy better than Lord Rutherford, and it was rather a trial at first to have to give him up as my constant companion in walking and riding, and take dark, stern Eustace instead; but the coronet kept me firm for the first few days, and then gradually my betrothed's truly noble character became more revealed, and if I did not love him enthusiastically, I learned to respect and honor him, as well as to appreciate his refined and intellectual conversation.

The more I was with him, too, the higher grew this esteem; and, in justice to myself, I must say that, though I felt my own nature was scarcely fit to soar with his, I made vigorous efforts to make myself more worthy of him.

I was clever, after a style of my own, and perhaps really more acute in my appreciation of character than Lord Rutherford, and I clearly saw that he did not comprehend me; I saw that he worshipped rather some ideal standard of female perfection which he imagined developed in me than my real true self.

But this pained me. In the first place, I was too sincere to wish to deceive him; but at the same time I was afraid of his suddenly becoming aware of my inferiority, and ceasing this devoted worship.

In spite of my disquietude, however, the courtship proceeded very quietly for some weeks, and things were advancing satisfactorily toward the consummation of all our hopes. The wedding-day was fixed, my trousseau was nearly ready, the sojourn for the honeymoon was decided on, and, as far as human ken could reach, nothing appeared which could possibly interfere with the event which was to place a coronet on my brow and make me the wife of dark, stern Eustace Rutherford.

[My aunt paused a moment, and looking dreamily out over the distant scene of orchard and garden, dimly glimmering in the last faint rays of the red sunset, sighed sadly.]

I seem to see those scenes of the past still. I could almost fancy that figure pacing there beneath the lawn, and pausing every now and then to look at this window, was that of Eustace Rutherford. It was just such an evening, I remember, when, as I sat there on that seat, Mabel, over which hangs that rich laburnum, I was startled by Eustace's hurrying up in a breathless state, and seizing my hand, exclaiming, "Magdalen, I must leave you; my mother has been taken dangerously ill, and I must go to her. I have only an instant to say good-by, but I will write;" and then, before I could say a word, he had kissed me hastily, and was gone.

I turned pale and cold, though I scarcely knew why, and without further delay I went into the house to tell the news to my sister Alice.

"This is indeed sad. Poor Eustace! he loves his mother so devotedly," she exclaimed, simply.

"Yes," I answered; "and it will put off our marriage for Heaven knows how long."

Ah, in my selfishness I was a true prophetess. Alice looked up gravely. "That should scarcely be your first thought, Magdalen."

"I know it ought not; but I'm not a good young person like you, Ally, and—and besides I'm in love, you know," I replied, lightly, as I was wont to do when I felt I ought to be ashamed of myself; and then I sat down to the piano and began dashing off a brilliant waltz, till my sister's light hand laid upon my shoulder suddenly checked me.

"Don't play that now, Magdalen; come to tea and calm yourself a little," she said. "You are unwise to give way to such excitable moods: Lord Rutherford is not the nature to stand it."

"I know that, and I do not indulge in them before him," I replied.

"But if you allow this habit to grow, when you are married you will not find the restraint easy," she exclaimed.

"I shall not trouble myself then; my husband must take me for what I am," was my reply.

I needed not Alice's firm "You are very wrong, Magdalen," to make me aware of the fact; but somehow that evening I felt as if some great pressure had been taken off me, and my own true nature, evil though it might be, would out.

I went out again into the garden, to avoid continuing the conversation, and to calm myself.

The next day I watched anxiously for a letter—for, truth to tell, I was particularly anxious that my wedding should take place at the time named, and if Lady Rutherford died I knew this could not be. But, to my surprise, Eustace did not write for a couple of days, and then only a hurried note to say his mother continued ill, but that he thought there were still faint hopes of her ultimate recovery: he did not even mention his return.

I was disappointed; but at the same time I knew Lord Rutherford's cold nature, and I therefore comforted myself with the thought that he probably had not the gift of warm love-letter writing. I was naturally of a lively disposition, and putting the epistle in my desk I certainly troubled myself but little about it, turning my attention to such amusement as Eustace's absence now gave me leisure to join in.

Instead of confining myself to the rectory-garden I went visiting among the neighboring families, and—alas for my weakness and idleness!—again fell into the company of Guy Deveril. Since my engagement to Lord Rutherford I had done my best to avoid Captain Deveril, feeling that it was better for my own happiness and also more pleasant to Eustace, who, though he would not stoop to outward demonstration of jealousy, was one who I knew would brook no rival. Now that I had nothing to do, however, no one to be with constantly, the temptation was too great for me to resist, and, insensibly, from meeting Guy in company, and talking generally with him, I passed on to strolling with him apart from others, and finally to tête-à-tête rambles and moonlight saunterings, much in the same free way which I had been wont to indulge in before my betrothal.

Guy was more on a level with myself than the stern, intellectual Lord Rutherford, and the effort I made to comprehend and appreciate Eustace was not necessary when I was with the gay Captain.

He loved pleasure, romance, poetry, music—all that could give sunshine to life, but which gives no help to weather its storms—and I was of the same light nature. His company charmed me, his flattery charmed me, and that gallant attention in little matters, which Lord Rutherford would never have thought of paying, charmed me. But though I indulged my vanity and love of gayety, my conscience was still on the alert, and as yet I was faithful in my thoughts to Eustace, and if he had but returned then, as I hoped and expected, all might yet have been well! Ah, how different indeed might my fate have been!

Days, weeks passed—a couple of months went by, and Lord Rutherford only wrote that his mother lingered still, but in such a state that from day to day they expected her to breathe her last. Our union he never mentioned; only once or twice did he speak of his return; and though his letters came regularly enough, and always breathed affection, I began to receive them as a matter of course, and to grow slowly less interested in their contents.

I was a little displeased with Eustace at thus deserting me for his dying mother, and the attentions of Guy Deveril were therefore all the more welcome; and, I know not whether by design or not, just at that time Guy pressed them more assiduously than ever, and whenever he could be he was always beside me.

Alice shook her head, and my father looked grave; but I used to laugh and say I was dull without Eustace, and should die if I had no one to help me while away the time, or else I put on an offended air, and with flashing eyes asked them if they distrusted me. My foolish pride made me obstinate—I would not be reprimanded and ruled by simple Alice, who spent her life in cutting out clothes for the poor, and visiting the sick—and in very bravado I increased rather than diminished my intimacy with the gay Captain.

Meanwhile my imprudence was attaining its culminating point. In a neighboring town there was a grand fancy fair about to be held in aid of some charity, and a cousin of Guy Deveril, who was one of the lady patronesses, asked me to join her in keeping a stall. The invitation was sent to me through Guy, and he was very urgent that I should accept it, as the office of driving me to and from Little Denton would fall to him, and indeed we should be able to pass the day together in a scene of excitement and gayety such as we both loved.

My conscience was not quite easy, but I agreed, and set about preparing a dress which should do justice to the occasion and my own beauty; and after not a few hours' hard labor I laid a costume out before Alice's wondering eyes which even she declared would make me the belle of the fête.

You will think me very foolish, Mabel; but do you know I dreamed of that dress? I longed to wear it as eagerly as any village school-girl longs to put on her new bonnet. You may conceive, then, my disappointment when, on the eve of the fair, I received a letter from Eustace, which at first sight seemed to make the pleasure impossible. It was a long letter, filled with accounts of his mother's health, and his own intense anxiety to get over the next few days, during which a crisis was expected to take place in the disease, but in a short postscript he said, "I have heard that you have been asked to patronize the charity-fair at Little Denton. I will send you £10 as my contribution. Of course under our present circumstances you can not be expected to appear at such a place."

That was all. He seemed to consider it as a matter of course that while his mother lay dying I should never dream of appearing in any public place of amusement. To make such a request as a favor granted to himself would have appeared like an insult to my good feeling and good taste.

But instead of arguing in this way, I exclaimed, "How selfish lovers are! Eustace expects me to feel as much for his mother, whom I never saw in my life, just because she is his mother, as he does! Absurd!" And then crumpling up the letter, I dashed down stairs to stop Guy Deveril, who happened at that moment to be passing the garden-gate and casting longing looks up at my window, to tell him that after all I must give up the anticipated pleasure, and also to ask him to make my excuses to his cousin for deserting her party after so short a notice.

"Give up the fair!" exclaimed Captain Deveril. "Why, Magdalen, what spirit of change has seized on you?"

"It is a great disappointment," I said; "but Lord Rutherford would be seriously offended, I fear, if I went."

Guy never spoke against Eustace to me; but he was always meaningly silent whenever his name was mentioned.

"And what harm can you do his lordship by going? By George, a man should not leave a girl for ten or twelve weeks in such an inexplicable manner, and then expect her to live like a nun. Rutherford is unreasonable."

I was silent, for I did not choose to join Guy in abusing my betrothed.

"I suppose he thinks it would look odd," I said, after a pause; "and perhaps it would; but I am very sorry. Will you tell Mrs. Deveril, and say also that Lord Rutherford intends contributing ten pounds to the charity?"

"Let him keep his money!" exclaimed Guy, savagely. "Ten pounds won't make up for your absence; and, indeed, Magdalen, I must say I think you are a little ridiculous."

"Ridiculous, Captain Deveril! Why, what can I do? I would do any thing to go—at least," I added, as Guy turned suddenly and looked at me with a strange expression—an expression which frightened me a little—"any thing that was not absolutely wrong."

"Well, then, burn Lord Rutherford's letter, and go," was his reply in low tones. "Perhaps it would not be quite the correct thing, all things considered, for you to attend the stall, and make yourself conspicuous; but there would be no manner of harm in your driving quietly over, and walking through the place with the other steady people who come to spend their money. Even Lord Rutherford only meant your joining the stall-keepers. Besides, Magdalen, the Little Dentonians are a distinct set from this neighborhood. Few persons would recognize you."

He was leaning over the gate, and somehow his hand touched mine as he said this; but I did not remove mine.

"It will be horribly dull without you, Magdalen; and go I must, for I have promised Julia," he went on. "Do come. There really won't be any harm."

Still I hesitated. I was sorely tempted. I thought of the elegant dress, the pleasures of a day leaning on Guy's arm in a tolerable crowd of company; and then I contrasted the dreariness of twelve whole long hours wandering about the dull garden or village, and Guy at Little Denton. Surely Eustace did expect too much; besides, would he ever know?

"Come," Guy exclaimed suddenly. "You relent. You won't begin slavery till you leave the altar; and I shall be at the gate to-morrow punctually at twelve. Good-night!" Without waiting for me to say yes or no, the captain turned as he spoke, and disappeared behind the rose-hedge.

When I went into the house ten minutes after I never said a word to Alice about Lord Rutherford's letter; and when she said to me, "I suppose, Maggy, you are quite ready for to-morrow," I answered simply, "Yes, quite."

Well, Mabel, I went to that fête, and I confess I enjoyed it. My disposition was one which thoroughly loved excitement, and while flattery and compliments sounded in my ears conscience had no chance of being heard. I was the handsomest girl there, and Guy, proud of being my chosen cavalier, was as devoted as I could possibly desire. Indeed that day he ventured on more downright love-making than he had ever before attempted, and he gave me to understand (at least so I thought) that even then, if I would desert Eustace Rutherford, he would only too readily claim me as a wife. I came home in a whirl of excitement, and it was only when I laid my head on my pillow, weary and exhausted, that my restless thoughts turned to consider what might be the consequences of my conduct.

I grew strangely anxious now that I had dared fate; and I trusted most intensely that Lord Rutherford would remain away from the park long enough for the excitement of the fair to subside entirely. So anxious was I that I condescended to say to Alice that I thought perhaps I had outstepped the bounds of propriety in going, and that I hoped she would not mention it in Eustace's presence.

It happened that on the previous day I had lost a small locket, of no great value; but being particularly fond of it (and indeed of all jewelry), I had shown some vexation at the loss, and sought anxiously about; and the next day I was not surprised therefore to see Guy appear at a later hour than usual, as he had promised to go to Denton and make inquiries.

I was seated in my accustomed place under the drooping willow working when Guy approached, and throwing a small packet into my lap, dropped into the seat beside me. "My locket!" I exclaimed. "A thousand thanks! I scarcely expected you would succeed."

"Nor have I," replied Guy. "I thought that, however, might replace it. I went to Smith's, but they had nothing like the locket; and I knew your fancy for pearls."

Meanwhile, in some surprise, I had unfastened the packet, and discovered a magnificent pearl ring instead of my humble little gold medallion.

"Oh but, Guy, I ought not to accept it!" I exclaimed. "You forget I am engaged to Lord Rutherford."

"Stuff! Are you never going to take a friendly gift from any one when you are his wife? Nonsense, Magdalen! I was the means of your losing your pet locket, and I do my best to replace it. Do not be so unkind as to reject my offering."

A little while ago I should have refused it firmly; but the wrong path descends very easily, though swiftly, and I was already some way in my descent. "Eustace must never know about it, then," I thought; but I slipped on the beautiful trinket, and laughed as Guy declared I ought only to wear pearls, for they were the only ornament delicate enough for my fragile white fingers. Still I was not quite easy; and when Alice suddenly joined us I carefully hid the hand newly decorated from her sight.

I do not think Guy was pleased at this interruption; but for once Alice was not to be frightened away by even Guy's displeasure, and producing her work, she sat down and remained with us till the Captain reluctantly said he must prepare for his walk home; and even while we sauntered down to the gate, and stood for an instant or two chatting, she remained within view on the lawn, as if resolutely determined to watch him out and me in.

But I was not inclined for a lecture; and so, leaning my arms on the gate, I resolved to try Alice's patience a little.

Presently a step coming in the direction Guy had gone made me look up. Of course it must be Captain Deveril returning for something. I saw a man's shadow approaching, and then I started back. It was Lord Rutherford who stood before me.

I turned icily cold as he caught me in his arms. "How you startle me! I did not expect you in the least," I exclaimed; and making an effort to hide my embarrassment under a show, at least, of delight—"When did you come? How is Lady Rutherford? Why did you not write?" "Not a dozen questions, please, dearest, in one breath," he answered, with a pleased laugh, however. "Let me look at you, and see that it is truly yourself."

He was in high, even excited spirits for him; and I could not help gazing up at him in astonishment, remembering his late anxious letters.

He rushed into the house to give Alice and my father a hasty greeting, and then rejoined me in the garden, having, he said, something particular to say to me. My guilty conscience would have shrunk had he not uttered the words so joyfully, and seemed so happy; and so I stood there waiting for him, and most earnestly trusting that all would be right.

A favorable turn had taken place in his mother's malady, and now the physicians ordered an immediate removal abroad; and her great desire was that our marriage should take place immediately, and that after a short honeymoon we should join her in Italy. Lord Rutherford urged me most earnestly to accede to her wish and his, and of course I was willing enough.

Eustace talked unusually fast; there was much to arrange and little time to do it in, as the wedding would have to take place early in the ensuing week. His own business at the park, too, required his presence; and so, after an hour's earnest conversation, he prepared to leave me. I could scarcely believe, as I walked down to the gate the second time that evening, that in such a short space so much had happened. Guy was almost forgotten—the fair quite. All I remembered was that next Tuesday the ambition of my life would be gratified, and I should belong to the British peerage.

We stood at the gate, and for once Eustace lingered and we talked. I had a nervous habit of twisting my fingers when excited; and was it my evil fortune or an avenging Nemesis made me fidget with them then? My thoughts were so entirely engrossed that I quite started when Lord Rutherford suddenly exclaimed, "Mind, Magdalen; you have dropped a ring." He stooped, and, to my horror, took up the pearl circlet. "Ah, that reminds me I have forgotten the case of pearls my mother sent you. What a delicate little affair! I didn't give you this, did I?"

"No," I replied, faintly; and then, as he still held it admiringly, I added, daringly, "Papa gave it me years ago."

Perfectly satisfied, he slipped it on my finger, saying, "I wish I had remembered my mother's gift. Well, never mind; all will soon be yours. Good-night, dearest."

I had never told Eustace a flat untruth before, though I had not hesitated to deceive him; and I felt any thing but comfortable as I retired to bed that night. I was very much excited; nevertheless I could not help being haunted by an uncomfortable dread of to-morrow, and directly I got to my room I carefully locked up that fatal ring.

I was not surprised that the whole of the next day passed without Eustace making his appearance, for I knew he was very busy with servants and tenants; but as the evening drew on I grew a little uneasy.

This uneasiness increased when, just as we were going to sit down to tea, my father suddenly summoned Alice out of the room.

Had any thing occurred? My heart beat so that I could hear it above the ticking of the clock.

A quarter of an hour passed, and then, to my intense relief, the door opened and Alice returned. She was deadly pale, and coming up to me she seized my hands, and almost dropped down on the stool before me.

"Something has happened?" I exclaimed, calmly, for I felt desperate—"something has happened, Alice? Do not keep me in suspense. Is it about Eustace?"

"It is," she answered, faintly. "Oh, Magdalen, what have you done?"

"I have been foolish, I know; but—"

"Worse, worse!" she exclaimed. "You have been mad. You have given room for Guy Deveril's boasting."

I turned pale. "What do you mean, Alice? Tell me out plainly what has occurred."

"I scarcely know the whole of the story myself; but it appears that some chance brought Lord Rutherford and Captain Deveril together late last night in company, where it angered Eustace to hear Guy speak of you with the freedom he did. He boasted, Magdalen, that he had more influence over you than your betrothed, and that it was the coronet alone which made you accept Rutherford. Finally, as words got higher, he declared that you wore his gaze d'amour on the same finger with that of your engaged ring. Lord Rutherford gave him a flat contradiction, declaring it was false; and you may guess the rest."

"A challenge!" I whispered, faintly. And Alice burst into tears.

I can not distinctly remember all that passed that miserable evening. I was like one in some terrible dream. Somehow I found myself out in the night-air, running between the rose-hedges; and I distinctly see the scene, even now, of summer stars gleaming here and there through the foliage of the trees. And then I stood in the great library of Rutherford House.

Lord Rutherford was sitting by the table, with the light falling on his face, writing; but as I entered he looked up. What I said I know not—whether I made a full confession and besought pardon, or whether I gasped out a few accusing sentences, and left Eustace to guess the truth—I never distinctly knew. Some words of his, though, stamped themselves on my heart, and haunted me for years:

"Tell me one thing, Magdalen," he said, sternly—"that ring, was it Captain Deveril's gift?"

"Yes," I answered, faintly.

"Then you told me a falsehood; you, Magdalen, stooped to the degradation of untruth. I have indeed been deceived."

There was a silence—a deadly silence—during which Eustace Rutherford stood looking down on me from his tall height with an expression of stern resolution. I knew I was condemned; my judge was just but merciless.

"I will grant your request," at length he said, in clear, low tones; "I will apologize to Captain Deveril: he spoke truth." And then he turned and walked out of the room, and left me.

I never saw him again—indeed never. I was very ill after that, and it was weeks before I recovered complete consciousness, or could comprehend the few lines of farewell he had left for me before starting for the Continent. He did not reproach me for the past, but he only said that we ought both to feel thankful that before rather than after marriage we had discovered how totally unsuited we were to make each other's happiness.

Guy Deveril left the neighborhood during my illness. You see, Mabel, my punishment was not undeserved; but it was heavy. And now what say you to the pearl ring? Think you that it is an auspicious bridal gift?

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Saturday.—The morning papers contained an item respecting a young man who was recently convicted of murder in one of the Western States—Illinois, I think. He stated on the trial, as a reason for his career of crime, that "he had been ruined by novel reading." The comment was made that "he had probably read bad ones instead of good—that good novels were as essential as salt, while bad ones were worse than strychnine." The old-time theory, that every thing which bears the name of novel is necessarily injurious, and must be carefully kept from young people, is quite exploded among those who are practical students of the science of mind. That fictitious reading should be carefully selected is unquestionable; but imagination is the gift of God, and requires proper development, like any other faculty. And not unfrequently those holding the strictest views experience rare enjoyment, when, by chance, they are beguiled into reading something which meets a want never supplied by books of dry facts. This principle of mind is neatly illustrated by Dr. Holmes in the Guardian Angel. A worthy Deacon had been presented with a copy of Don Quixote; but soon returned it to the giver, enveloped in strong paper, and very securely tied round with a stout string, while in black letters on the paper-wrapping were the words:

"DANGEROUS READING FOR CHRISTIAN YOUTH.
"TOUCH NOT THE UNCLEAN THING."

"I did not see any thing immoral in it," said the Deacon, "as far as I read; but it belongs to what I consider a very dangerous class of publications. I should recommend you, as a young man of principle, to burn the volume. At least I hope you will not leave it about any where unless it is carefully tied up."

"I am sure," remarked the giver, "you are safe from being harmed by any such book. Didn't you have to finish it, Deacon, after you had once begun?"

"Well—I—I—perused a considerable portion of the work," the Deacon answered, in a way that indicated he had not stopped much short of Finitis.

Last summer, when in the country, I happened to attend a Sabbath-school County Convention. An interesting debate arose respecting Sabbath-school books. One worthy man, conscientious to the last degree, insisted that the present style of books was ruinous; and conveyed the impression that he considered Doddridge's "Rise and Progress" and Baxter's "Saint's Rest" the only kind of books admissible in a Sabbath-school library. Reasonable arguments on the other side of the question were offered; but the first speaker clinched all his remarks by the assurance that "Children shouldn't be eating confectionery all the time." A young Superintendent, an earnest and successful worker, arose and tritely remarked: "Eating confectionery all the time is unwholesome; but I think a proper amount of cake and candy is more healthful than to live on hard-tack all the time!"

New inventions are announced every day. One of the latest is a contrivance now in use in Dublin for cutting hair. The sensations produced by this machine as it revolves around the head are said to be very agreeable, and it cuts the hair with great rapidity. It is so constructed as to enable the operator by turning a screw to adjust the cutting blade so as to take off just the quantity of hair desired. Should be fearful the ears might be accidentally taken off, if any misadjustment were made.

Writing about hair reminds me of an item I saw to-day about a woman in France who has most beautiful hair—that is, she has it until she cuts it off and disposes of it. She is poor, and her hair grows twelve inches every year—one inch a month. She has sold it fifteen times since her childhood, and has received for it two thousand francs.

Conversation at dinner turned upon presence of mind. One of the gentlemen related a comical incident of a lady, who, when traveling in the cars, had the misfortune—or rather her waterfall had the misfortune to drop, most unexpectedly, directly into the lap of a gentleman seated behind her. With perfect composure she turned around and gravely said: "Sir, I'll thank you for that thing!" The "thing" was handed to her without comment. Quite different was the conduct of the lady, who, horrified to find that her back hair had fallen in the street, walked on as rapidly as possible, hoping no one would notice her defective cranium. But a young man, more honest than wise, saw the catastrophe, and picking up the chignon, ran after the fair owner and politely presented it. Alas! no thanks, but an indignant blow on the cheek was his sole reward!

Success of Americans abroad in any worthy art is an honor to our country and a pleasure to our people. Miss Kellogg's successful debut in London is a triumph for an American singer such as few have made.

"It costs twenty dollars to take a lady to the opera respectfully in New York." So says one of the papers—must be true, of course. Let me see. Tickets?—the expense is not there. No—'tis the carriage, the bouquets, the bon-bons, and especially the late supper. Shouldn't suppose twenty dollars was enough. But how frightful to think of the multitude of respectable ladies who are taken to the opera dis-respectably!—to coin a word. Really, something ought to be done about it!

Sunday Eve.—Took "Dot" to church this morning, she begged so hard to go. Thought the last time she went I would not take her again, she was so restless. To-day she was quiet enough. Contrived to have her do all the mechanical things possible—take the hymn-book from the rack—try to find the place—trace with her little finger, guided by me, the lines of the hymns and chapters read—the few short words familiar to her keeping up her interest. Who could expect such a little thing to keep still through the service with nothing to occupy her? Listen to the sermon? 'Tis too hard and too long; and "Dot" says "The minister speaks so loud I can't hear him!" The communion-service puzzled her greatly. "What is that table for?" she asked, in the midst of church. Promised to explain at home. Was reminded of it when, on offering her some bread at dinner she declined it, adding: "But why didn't I have some bread at church?"

This reminds me of two little girls who were taken for the first time to St. Stephen's (Catholic) Church. On their return they were interrogated about their first impressions. Annie honestly confessed that she would rather go to the circus; but Minnie, the younger, declared that she liked church a great deal better, for they sung there, and danced, and drank whisky—such was her interpretation of the music, acolytes, and communion.

Mrs. J.'s children always sit like statues at church, though toward close of services they look agonized. She says "they know it will be worse for them if they don't keep still!" Poor things! A rod hanging over them through three long services! The other day heard a story of a little girl who lives somewhere in the country. On Sabbath morning she was made to study her Sunday-school lesson till church-time—then go to meeting—then to Sunday-school—Bible-reading between services—church in afternoon—and learning verses until bedtime. "My dear," said her grandmother, after the child had said her evening prayers, "you have been very good to-day; if you are as good every Sunday, when you die God will take you to Heaven, where it will be Sunday all the time." "But, grandmamma," returned the tired child, "if I am a good girl in heaven don't you think God will let me go down to hell and play a little while Saturday afternoons?"

What a lesson against overtaking children on the Sabbath!

A pleasant little bit is this from Alice Carey's "Snow-berries":

"Do not look for wrong or evil,
You will find them if you do;
As you measure for your neighbor
He will measure back to you.
Look for goodness, look for gladness,
You will meet them all the while;
If you bring a smiling visage
To the glass, you meet a smile."

Tuesday Noon.—The Vienna papers say that a new secret society has been established in that city for suppressing long trains. The members bind themselves as soon as they see such dusty, dangerous, disagreeable appendages moving along the streets, to tread upon them so as to tear them! Then they are to apologize politely as if it were all an accident.

Entomology has come into fashion, judging from the announcement that "hats are trimmed with feathers and gilt ornaments—not in the form of floral sprigs merely, but of yachts, rifles, horses' heads, swallows, butterflies, cockchafers, and even toads." It is also said that centipedes and cockroaches will follow, and ladies will be seen, after the style of the Furies, with snakes upon their brows. Then, instead of dropping hair-pins, as now, young ladies will bestrew a ball-room with black beetles, or be heard begging their partner to look for a lost grasshopper, or to pick up the large spider just shaken from her hair.

A Zurich paper states that Mrs. Soulas has lately obtained from the University of that city the diploma of Doctor of Medicine. Five years ago Mrs. Soulas graduated at the College of St. Petersburg with high honors. From that time she attended the medical and surgical lectures of the Academy until the authorities forbade it. She then went to the University of Zurich, where she has completed her studies.

A genuine story of Mother Goose is the following, and, whether true or not—though it is said to be a fact—it is quite as amusing as the wonderful bramble-bush song of that distinguished poetess: In 1866 a boy about sixteen years old, living in New Hampshire, accidentally received a charge of powder from a small cannon into his eyes, making the left one totally blind. Several months afterward, as he was holding a hen in his arms, with her head near this blind eye, she saw it glisten, pecked the eye, and restored it to its sight and former appearance. This curious phenomenon is thus explained: The blaze from the discharge of powder burnt the crystalline lens, leaving the opaque membrane of this lens hanging directly across the pupil. The peck of the hen dislodged this membrane, so that it dropped below the pupil and let the light into the eye.

A French journal gives some curious statistics respecting letters sent through the post. It says that of 500 letters distributed every day at the poste restante 400 are love-letters; 50 relate to commerce; 30 are inquiries, answers, and advertisements; 15 are lies and calumnies; 2 on politics; 2 relate to charity (bienfaits), and 1 to friendship. Love, it appears, leads the train, and friendship brings up the rear. 400 lovers to one friend! But how are these facts ascertained? What clerk reads the letters?

A pleasant letter came to hand this morning, written among New Hampshire hills, and indicating the interest one lady, at least, feels in the Bazar. But similar expressions of interest come from numerous sections of the country.

"I have received the second Number of the Bazar," she writes, "and already I consider it an indispensable addition to my daily life. It far surpasses any magazine of fashion I have ever seen. Its cuts are unequalled; its descriptions so plain a child could understand them; its patterns most beautiful and varied. It is a bean-ideal of a ladies' paper, and can not fail of success. I wish some philanthropic man or woman would present a copy of it to every village 'Mite Society' in these mountain towns of New Hampshire and Vermont. In these villages there is but little idea of fashion and art, and good material is often ruined by the ignorance of cutter and maker."

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER IX.

THE MALAY PIRATE.

Two days had passed since Brandon's rescue. The light wind which had brought up the Falcon soon died out, and before the island had been left far behind a calm succeeded, and there was nothing left but to drift.

A calm in other seas is stillness, here on the Indian Ocean it is stagnation. The calmness is like Egyptian darkness. It may be felt. The stagnation of the waters seems deep enough to destroy all life there. The air is thick, oppressive, feverish; there is not a breath or a murmur of wind; even the swell of ocean, which is never-ending, here approaches as near as possible to an end. The ocean rolled but slightly, but the light undulations gave a lazy, listless motion to the ship, the spars creaked monotonously, and the great sails flapped idly in the air.

At such a time the calm itself is sufficiently dreary, but now there was something which made all things still more drear. For the calm was attended by a thick fog; not a moist, drizzling fog like those of the North Atlantic, but a sultry, dense, dry fog; a fog which gave greater emphasis to the heat, and, instead of alleviating it, made it more oppressive.

It was so thick that it was not possible while standing at the wheel to see the fore-castle. Aloft, all the heavens were hidden in a canopy of sickly gray; beneath, the sea showed the same color. Its glassy surface exhibited not a ripple. A small space only surrounded the vessel, and beyond all things were lost to view.

The sailors were scattered about the ship in groups. Some had ascended to the tops with a faint hope of finding more air; some were lying flat on their faces on the fore-castle; others had sought those places which were under the sails where the occasional flap of the broad canvas sent down a slight current of air.

The Captain was standing on the quarter-deck, while Brandon was seated on a stool near the wheel. He had been treated by the Captain with unbounded hospitality, and supplied with every thing that he could wish.

"The fact is," said the Captain, who had been conversing with Brandon, "I don't like calms any where, still less calms with fogs, and least of all, calms off these infernal islands."

"Why?"

"Because to the northward is the Strait of Sunda, and the Malay pirates are always cruising about, often as far as this. Did you ever happen to hear of Zangorri?"

"Yes."

"Well, all I can say is, if you hadn't been wrecked, you'd have probably had your throat cut by that devil."

"Can't any body catch him?"

"They don't catch him at any rate. Whether he can or not is another question."

"Have you arms?"

"Yes. I've got enough to give Zangorri a pleasanter reception than he usually gets from a merchant-ship; and my lads are the boys that can use them."

"I wonder what has become of that other ship that passed me on the island," said Brandon, after a pause.

"She can't be very far away from us," replied the Captain, "and we may come up with her before we get to the Cape."

A silence followed. Suddenly the Captain's attention was arrested by something. He raised his hand to his ear and listened very attentively. "Do you hear that?" he asked, quickly.

Brandon arose and walked to where the Captain was. Then both listened. And over the sea there came unmistakable sounds. The regular movement of oars! Oars out on the Indian Ocean! Yet the sound was unmistakable.

"It must be some poor devils that have escaped from shipwreck," said the Captain, half to himself.

"Well, fire a gun."

"No," said the Captain, cautiously, after a pause. "It may be somebody else. Wait a bit."

So they waited a little while. Suddenly there came a cry of human voices—a volley of guns! Shrieks, yells of defiance, shouts of triumph, howls of rage or of pain, all softened by the distance, and all in their unison sounding appalling as they were borne through the gloom of the fog.

Instantly every man in the ship bounded to his feet. They had not heard the first sounds, but these they heard, and in that superstition which is natural to the sailor, each man's first thought was that the noises came from the sky, and so each looked with a stupefied countenance at his neighbor.

But the Captain did not share the common feeling. "I knew it!" he cried. "I expected it, and blow my old eyes out if I don't catch 'em this time!"

"What?" cried Brandon.

But the Captain did not hear. Instantly his whole demeanor was changed. He sprang to the companion-way. He spoke but one word, not in a loud voice, but in tones so stern, so startling, that every man in the ship heard the word:

"Zangorri!"

All knew what it meant. It meant that the most blood-thirsty pirate of these Eastern seas was attacking some ship behind that veil of fog.

And what ship? This was the thought that came to Brandon. Could it be any possibility be the one which passed by him when he strove so earnestly to gain her attention?

"Out with the long-boat! Load the carronade! Man the boat! Hurry up, lads, for God's sake!" And the Captain dashed down into the cabin. In an instant he was back again, buckling on a belt with a couple of pistols in it, and calling to his men. "Don't shout, don't cheer, but hurry, for God's sake!"

And the men rushed about, some collecting arms, others laboring at the boat. The Falcon was well supplied with arms, as the Captain had said. Three guns, any quantity of smaller arms, and a long Tom, formed her armament, while the long-boat had a carronade in her bows. Thanks to the snug and orderly arrangement of the ship, every thing was soon ready. The long-boat was out and aloft. All the seamen except four were on board, and the Captain went down last.

"Now, pull away, lads!" he cried; "no talking," and he took the tiller ropes. As he seated himself he looked toward the bows, and his eyes encountered the calm face of Brandon.

"What! you here?" he cried, with unmistakable delight.

Brandon's reply consisted simply in drawing a revolver from his pocket.

"You're a brick!" said the Captain.

Not another word was spoken. The Captain steered the boat toward the direction from which the sounds came. These grew louder every moment—more menacing, and more terrible.

The sailors put all their strength to the oars, and drove the great boat through the water. To their impatience it seemed as though they would never get there. Yet the place which they desired so much to reach was not far away; the sounds were now very near; and at length, as they drove onward, the tall sides of a ship burst on their sight through the gloom. By its side was a boat of the kind that is used by the Malays. On board the ship a large number of savage figures were rushing about in mad ferocity.

In a moment the boat was seen. A shout rose from the Malays. A score of them clambered swiftly down the ship's side to their boat, and a panic seemed to seize all the rest, who stood looking around irresolutely for some way of escape.

The boatswain was in the bows of the long-boat, and as the Malays crowded into their craft he took aim with the carronade, and fired. The explosion thundered through the air. A terrific shriek followed. The next instant the Malay boat, filled with writhing dusky figures, went down beneath the waters.

The long-boat immediately after touched the side of the ship. Brandon grasped a rope with his left hand, and, holding his revolver in his right, leaped upward. A Malay with uplifted knife struck him. Bang! went the revolver, and the Malay fell dead. The next instant Brandon was on board, followed by all the sailors, who sprang upward and clambered into the vessel before the Malays could rally from the first shock of surprise.

But the panic was arrested by a man who bounded upon deck through the hatchway. Roused by the noise of the gun, he had hurried up, and reached the deck just as the sailors arrived. In fierce, stern words he shouted to his men, and the Malays gathered new courage from his words. There were about fifty of these, and not more than thirty English sailors; but the former had carelessly dropped their arms about, and most of their pieces were unloaded; the latter, therefore, had it all their own way.

The first thing that they did was to pour a volley into the crowd of Malays, as they stood trying to face their new enemy. The next moment the sailors rushed upon them, some with cutlasses, some with pistols, and some with clubbed muskets.

The Malays resisted desperately. Some fought with their creeses, others snatched up muskets, and used them vigorously, others, unarmed, flung themselves upon their assailants, biting and tearing like wild beasts.

In the midst of the scene stood the chief, wielding a clubbed musket. He was a man of short stature, broad chest, and great muscular power. Three or four of the sailors had already been knocked down beneath his blows.

"Down with him!" yelled the Captain. "It's Zangorri!"

A venomous smile passed over the dark face of the Malay. Then he shouted to his men, and in an instant they rushed to the quarter-deck and took up a position there. A few of them obtained some more muskets that lay about.

The Captain shouted to his men, who were pursuing the Malays, to load once more. They did so, poured in a volley, and then rushed to the quarter-deck. Now a fiercer fight took place. The Captain with his pistol shot one man dead; the next instant he was knocked down. The boatswain was grappled by two powerful men. The rest of the sailors were driving all before them.

Meanwhile Brandon had been in the very centre of the fight. With his revolver in his left hand he held a cutlass in his right, and every blow that he gave told. He had sought all through the struggle to reach the spot where Zangorri stood, but had hitherto been unsuccessful. At the retreat which the Malays made he hastily loaded three of the chambers of his revolver which he had emptied into the hearts of three Malays, and sprang upon the quarter-deck first. The man who struck down the Captain fell dead from Brandon's pistol, just as he stooped to plunge his knife into the heart of the prostrate man. Another shot sent over one of the boatswain's assailants, and the other assailant was kicked up into the air and overboard by the boatswain himself.

After this Brandon had no more trouble to get at Zangorri, for the Malay chief with a howl of fury called on his men, and sprang at him. Two quick flashes, two sharp reports, and down went two of them. Zangorri grasped Brandon's hand, and raised his knife; the next instant Brandon had shifted his pistol to his other hand; he fired, Zangorri's arm fell by his side, broken, and the knife rang on the ship's deck.

Brandon bounded at his throat. He wound his arms around him, and with a tremendous jerk hurled Zangorri to the deck, and held him there.

A cry of terror and dismay arose from the Malays as they saw their chief fall. The sailors shouted; there was no further fighting; some of the pirates were killed, others leaped overboard and tried to swim away. The sailors, in their fury, shot at these wretches as they swam. The cruelty of Zangorri had stimulated such a thirst for vengeance that none thought of giving quarter. Out of all the Malays the only one alive was Zangorri himself, who now lay gasping, with a mighty hand on his throat.

At last, as his struggles grew feebler, Brandon relaxed his grasp. Some of the sailors came up with uplifted knives to put an end to Zangorri. "Back!" cried Brandon, fiercely. "Don't touch him. He's mine!"

"He must die."

"That's for me to say," cried Brandon in a stern voice that forbade reply. In fact, the sailors seemed to feel that he had the best claim here, since he had not only captured Zangorri with his own hands, but had borne the chief share in the fight.

"Englishman," said a voice, "I thank you."

Brandon started.

with the Captain, who still lay senseless. No one observed him. He turned to Zangorri.

"This shall be mine," said he, and he threw the cord around his own neck, and put the creese under his waistcoat. But the sharp eye of the Malay had been watching him, and as he raised his arm carelessly to put the weapon where he desired, he thoughtlessly loosed his hold. That instant Zangorri took advantage of it. By a tremendous effort he disengaged himself and bounded to his feet. The next instant he was at the taffrail. One hasty glance all around showed him all that he wished to see. Another moment and he was beneath the water.

Brandon had been taken unawares, and the Malay was in the water before he could think. But he drew his revolver, in which there yet remained two shots, and, stepping to the taffrail, watched for Zangorri to reappear.

During the fight a change had come over the scene. The fog had begun to be dissipated and a wider horizon appeared. As Brandon looked he saw two vessels upon the smooth surface of the sea. One was the Falcon. The other was a large Malay proa. On the decks of this last was a crowd of men, perhaps about fifty in number, who stood looking toward the ship where the fight had been. The sweeps were out, and they were preparing to move away. But the escape of Zangorri had aroused them, and they were evidently waiting to see the result. That result lay altogether at the disposal of the man with the revolver, who stood at the stern from which Zangorri had leaped.

And now Zangorri's head appeared above the waves, while he took a long breath ere he plunged again. The revolver covered him. In a moment a bullet could have plunged into his brain.

But Brandon did not fire. He could not. It was too cold-blooded. True, Zangorri was with hands and feet and making faint efforts to rise. He had been wounded in many places, and was now quite unconscious.

Brandon dragged away all the bodies, laid him in as easy a posture as possible, and then rushed up to the deck for some water. Returning he dashed it over the Hindu, and bound up one or two wounds which seemed most dangerous.

His care soon brought the Hindu to consciousness.

The man opened his eyes, looked upon Brandon first with astonishment, then with speechless gratitude, and clapping his hand moaned faintly, in broken English,

"Bless de Lor! Sahib!"

Brandon hurried up on deck and calling some of the sailors had the Hindu conveyed there. All crowded around him to ask him questions, and gradually found out about the attack of the pirates. The ship had been becalmed the day before, and the Malay proa was in sight, evidently with evil intentions. They had kept a good watch, and when the fog came had some hope of escape. But the Malay boats had sought them through the fog, and had found them. They had resisted well, but were overpowered by numbers. The Hindu had been cook of the ship, and had fought till the last by the side of his captain.

Without waiting to hear the Hindu's story Brandon went back to the cabin. The door that opened into the inner cabin was shut. He tried it. It was locked. He looked into the keyhole. It was locked from the inside.

"Is any one there?" he asked.

A cry of surprise was the sole answer.

"You are safe. We are friends. Open!" cried Brandon.

Then came the sound of light footsteps, the key was turned, the door slid back, and there appeared before the astonished eyes of Brandon a young girl, who, the moment that she saw him, flung herself on her knees in a transport of gratitude and raised her face to Heaven, while her lips uttered inaudible words of thanksgiving.

She was quite a young girl, with a delicate, slender frame, and features of extreme loveliness. Her complexion was singularly colorless. Her eyes were large, dark, and luminous. Her hair fell in rich masses over her shoulders. In one hand she held a knife, to which she clung with a death-like tenacity.

"Poor child!" murmured Brandon, in accents of tenderest commiseration. "It is but little that you could do with that knife."

She looked up at him as she knelt, then looked at the keen glittering steel, and, with a solemnity of accent which showed how deeply she was in earnest, murmured, half to herself,

"It could at least have saved me!"

Brandon smiled upon her with such a smile as a father might give at seeing the spirit or prowess of some idolized son.

"There is no need," he said, with a voice of deep feeling, "there is no need of that now. You are saved. You are avenged. Come with me." The girl rose. "But wait," said Brandon, and he looked at her earnestly and most pityingly. "There are things here which you should not see. Will you shut your eyes and let me lead you?"

"I can bear it," said the girl. "I will not shut my eyes."

"You must," said Brandon, firmly, but still pityingly, for he thought of that venerable woman who lay in blood outside the door. The girl looked at him and seemed at first as though about to refuse. There was something in his face so full of compassion, and entreaty, and calm control, that she consented. She closed her eyes and held out her hand. Brandon took it and led her through the place of horror and up to the deck.

Her appearance was greeted with a cry of joy from all the sailors. The girl looked around. She saw the Malays lying dead upon the deck. She saw the ship that had rescued, and the proa that had terrified her. But she saw no familiar face.

She turned to Brandon with a face of horror, and with white lips asked:

"Where are they all?"

"Gone," said Brandon.

"What! All?" gasped the girl.

"All—except yourself and the cook."

She shuddered from head to foot; at last, coming closer to Brandon, she whispered: "And my nurse—?"

Brandon said nothing, but, with a face full of meaning, pointed upward. The girl understood him. She reeled, and would have fallen had not Brandon supported her. Then she covered her face with her hands, and, staggering away to a seat, sank down and wept bitterly.

All were silent. Even the rough sailors respected that grief. Rough! Who does not know that sailors are often the most tender-hearted of men, and always the most impulsive, and most quick to sympathy?

So now they said nothing, but stood in groups sorrowing in their sorrow. The Captain, meanwhile, had revived, and was already on his feet, looking around upon the scene. The Hindu also had gained strength with every throb of his heart and every breath of the air.

But suddenly a cry arose from one of the men who stood nearest the hatchway.

"The ship is sinking!"

Every one started. Yes, the ship was sinking. No one had noticed it: but the water was already within a few feet of the top. No doubt Zangorri had been scuttling her when he rushed out of the hold at the noise of the attack.

There was nothing left but to hasten away. There was time to save nothing. The bodies of the dead had to be left with the ship for their tomb. In a short time they had all hurried into the boat and were pulling away. But not too

"SHE FLUNG HERSELF ON HER KNEES IN A TRANSPORT OF GRATITUDE."

It was Zangorri who had spoken; and in very fair English too.

"Do you speak English?" was all that he could say in his surprise.

"I ought to. I've seen enough of them," growled the other.

"You scoundrel!" cried Brandon, "you have nothing to thank me for. You must die a worse death."

"Ah," sneered Zangorri. "Well. It's about time. But my death will not pay for the hundreds of English lives that I have taken. I thank you, though, for you will give me time yet to tell the Englishmen how I hate them."

And the expression of hate that gleamed from the eyes of the Malay was appalling.

"Why do you hate them?" asked Brandon, whose curiosity was excited.

"My brother's blood was shed by them, and a Malay never forgives. Yet I have never found the man I sought. If I had found him I would not have killed any more."

"The man—what man?"

"The one whom I have sought for fifteen years through all these seas," said the other, hoarsely.

"What is his name?"

"I will not speak it. I had it carved on my creese which hangs around my neck."

Brandon thrust his hand into the bosom of the Malay where he saw a cord which passed around his neck. He drew forth a creese, and holding it up saw this name cut upon the handle: "JOHN POTTS."

The change that came over the severe, impassive face of Brandon was so extraordinary that even Zangorri in his pain and fury saw it. He uttered an exclamation. The brow of Brandon grew as black as night, his nostrils quivered, his eyes seemed to blaze with a terrific lustre, and a slight foam spread itself over his quivering lips. But he commanded himself by a violent effort.

He looked all around. The sailors were busy stained with countless crimes; but all his crimes at that moment were forgotten: he did not appear as Zangorri the merciless pirate, but simply as a wounded wretch, trying to escape from death. That death Brandon could not deal him.

The sailors were still intent upon the Captain, whose state was critical, and Brandon alone watched the Malay. Soon he saw those on board the proa send down a boat and row quickly toward him. They reached him, dragged him on board, and then rowed back.

Brandon turned away. As yet no one had been in the cabin. He hurried thither to see if perchance any one was there who might be saved.

He entered the cabin. The first look which he gave disclosed a sight which was enough to chill the blood of the stoutest heart that ever beat.

All around the cabin lay human bodies distorted by the agonies of death, twisted and twined in different attitudes, and still lying in the position in which death had found them.

One, whose appearance showed him to be the captain, lay grasping the hair of a Malay, with his sword through his enemy's heart, while a knife still remained buried in his own. Another lay with his head cut open; another with his face torn by the explosion of a gun. There were four whites here and about ten Malays, all dead. But the fourth white was a woman, who lay dead in front of a door that led to an inner cabin, and which was now closed. The woman appeared to be about fifty years of age, her venerable gray hair was stained with blood, and her hand clutched the arm of a Malay who lay dead by her side.

While Brandon stood looking at this sight he became aware of a movement in a corner of the cabin where there were five or six bodies heaped together. He hurried over to the place, and, pulling away the bodies of several Malays, found at length a Hindu of large stature, in whom life was by no means extinct, for he was pushing soon. For scarcely had they pulled away half a dozen boat-lengths from the ship than the water, which had been rising higher and higher, more rapidly every moment, rushed madly with a final onset to secure its prey: and with a groan like that of some living thing the ship went down.

A yell came from over the water. It rose from the Malay proa, which was moving away as fast as the long sweeps could carry her. But the dead were not revenged only. They were remembered. Not long after reaching the Falcon the sailors were summoned to the side which looked toward the spot where the ship had sunk, and the solemn voice of Brandon read the burial-service of the Church.

And as he read that service he understood the fate which he had escaped when the ship passed Coffin Island without noticing his signal.

CHAPTER X.

BEATRICE.

It was natural that a young girl who had gone through so fearful an ordeal should for some time feel its effects. Her situation excited the warmest sympathy of all on board the ship; and her appearance was such as might inspire a chivalrous respect in the hearts of those rough but kindly and sensitive sailors who had taken part in her rescue.

Her whole appearance marked her as one of no common order. There was about her an air of aristocratic grace which inspired involuntary respect; an elegance of manner and complete self-possession which marked perfect breeding. Added to this, her face had something which is greater even than beauty—or at least something without which beauty itself is feeble—namely, character and expression. Her soul spoke out in every lineament of her noble features, and threw around her the charm of spiritual exaltation.

To such a charm as this Brandon did not seem indifferent. His usual self-abstraction seemed to desert him for a time. The part that he had taken in her rescue of itself formed a tie between them; but there was another bond in the fact that he alone of all on board could associate with her on equal terms, as a high-bred gentleman with a high-bred lady.

The Hindu had at once found occupation, for Brandon, who had seen the stuff that was in him, offered to take him for his servant. He said that his name was Assgeelo, but he was commonly called Cato, and preferred that name to any other. He regarded Brandon as his saviour, with all the superstition which Hindus can feel, and looked up to this saviour as a superior being. The offer of employment was eagerly accepted, and Cato at once entered upon the few duties which his situation could require on ship-board.

Meanwhile the young lady remained unknown. At first she spent the greater part of her time in her room, and only came out at meal-times, when the sadness of her face prevented any thing except the most distant and respectful courtesy. No one knew her name, and no one asked it. Cato was ignorant of it. She and the old nurse had only been known to him as the young missis and the old missis.

Brandon, roused from his indifference, did all in his power to mitigate the gloom of this fair young creature, whom fate had thrown in his way. He found that his attentions were not unacceptable. At length she came out more frequently, and they became companions on the quarter-deck.

Brandon was touched by the exhibition which she had made of her gratitude to himself. She persisted in regarding him alone as the one to whom she owed her life, and apologized to him for her selfishness in giving way so greatly to her grief. After a time she ventured to tell him the story of the voyage which she had been making. She was on her way from China to England. Her father lived in England, but she had passed her life in Hong-Kong, having been brought up there by the old nurse, who had accompanied her on her voyage until that fearful calamity.

She told him at different times that her father was a merchant who had business all over the world, and that he had of late taken up his station in his own home and sent for her.

Of her father she did not say much, and did not seem to know much. She had never seen him. She had been in Hong-Kong ever since she could remember. She believed, however, that she was born in England, but did not know for certain. Her nurse had not known her till she had gone to China.

It was certainly a curious life, but quite natural, when a busy merchant devotes all his thoughts to business, and but little attention to his family. She had no mother, but thought she must have died in India. Yet she was not sure. Of all this, however, she expected to hear when she reached home and met her father.

By the time that she had been a month on board Brandon knew much of the events of her simple life. He saw the strange mixture of fear and longing with which she looked forward to a meeting with her father. He learned that she had a brother, also, whom she had never seen, for her father kept his son with himself. He could not help looking with inexpressible pity on one so lovely, yet so neglected.

Otherwise, as far as mere money was concerned, she had never suffered. Her accomplishments were numerous. She was passionately fond of music, and was familiar with all the classic compositions. Her voice was finely trained, for she had enjoyed the advantage of the instructions of an Italian maestro, who had been banished, and had gone out to Hong-Kong as band-master in the Twentieth Regiment. She could speak French fluently, and had read almost every thing.

Now after finding out all this, Brandon had not found out her name. Embarrassments arose sometimes, which she could not help noticing, from this very cause, and yet she said nothing about it. Brandon did not like to ask her abruptly, since he saw that she did not respond to his hints. So he conjectured and wondered. He thought that her name must be of the lordliest kind, and that she for some reason wished to keep it a secret: perhaps she was noble, and did not like to tell that name which had been stained by the occupations of trade. All this Brandon thought.

Yet as he thought this, he was not insensible to the music of her soft, low voice, the liquid tenderness of her eye, and the charm of her manner. She seemed at once to confide herself to him—to own the superiority of his nature, and seek shelter in it. Circumstances threw them exclusively into one another's way, and they found each other so congenial that they took advantage of circumstances to the utmost.

There were others as well as Brandon who found it awkward not to have any name by which to address her, and chief of these was the good Captain. After calling her Ma'am and Miss indifferently for about a month he at last determined to ask her directly; so, one day at the dinner-table, he said:

"I most humbly beg your pardon, ma'am; but I do not know your name, and have never had a chance to find it out. If it's no offense, perhaps you would be so good as to tell it?"

The young lady thus addressed flushed crimson, then looked at Brandon, who was gazing fixedly on his plate, and with visible embarrassment said, very softly, "Beatrice."

"B. A. Treachy," said the Captain. "Ah! I hope, Miss Treachy, you will pardon me; but I really found it so everlasting confusing."

A faint smile crossed the lips of Brandon.

"SHE GAVE HERSELF ENTIRELY UP TO THE JOY OF SONG."

But Beatrice did not smile. She looked a little frightened, and then said:

"Oh, that is only my Christian name!"

"Christian name!" said the Captain. How can that be a Christian name?"

"My surname is—" She hesitated, and then, with an effort, pronounced the word "Potts."

"Potts!" said the Captain, quickly, and with evident surprise. "Oh—well, I hope you will excuse me."

But the face of Beatrice turned to an ashen hue as she marked the effect which the mention of that name had produced on Brandon. He had been looking at his plate like one involved in thought. As he heard the name his head fell forward, and he caught at the table to steady himself. He then rose abruptly with a cloud upon his brow, his lips firmly pressed together, and his whole face seemingly transformed, and hurried from the cabin.

She did not see him again for a week. He pleaded illness, shut himself in his state-room, and was seen by no one but Cato.

Beatrice could not help associating this change in Brandon with the knowledge of her name. That name was hateful to herself. A fastidious taste had prevented her from volunteering to tell it; and as no one asked her directly it had not been known. And now, since she had told it, this was the result.

For Brandon's conduct she could imagine only one cause. He had felt shocked at such a plebeian name.

The fact that she herself hated her name, and saw keenly how ridiculously it sounded after such a name as Beatrice, only made her feel the more indignant with Brandon. "His own name," she thought, bitterly, "is plebeian—not so bad as mine, it is true, yet still it is plebeian. Why should he feel so shocked at mine?" Of course, she knew him only as "Mr. Wheeler." "Perhaps he has imagined that I had some grand name, and, learning my true one, has lost his illusion. He formerly esteemed me. He now despises me."

Beatrice was cut to the heart; but she was too proud to show any feeling whatever. She frequented the quarter-deck as before: though now she had no companion except, at turns, the good-natured Captain and the mate. The longer Brandon avoided her the more indignant she felt. Her outraged pride made sadness impossible.

Brandon remained in his state-room for about two weeks altogether. When at length he made his appearance on the quarter-deck he found Beatrice there, who greeted him with a distant bow.

There was a sadness in his face as he approached and took a seat near her which at once disarmed her, drove away all indignation, and aroused pity.

"You have been sick," she said, kindly, and with some emotion.

"Yes," said Brandon, in a low voice, "but now that I am able to go about again my first act is to apologize to you for my rudeness in quitting the table so abruptly as to make it seem like a personal insult to you. Now I hope you will believe me when I say that an insult to you from me is impossible. Something like a spasm passed over my nervous system, and I had to hurry to my room."

"I confess," said Beatrice, frankly, "that I thought your sudden departure had something to do with the conversation about me. I am very sorry indeed that I did you such a wrong; I might have known you better. Will you forgive me?"

Brandon smiled, faintly. "You are the one who must forgive."

"But I hate my name so," burst out Beatrice.

Brandon said nothing.

He found her on the seas, and he was content to take her as she was. Her name was a common one. She might be connected with his enemy, or she might not. For his part, he did not wish to know.

Beatrice also showed equal care in avoiding the subject. The effect which had been produced by the mention of her name was still remembered, and, whatever the cause may have been, both this and her own strong dislike to it prevented her from ever making any allusion either to her father or to any one of her family. She had no scruples, however, about talking of her Hong-Kong life, in which one person seemed to have figured most prominently—a man who had lived there for years, and given her instruction in music. He was an Italian, of whom she knew nothing whatever but his name, with the exception of the fact that he had been unfortunate in Europe, and had come out to Hong-Kong as band-master of the Twentieth Regiment. His name was Paolo Langhetti.

"Do you like music?" asked Brandon, abruptly.

"Above all things," said Beatrice, with an intensity of emphasis which spoke of deep feeling.

"Do you play?"

"Somewhat."

"Do you sing?"

"A little. I was considered a good singer in Hong-Kong; but that is nothing. I sang in the Cathedral. Langhetti was kind enough to praise me; but then he was so fond of me that whatever I did was right."

Brandon was silent for a little while. "Langhetti was fond of you?" he repeated, interrogatively, and in a voice of singular sweetness.

"Very," returned Beatrice, musingly. "He always called me 'Bice'—sometimes 'Bicetta,' 'Bicicola,' 'Bicina'; it was his pretty Italian way. But oh, if you could hear him play! He could make the violin speak like a human voice. He used to think in music. He seemed to me to be hardly human sometimes."

"And he loved to hear you sing?" said Brandon, in the same voice.

"He used to praise me," said Beatrice, meekly. "His praise used to gratify, but it did not deceive me. I am not contented, Mr. Wheeler."

"Would you sing for me?" asked Brandon, in accents almost of entreaty, looking at her with an imploring expression.

Beatrice's head fell. "Not now—not yet—not here," she murmured, with a motion of her hand. "Wait till we pass beyond this ocean. It seems haunted."

Brandon understood her tone and gesture.

But the weeks passed, and the months, and they went over the seas, touching at Mauritius, and afterward at Cape Town, till finally they entered the Atlantic Ocean, and sailed North. During all this time their association was close and continuous. In her presence Brandon softened; the sternness of his features relaxed, and the great purpose of his life grew gradually fainter.

One evening, after they had entered the Atlantic Ocean, they were standing by the stern of the ship looking at the waters, when Brandon repeated his request.

"Would you be willing to sing now?" he asked, gently, and in the same tone of entreaty which he had used before.

Beatrice looked at him for a moment without speaking. Then she raised her face and looked up at the sky, with a deep abstraction in her eyes, as though in thought. Her face, usually colorless, now, in the moonlight, looked like marble; her dark hair hung in peculiar folds over her brow—an arrangement which was antique in its style, and gave her the look of a statue of one of the Muses. Her straight, Grecian features, large eyes, thin lips, and well-rounded chin—all had the same classic air, and Brandon, as he looked at her, wondered if she knew how fair she was. She stood for a moment in silence, and then began. It was a marvelous and a memorable epoch in Brandon's life. The scene around added its inspiration to the voice of the singer. The ocean spread afar away before them till the verge of the horizon seemed to blend sea and sky together. Overhead the dim sky hung, dotted with innumerable stars, prominent among which, not far above the horizon, gleamed that glorious constellation, the Southern Cross. Beatrice, who hesitated for a moment as if to decide upon her song, at last caught her idea from this scene around her, and began one of the most magnificent of Italian compositions:

"I cieli immensi narrano Del grand Iddio la gloria."

Her first notes poured forth with a sweetness and fullness that arrested the attention of all on board the ship. It was the first time she had sung, as she afterward said, since Langhetti had left Hong-Kong, and she gave herself entirely up to the joy of song. Her voice, long silent, instead of having been injured by the sorrow through which she had passed, was pure, full, marvelous, and thrilling. A glow like some divine inspiration passed over the marble beauty of her classic features; her eyes themselves seemed to speak of all that glory of which she sang, as the sacred fire of genius flashed from them.

At those wonderful notes, so generous and so penetrating with their sublime meaning, all on board the ship looked and listened with amazement. The hands of the steersman held the wheel listlessly. Brandon's own soul was filled with the fullest effects. He stood watching her figure, with its inspired lineaments, and thought of the fabled prodigies of music spoken of in ancient story. He thought of Orpheus hushing all animated nature to calm by the magic of his song. At last all thoughts of his own left him, and nothing remained but that which the song of Beatrice swept over his spirit.

But Beatrice saw nothing and heard nothing

"I hope so," said she, musingly.

One day a young nobleman solicited the honor of an interview with the Empress, and was ushered into a room, at one of the windows of which a lady was standing with her back toward him. This lady was dressed from head to foot in pur-press alone wore it. She dismissed him haugh-

Ball-dresses of tulle, embroidered or plain, with a very elegant white silk under-skirt attached to each dress, were sold for twenty dollars apiece. The tulle was in many cases torn, and therefore almost valueless, but at our present prices, and even at second-hand, twenty dollars was the merest trifle for the elegant white silk under-dress, which was in every case immensely long, immensely full, and of a beautiful, sweeping, train-like cut. I remember saying to the lady who was selling the dresses (for she was a lady, though that title was withheld her by society)

I bought a white muslin dress of a fineness of texture such as I have never seen outside of a cambric pocket-handkerchief. There were innumerable muslin skirts sewn into the waist-band, though this dress had no silk underslip; the fine, thin muslin reached to the throat and came to the wrists. But the underwaist was so very décolleté that, in my view, it was too immodest to be worn. The maid said the Empress liked her dresses very décolletées, and at the next ball at the Tuileries I observed what I had never before noticed, that her dress was cut so low, particularly at the back, that her shoulder-blades were completely exposed. Eugénie's loveliness, however, is of that saint-like character that with her all extravagances of toilet may be overlooked. The muslin dress which I bought had never been washed, and the maid told me the Empress never wore muslin dresses after their first freshness had worn off. O. L.

"A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

The Publishers have just commenced the issue of HARPER'S BAZAR, a Weekly Illustrated Family Journal, devoted to Fashion and Home Literature. Their aim is twofold: to supply the existing need of a Weekly Fashion Newspaper, and to combine therewith a first-class literary journal, which will be indispensable
to every household.

It is the first Weekly Journal of Fashion ever published in the United States. The Publishers have made arrangements, at great cost, with the most celebrated of the Fashion Papers of Europe, especially with the famous Bazar of Berlin, which supplies the fashions to the leading journals of Paris, to furnish the same to them in advance, so that henceforth the fashions will appear in HARPER'S BAZAR simultaneously with their publication in Paris and Berlin—an advantage enjoyed by no other journal in the country.

The patrons of HARPER'S BAZAR will receive every fortnight large pattern-plates, containing from forty to fifty full-sized patterns of ladies', misses', and children's bonnets, cloaks, dresses, under-clothing, and other articles, accompanied with the necessary descriptions and directions, and occasionally an elegant colored fashion plate.

HARPER'S BAZAR, besides being the leading Fashion
Journal in this country, will also aim to present before its readers the very best specimens of Household Literature. It will contain original and selected Serial Stories, Poetry, Novelles, Articles on the Topics of the Day (excluding Politics), on Books, Art, Morals,
Familiar Science, Education, Amusements, Hygiene,
Etiquette, Housekeeping, Gardening, with Home and Foreign Gossip. No subject of household interest will be excluded from its columns.

HARPER'S BAZAR will contain 16 folio pages, of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superfine calendered paper, and will be published weekly.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the World."

HARPER'S New MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

We can account for its success only by the simple fact that it meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructive variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A Complete Pictorial History of the Times."

"The best, cheapest, and most successful Family Paper in the Union."

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
SPLENDIDLY ILLUSTRATED.

The MODEL NEWSPAPER of our country—complete in all the departments of an American Family Paper —HARPER'S WEEKLY has earned for itself a right to its title, "A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION."—New York Evening Post.

This Paper furnishes the best illustrations. Our future historians will enrich themselves out of HARPER'S WEEKLY long after writers, and printers, and publishers are turned to dust.—New York Evangelist.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY from week to week form a remarkable series of brief political essays. They are distinguished by clear and pointed statements, by good common sense, by independence and breadth of view.

VARIETIES OF THE ARTICLE HUSBAND.

1. A real darling little love of a husband; always keeps himself looking as neat as a new pin.

2. Allows his wife to do just as she pleases, and always pays the bills promptly.

3. A great drunken brute—doesn't care for any thing but his Club.

4. "He's such a funny man; keeps me laughing all day long."

5. All the fault she has to find with him is, he hasn't got the spirit of a mouse.

6. "He's an astonishing genius, my dear; his mind is always occupied with deep problems—that's the reason he's so reserved."

There is a bashful bachelor who dares not meet ladies in the street. He says they wear so many bugles on their dresses that he fears overtures from them.

"Do women go to sea now, Sir, as sailors?" "Why, no, Sammy, they have never been sailors in any age. What made you ask such a question?" "Because, Sir, I've just been reading of the widow's cruise."

A man who had been fined several weeks in succession for getting drunk coolly proposed to the magistrate that he should take him by the year at a reduced rate.

What city's destruction is necessary to Ethiopian minstrelsy?—Burnt Cork.

A horticulturist advertised that he would supply all sorts of fruit trees and plants, especially pie-plants of all kinds. A gentleman thereupon sent him an order for one package of custard-pie seed, and a dozen mince-pie plants. The gentleman promptly filled the order by sending him four goose-eggs and a small dog.

A lady advertises in a city paper that she wants a gentleman "for breakfast and tea."

Mrs. Partington, while looking at a picture of Washington in a window, saw the name of the artist, Mr. Green, in the corner of it. After admiring it for some time, she at length remarked: "Well, Mr. Green is not such a bad-looking chap arter all."

Why should the King of Italy wage war without hesitation?—Because he will always be Victor.

URGENT WANTS.

A collar for the neck of a bottle.
Two pairs of boots for the feet of a table.
A quarter of a printer's pie.
A hand for the arm of a chair.
The words a revolver repeats.
Seeds from the apple of the eye.
A toe-pography of the foot.
A pan from the knee.
A small measure of beets from a stove of flats.
A quiver from the retort of a sonata.
The spider that spun the web of life.
A pound of the spice of life.
The beau that crossed the bridge of a fiddle.

What riches are those that certainly make themselves wings and fly away?—Ost-riches.

A negress, speaking of one of her children who was lighter colored than the rest, said: "I nebber could bear dat brat, 'cause he show dirt so easy."

A SCHOOL-BOY'S ASPIRATION.—"Oh, how I wish I were a fountain, for then I could always be playing!"

A soldier being asked if he met with much hospitality in Ireland, replied, "I was in the hospital nearly all the time I was there."

It was an apt answer of a young lady who, being asked where was her native place, replied, "I have none; I am the daughter of a Methodist minister."

"Do let me have your photograph," said a dashing belle to a gentleman who had been annoying her with his attentions. The gentleman was delighted, and in a short time the lady received the picture. She gave it to the servant with the question, "Would you know the original if he should call?" The servant replied in the affirmative. "Well, whenever he comes tell him I am engaged."

"I say, boy, is there any thing to shoot about here?" inquired a sportsman of a boy he met. "Well," replied the boy, "nothing just about here; but our schoolmaster is just over the hill there cutting birch rods; you might walk up and pop him over."

We commend to notice the following obituary: "My husband is no more. He did not wish to live longer, and if he had it would have made no difference, for gout entered his stomach, and was soon followed by death. I shall marry the doctor who so kindly attended my late husband; I learned then to trust him. Soft rest the ashes of the departed one, whose whole-sale liquor business I shall continue at the old stand!"

The "Family Miller"—The man who thrashes his wife and children.

JOCKEY-LAR REMARK.—In racing parlance bakers are spoken of as "light-weights."

Why is an overworked horse like an umbrella?—Because it is used up.

A SCIENTIFIC FAMILY.

MR. OLOGY considers his forte to be Metaphysics. He is here explaining an abstruse point to a friend.

MRS. OLOGY has become a convert to Prof. Blot's Science of Cookery, and being of a thinking mind, knows no reason why some things should not be eaten as well as others.

ANN OLOGY absolutely dotes upon Astronomy, particularly during summer. (Perhaps because of the man in the moon.)

ISAAC OLOGY (familiarly called Zike Ology) thinks collecting specimens in Natural History is about his style.

THEODORE OLOGY (familiarly The Ology) thinks Botany in his Aunt's kitchen-garden the nicest thing a going.

DOX OLOGY, the infant, delights its parents with its evident love of Natural Philosophy.

THE BEST READING CHEAP.

MRS. MULOCK CHALK'S new Love Story, "The Woman's Kingdom," will be commenced in HARPER'S MAGAZINE for January, and will be continued through the year. It will occupy about one-eighth of each Number, and so will cost subscribers fifty cents. When completed, the English edition will cost 16s. sterling; about equivalent to $7.

MR. JAMES DE MILLE'S Novel, "Cord and Creese," now appearing in HARPER'S BAZAR, will run through several months. When published in book form the probable price will be $4. In the BAZAR its cost is about twenty-five cents.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS'S new Novel is soon to appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY. If it runs to the usual length of his stories it will occupy about one year; and when published in London the cost will be a guinea and a half; equal to about $11. The cost to those who obtain it in the WEEKLY will be about one dollar.

Our first large COLORED FASHION PLATE will shortly appear, to be followed at brief intervals by others, prepared expressly for HARPER'S BAZAR, and unequalled for taste and beauty.

Our readers are referred to our ADVERTISEMENTS of HARPER'S BAZAR for Terms and Editorial Notices.

The next Number of the BAZAR will contain a very useful Supplement.

Single Subscribers to HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied from the beginning to the end of the year 1868, which will complete the first Volume, for the yearly price of four dollars.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied together for ten dollars, or any two at seven dollars.

THE TWO BAZARS.

NO new journal could have met with a more generous and cordial welcome than has been accorded to Harper's Bazar by the press at large. Hundreds of editorial notices, from all parts of the United States and Canada, have given the young candidate for popular favor a courteous and friendly greeting, and bid it God-speed with a heartiness that has elicited our warmest gratitude. Harper's Bazar, indeed, as a weekly fashion newspaper, took possession of a wholly unoccupied field in journalistic literature, and began its career wishing neither to attack, injure, nor offend any of its elder brethren. The single exception to the good feeling which it has been fortunate enough to meet would scarce deserve attention, were it not accompanied by allegations calculated to mislead the public if they were not set right in the beginning. We are called upon to verify our credentials, and it is best to do so once for all, to save further trouble.

Our contemporary who speaks of the Berlin Bazar—which forms the basis of our paper—as an obscure journal, is probably ignorant of the fact, that this obscure journal has a sworn circulation, in the vernacular, of over a quarter of a million; that, moreover, it is duplicated in six different languages in Europe; and that the celebrated Mode Illustrée, which is the most widely-circulated fashion journal in Paris, and is also well known in this country, is almost exactly a reproduction of the Berlin Bazar. Our contemporary might have learned from those on the spot, and in default of that, from various sources, among others, the New York Times, that the Bazar establishment, located for convenience sake in Berlin, but directed chiefly by French artistes, is the great centre where originate the various Paris fashions. The Bazar itself is edited in the interests of the people, which accounts for its wide popularity; its fashions are plain, practical, and involving moderate cost, such as would be needed by the people at large, in lieu of a few millionaires; and instead of furnishing every month a single cut pattern, which not one in a thousand probably would want, it gives its readers a score of patterns every fortnight from which to choose, so simple as to be made available by any one with the slightest ingenuity, and which, by the aid of a little instrument just introduced, costing a few cents, can be copied by a child. Harper's Bazar, however, merely makes the Berlin Bazar its basis, adding thereto the richest and most beautiful designs from the best French and other journals, thus adapting the paper to the needs of all classes, and forming a combination unsurpassed by any paper in the world.

Just as long as the French continue the most tasteful nation in the world they will continue the leaders of fashion; and just as long as every imported dress or bonnet brings twice as much as one of American manufacture; as every dress-maker or milliner born in Paris is considered as having a right to charge twice as much for her services as one born in America; and as American dress-makers and milliners find it necessary to assume French names to attract marked attention, just so long will the attempt to substitute native for foreign fashions prove abortive.

It is time to put an end to the notion which seems to have gained considerable credence in this country, but which is indignantly denied by the French modistes, that the foreign fashions originate with the Parisian demi-monde. The outré styles which are occasionally seen therein are not adopted by the reputable part of the community, nor do they find their way into the European fashion journals; and usually, instead of being original creations, they are only fantastic exaggerations of the modes in vogue. The fashions of Europe have quite as respectable an origin as those of America would be likely to have.

Harper's Bazar has no establishment to advertise, no goods to sell, no black-mail to levy, and no private interests to conciliate. Its opinions are honest and independent; and its information is based on the best authority. It makes no pretensions to set the fashions, with which a newspaper has nothing to do, but to chronicle them faithfully for the information of the public. In this connection we would cordially return thanks for the very great courtesy that has been shown us by the leading merchants and modistes of New York who have afforded us every facility for carrying out our designs.

We are not anxious to recriminate, but in justice to ourselves we can not forbear quoting an editorial from the Independent of Nov. 14, which will show the high moral sentiment which actuates our contemporary, and demonstrate the respect which such authority deserves:

A TRICK OF TRADE.

There are a good many ways of pushing one's wares into market; some of which are reputable and some disreputable. For instance, we have just picked up a religious newspaper containing what purports to be a quotation from THE INDEPENDENT, puffing Demorest's Monthly. The paragraph is long, and we reprint only a small part of it, as follows:

"The number now before us fairly dazzles one's eyes, and puzzles the brain to know how so much beauty and literary excellence can be afforded at such a low price."—The Independent.

NO, THE INDEPENDENT has never had its eyes dazzled or its brain puzzled by any extraordinary brilliancy in Demorest's Monthly. The above paragraph is taken not from THE INDEPENDENT's book-table, or its editorial page, but from its advertising columns. If it is to be quoted, therefore, it is to be quoted as the opinion not of the editor of THE INDEPENDENT, but of the publisher of Demorest's Monthly. As for ourselves, while we have any sanity left, we probably shall not be caught puffing Mr. Demorest's Magazine.

THE AMERICAN FACE.

THERE is a larger average of good-looking people in the United States than in any other part of the world. Mrs. Trollope, Miss Martineau, and other foreign female travelers, have, with all their evident disposition to find fault with this country, been compelled to acknowledge that its men are remarkably well-favored. All the male travelers say as much for our women, and one little miss, too young to be jealous of her sex, reporting in a late London magazine her observations on the United States, declares that she never beheld such a sparkle of female beauty as in Broadway, and confesses that if a man she would be unable to resist falling in love with it.

The American face is remarkable for its regularity. It seldom presents those extraordinary deviations from the classical ideal, so frequently observed in foreigners. Those monstrous developments of the features, which are not seldom found in the German or Irish countenance, and approximate it to the various types of the lower animals, are rare among native-born Americans. As people of all nations come hither, we have, of course, every kind of face. There are accordingly all varieties of disproportion and degrees of ugliness to be occasionally seen. These, such as the low heads and crumpled faces which look as if they had been squashed in the making; the nasal appendages fleshy and pendent, like abortive elephants' trunks; the ears tumid and misshapen as gigantic oysters; the thick lips, eviscerated mouths, and projecting under jaws, are generally of foreign importation.

The American complexion is surpassed in freshness and clearness by the English in youth. Our dry atmosphere is unfavorable both to the color and transparency of the skin. In advanced age, however, we have decidedly the advantage. While the English complexion is apt to become pimply and blowsy, and seems to indicate grossness and overfeeding, the American, with the progress of time, ripens to a mellow ruddiness, which harmonizes well with gray hairs, and the veneration which is due them.

The American face, having generally but little fat or cellular tissue, shrinks readily into wrinkles, and thus we are supposed to wear out earlier than we do. The earnestness and activity of mind in the United States, give a concentration to the expression of the general countenance which also soon furrows it. Compare the peasant face of Europe with that of the working people of this country. The former appears like a mass of dough rolled into a uniform surface; the latter is full of lines, distinct and expressive as those of a steel engraving.

Our dames, although we do not advise them to go to bed nightly on a supper of Stilton cheese and London stout like their English sisters, would, we believe, preserve their good looks longer if they lived better. By living better we mean feeding at regular intervals upon well-cooked, nutritious food, instead of wasting their appetites upon cakes, sweets, and other indigestible articles which fill the stomach but starve the body. Hear what Brillat Savarin says upon the effects of good living: "Gourmandise is favorable to beauty. A train of exact and rigid observations have demonstrated that a succulent, delicate, and careful regimen repels to a distance, and for a length of time, the external appearance of old age. It gives more brilliancy to the eyes, more freshness to the skin, more support to the muscles; and as it is certain in physiology that it is the depression of the muscles which causes wrinkles, those formidable enemies of beauty, it is equally true to say that, ceteris paribus, those who understand eating are comparatively ten years younger than those who are strangers to this science."

The Circassian beauty is said to preserve her peculiar complexion, which is of an etiolated, pasty kind that we don't admire, by never applying water to her face, which she keeps in order solely by dry rubbing. One of the most brilliant American complexions we ever saw was due, according to its possessor, to the free use of soap and water. Nothing can be more fatal to the clearness and freshness of the face than the use of the various cosmetics in vogue. Powder and paint, apart from the positive harm they may do by the poisonous constituents of which they are made, fill up the pores of the skin, and prevent that free transpiration essential to its gloss, roseate hue, and transparency.

Ever since a traveler imprudently revealed the fact that some women, of the Carpathian valleys, we believe, secured for themselves beautiful complexions by feeding on arsenic, this practice, it is said, has been more or less generally adopted, not only in Europe but in this country. Physicians have, moreover, for a long time been in the habit of prescribing, in diseases of the skin, a preparation called Fowler's Solution, the principal constituent of which is arsenic. This remedy is considered an effective one, but its danger is so great that it is given only in the smallest doses, and its operation is watched with the utmost care and anxiety. Arsenic is one of the deadliest poisons, and no one should venture, with the remote possibility of its giving clearness to the complexion, to dabble with it. Though the dose at first may be so small as to produce no sensible influence upon the human body, it will, if repeated, exhibit all its virulence, as this powerful agent has what the physicians term a cumulative effect; that is, each small quantity taken remains in the system inert until, by subsequent additions, the poison has acquired sufficient force to act, when it does so with the most fatal effect.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to an affable and gentlemanly Hotel Clerk.

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIEND,—Young, I mean, in years as compared with me. I am sure you would not suspect me of accusing you of any other kind of youth. My dear Sir, have you reflected upon the danger of great power? How it makes men tyrannical, selfish, vain, giddy? Have you thought of its vast and peculiar temptations, and of the steady conscience and heart and nerve necessary to baffle them? There was Tiberias, for instance, or any one of the Roman Emperors. How much power they had, and what a use they made of it! Or Napoleon Bonaparte; he grasped power as men drink wine, and became more and more intoxicated with its increase. His appetite was as fierce as that of any drunkard at your bar—I beg pardon, I meant to say he was as unable to control his ambition as any gentleman is unable to control his thirst who frequents the—the—sample-room or wine-room in the neighborhood of your prettily furnished office. Napoleon Bonaparte quaffed Spain as I have seen a man turn off a bumper of Sicily Madeira. He swallowed Italy as if it had been a draught of Falernian. He drank up Wirtemberg without breathing. And the more he drank the thirstier he was. And what advantage to any one was his tremendous drinking? Or, in other words, what use did he make of his vast power? Shall I allude to Catherine of Russia? My dear young friend, her name reminds me that power is very, very dangerous to the man or the woman who has it.

I thought of this the other evening when I arrived by the late train and with a throng of other passengers stood waiting to write my name in the book of the extremely "first-class" hotel (for I frequent no others, and it is a laughable idea that you should be the affable and gentlemanly clerk of any other), in whose office you were good enough to preside. What a spectacle it was! We were all dusty, tired, and seedy; and we had evidently left most of our manners upon the road, although I suppose the most careful scrutiny would hardly have succeeded in finding any remains of them there. We stood in an uneasy and impatient line striving to reach the book and write our names. What a craven, coward crew we were, looking at you and hoping somehow to propitiate you that you might give us good rooms! And how calm and superior you were! How you looked over all our heads, and if some one of us said to you, with audacious familiarity, "How do you, Mr. Clerk? glad to see you, Sir!" how loftily you responded, with an air of saying, "Keep your distance, my good fellow!" I must say, however, I was rather glad to see how you treated the person in the large brown coat and velvet collar who had succeeded in pushing into the line at some little distance before me. When he had written his name, instead of giving the pen to the next comer and passing along, he stopped and, leaning forward over the counter (if you will forgive the necessary word), he said, with an air of importance and confidentially, "I hope you'll give me a good room?" You answered merely, "Will you pass along, Sir." I think that was good for him. I forgive you a great deal of affability and gentlemanliness for that nipping rebuke.

But why is it, my dear young friend, that you treat us all as offenders of the darkest dye? What have we done that you should answer our questions with such ill-suppressed contempt? It is true that we are only poor, miserable travelers, asking for a night's lodging; but we mean to pay for it, indeed we do. We confess the enormity of our delinquencies in being caught in a tavern—I mean a hotel at all. But what are we to do? We would willingly go elsewhere, and leave you without a guest to disturb you, if we could. But there is no alternative. When, for instance, the train arrives at midnight at—well, any where—what must we do if we are resolved upon the "first-class" hotel? I do not know that you, my good Sir, have carried the loftiness of your manners quite to the degree of those of the waiter in some railroad lunch-house at Albany. It seemed that worthy Dr. Wines repaired thither for breakfast, and entirely forgetting his position of utter inferiority to the affable and gentlemanly waiter, ventured to make some remonstrance upon some overcharge, or to decline to pay for what he had not had, so that the waiter was compelled to knock him down and break a small bone in his leg, or something of the kind, to restore him to a due sense of his proper subjection. I am very humbly grateful that you have never broken my shins for daring to ask questions of you, although I have often seen and admired the moral struggle which you underwent in refraining.

Do you know, my bejeweled friend, that I have sometimes thought of the great Napoleon as I contemplated you? Like him, I have mused, my affable friend is the victim of the power he possesses. Before him all travelers are equal. He may send them into the sky-parlor, or he may give them comfortable and even delightful quarters. I think of the Pope putting his foot upon the neck of the Emperor. I think of the Asiatic victor harnessing kings to his chariot. I think of Gulliver the Great in Lilliput. My dear Sir, in your hands is the comfort of scores of your fellow-beings every night and day. I pray you use it benignly, use it wisely. You live, in a peculiar manner, upon the road. Your house is but a station of travel. Your manners, like those of the excellent railroad conductor to whom I hope to have the happiness of soon addressing a letter, are emphatically manners upon the road. Now, Sir, do you know that your manners will do as much for the reputation and success of your house as any other single influence? It is in your power to make yourself truly valuable, yes, indispensable, to the proprietor of the house, or to baffle him and help him along to ruin, and all this by your manners!

Just imagine it! Two ingenuous youths—let us call them Thomas and James—start in life, and with a generous emulation become clerks in two admirably-appointed hotels in the delightful city of M. or N. Thomas proposes to himself as his rule of conduct perfect kindness, patience, and courtesy. He does not forget that porters, and waiters, and chambermaids, are men and women, human beings like himself, and accordingly he does not speak to them as if they were despicable outcasts. He can ask a question of them as pleasantly as of Mr. Stewart or Mr. Vanderbilt or Mr. Astor, or any other famously rich man who passes the night in the hotel. He can tell these to carry a message without an air of undisguised contempt, and does not send them to a lodger's room as if he were the Sultan ordering a guilty slave to the bow-string. He does not receive the guests of the house as if his condescension were almost more than he could support, and he does all that he can do to give them the utmost accommodation. Above all, he is too much of a true gentleman to be obsequious to "carriage company" while he is overbearing and half insolent to the modest bachelor who is not clad in the height and depth of the fashion, and whose purse is evidently not very long. Like justice, his hospitality is impartial; and every body who stops at that house, man, woman, or child, is treated with such courtesy that he remembers it gratefully among all hotels, celebrates far and wide the essentially good-manners of our worthy friend Thomas, and is glad when the time comes for him to visit that house again. His politeness, his manners upon the road, are so attractive that he has made the fortune of that hotel. Do you think the proprietor can easily afford to part with him?

How is it with James? He has an altogether different idea of the propriety of his position. To begin with, he is the most exquisite of dandies. There is no barber's waxen head, cast a little and languishingly to one side, with the dark locks more smoothly oiled and more carefully curled than the head of James. His hair-dressing seems to be the work of an artist, and I wonder when I see him whether he does it himself in the solitude of his chamber, or whether it is really the barber who officiates. His dress corresponds. His manner is as ludicrous as can be imagined. He is not the clerk of a hotel; he is the patron of mankind. The Pope in all his glory in his most glorious days of power was not so serene and complacent as our friend James. To him, of course, porters, waiters, chamber-maids, guests, are inferior beings. They are not only inferior, but abjectly so. He does not severely disdain, he merely despises them. He commands every body; he asks nobody. There is not a person employed in that house, from the roof to the cellar, who would not gladly see him mortified, or in some manner brought to grief. The strangers who must stop at that hotel avoid him, laugh at him, and do not care to return. His manner is an insult to every one of them; yet, not even the newspaper correspondents like to mention it, nor the editors to publish their letters if they do, for James is the arbiter of their destinies when they are obliged to stop at the house.

It is his manners only, his manners upon the road. But which is the more profitable servant, Thomas or James? For it comes to that, my dear affable and gentlemanly friend; you are a servant, and paid wages for your work. Bear that steadily in mind, as we all do who write our names in your book. There is no harm in being a servant—no, by Abou Ben Adhem! none at all; and we are all servants in the same general way that the greatest merchants, as we saw last week, merely keep shop. The mischief is in not knowing it, and in not being humble. My young and affable friend, there is many and many a poor-looking traveler who stands before you every day, and whom you send to the room upon the highest floor, and treat with the highest disregard, who recognizes you at once. If you choose you may write yourself upon his heart so that he will always most kindly remember you; and, if you choose, you may send him away laughing at you. You may promote the comfort of thousands of people every year, or you may make them utterly uncomfortable. And you will do it by your manners. Think of it. Mind your manners, then, my friend in the hotel office, mind your manners.

Your seedy friend in the sixth story,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FASHIONS in furs are not capricious. Until within the past year or two there has been so little variety in these comfortable wrappings that they began to be considered unsuceptible of change. Now there are new shapes and new material. The long victorine and tippet are old-fashioned. Cuffs are out of use. A set consists of collar and muff. Collars are small, and pointed behind. Short tabs in front are finished with fur tassels. Muffs are also smaller. Tips or tassels of fur instead of silk adorn the ends of the muff. The head of the animal from which the fur is taken is also used for ornament. Pockets and portmonnaies are placed on the back of flat muffs for shopping and skating. Boas are worn of mink and sable, but are oftener seen in ermine for evening wear than in the dark furs suitable for the promenade. The greatest change of all is in the cloaks. Large unyielding capes are superseded by graceful paletots and half-adjusted sacques. These loose cloaks admit of more ornament than the circular garments. A wide Angora fringe surrounds them, and furs of a different shade from the body of the sacque are inserted in braiding patterns.

Russian and Hudson Bay sable are the most valuable furs, and are handsome enough to defy all novelty and change. Mink, always neat and durable, is a standard medium article, its value depending on the number of dark stripes in the garment. The stripe is the centre of the animal's back, and the most valuable part of the skin. The gray Siberian squirrel is less expensive, soft and silky, and pretty for children. These furs will still be sought after, notwithstanding the presence of the more novel sealskin, Astrakhan, Persiani, Russian lambskin, and Krimmer. Sealskin in its natural state is cuir color, approaching very nearly to the fashionable Bismarck brown. It is more admired, however, when colored a dark rich maroon. The Persiani, Russian lamb, and Krimmer are erroneously spoken of by ladies under the general name of Astrakhan. They are found in different localities in Southern Europe, and when placed beside each other a very perceptible difference is observed. The Astrakhan has short knobby tufts, and may be either white, black, or gray. Persiani is more silky, and has longer fleece than Astrakhan. Russian lambskin is always black, and has a peculiar wavy appearance. Krimmer is either gray or black. The hair is short and curly, looking more like cloth than fur. The Swiss grebe and canary down are from the birds known by these names; they are smoother and more glossy than ermine, and are intended for evening wraps, but will not, of course, supplant the royal ermine.

SABLE AND MINK.

Russian sable sets, consisting of collar and muff, with sable tips, vary in price from two hundred and fifty to eight hundred dollars. American sable made up in the same style costs from fifty to three hundred and fifty dollars. Mink sets, valued last winter at a hundred and twenty-five dollars, are now reduced to ninety or a hundred dollars. A very fair quality of mink, with the fur all running one way, is made up into muff and collar for fifty dollars. A short mink boa, buttoned at the throat, has only one long end finished with tips; the other is ornamented with the head of the animal. Another style of boa is a round roll, two yards long, to be wound about the neck. Very good squirrel sets are sold at twenty dollars. These are far preferable to the coarse but more expensive Fitch.

SEALSKIN CLOAKS, SONTAGS, ETC.

One of the handsomest novelties from the French Exposition is a sacque of seal, with muff and toquet to correspond. The shape is a loose paletot with sleeves. The body of the garment is of dark-colored seal, as soft and glossy as velvet, lined throughout with gray and white squirrel locks. An inserted trimming, in a pattern resembling appliqué braiding, is of the seal in its natural light-brown color. A small muff has an insertion trimming to correspond, and is also lined with fur. The toquet is ornamented with fur tassels. Price four hundred dollars.

Loose sacques of colored sealskin, made up in the best style, without insertion trimming, range from one to two hundred dollars. Half-adjusted basquines, both long and short, are made to slope with the figure more gracefully than would seem possible for such thick material. A muff and collar of sealskin cost forty dollars.

A sontag of seal, to be worn under a cloak or shawl, is a novel and comfortable garment. It is shaped like a sleeveless jacket. The sealskin is in its natural state and light color. An inserted trimming of gray Persiani surrounds it. Still another sealskin novelty is the satchel muff. A caba, quite large enough to be useful in shopping, has a concealed place where one's hands can be cozily stowed away. The handle of the satchel is prettily ornamented with gilt. Eighteen dollars is the price. Carriage shoes are also made of seal, tipped with sable, and lined with squirrel-skin. Small reticules, reminders of our grandmothers, have the lower half of seal, with dove-colored satin for the upper half, drawn together with cord and tassels. They are just large enough to hold the handkerchief and pocket-book—a better way of carrying those indispensable articles than to destroy the effect of a gown dress by thrusting them into one's pocket.

ASTRAKHAN, PERSIANI, ETC.

An Astrakhan suit, the sacque long, loose, and stylish in shape, is sold for eighty-five dollars. Muff and beret to correspond. Small aigrette of feathers on the beret. A jacket of white Astrakhan for evening is short and loose. A border of black Astrakhan tufts is inserted. Wide Angora fringe, alternately white and black, around the bottom. Small muff, fringed at the ends, price seventy-five dollars. Jet chains and cable cords are used occasionally for trimming Astrakhan, but with poor effect. Nothing looks so well as the insertions of the same kind of fur of a different shade and Angora fringe. Collars and muffs of black Astrakhan are used for deep mourning. It is also a favorite fur for trimming skating suits.

Persiani is more expensive than Astrakhan. A handsome sacque of either gray or black Persiani is worth a hundred and fifty dollars. The Russian lambskin is always black, and in long waves as lustrous as satin. A set of this beautiful skin, the handsomest of all the curled furs, consists of a long sacque appropriately trimmed with the wavy Angora fringe, a fringed muff, and a bonnet, Fanchon shape, with no ornament but an aigrette of feathers. Krimmer is made up in the same manner.

ERMINE AND GREBE.

Ermine is the standard fur used for evening. Circulars and sacques with separate collar and muff are made to order. The muff and collar are worn with handsome street costumes. The most stylish ermine cloak we have seen this season was shaped like the mantelet with Greek sleeves given in the first Number of the Bazar. It was made longer, but the graceful style was preserved.

A fancy set of grebe is sold for twenty-five dollars. The boa has at one end a bird's head, and at the other grebe wing feathers. Pocket muff ornamented with tips and tassels. A grebe Fanchon with blue velvet strings, cut bias and bordered with grebe, is worn with this set. Canary and chinchilla collars are suitable for children.

SHAWLS.

The effect of the French Exposition, visible in so many branches of manufacture, is nowhere more plainly seen than in the beautiful shawls imported this season. The involutions of figures are marvelous, the colors carefully blended, and the designs novel. India camel's-hair shawls are of every size, from the small breakfast squares, with white cashmere centres and camel's-hair borders, sold at eighty-five dollars, to the handsome long shawls at three thousand dollars, wrought all over in a new pattern of white insertion, with colored tracery.

A French cashmere, of exquisite fineness, represents an Eastern procession of worshippers of some heathen deity. Groups of dancing-girls, elephants, well-filled sedan-chairs, and palanquins, are all proceeding in file toward the idol enshrined in the centre. This pattern is decidedly Oriental in style, but of questionable taste. The material and execution are uncommonly fine and elaborate. The price is two hundred and fifty dollars. Small scarlet or Bismarck centres are preferred to either white or black. Many shawls are so profusely wrought with palm-leaves and Oriental figures that the ground is entirely concealed. The prevailing style of wearing a shawl is to fold it square instead of triangular. The upper part is turned down like a collar. French shawls designed to be worn in this manner are fringed all round.

A comfortable carriage-shawl, or traveling-shawl, is of soft, thick plush, striped in black and crimson. Alternate stripes of cashmere pattern and a bright, solid color make a handsome shawl worn with a trained dress, but are too large for jaunty short dresses.

SHOES.

A neatly-fitting, well-shaped shoe is the foundation of all elegance in female attire. This has been most plainly demonstrated since short dresses came in fashion. Boots this season combine utility and beauty. Thick soles that support the instep, half-rounded toes, heels of medium size, and high ankles, are all the requisites for comfort; and the most fastidious can not fail to find some pleasing style among the various trimmings of lace, embroidery, stitching, appliqué, and fur.

Tips of patent leather are not worn. Toes are neither round nor square, but something between the two. Heels are high, narrow, and curved. Buttons are the favorite fastening. A new hook for buttoning has been invented. Kid boots are worn for the street instead of bronze or prunella. Walking boots are fastened with twenty jet buttons. The soles are heavy and slender. Appliqué straps and leaves of patent leather and colored morocco ornament the ankle and instep. With suits of one color boots are made of the same material as the dress, and elaborately stitched and embroidered. High Polish walking boots of Russian leather have gay tassels at the ankle. Colored kid and bronze boots with thin soles are suitable for the house or the carriage, but are too pronounced for the promenade. A new bronze boot has a lace rosette on the toe. Satin the color of the dress is inserted under the lace.

An elegant black velvet boot had a band of chinchilla around the top. Boots of black satin were laced in front, the lacing concealed by a band of velvet embroidered with jet. The Louis XV. heels, almost two inches high, were covered with satin. White satin boots for a bride were embroidered with white chenille and seed pearls. Roman pearl buttons. Bronze slippers for morning wear had bows of bronze on the toes, or rosettes of thick silk cord with tassels hanging down. Silk and satin quilted slippers with low broad heels are warm and pretty for invalids. Sandals of velvet lined and bordered with fur are comfortable for chamber wear.

A NEW TRIMMING.

An ingenious trimming just introduced by only one establishment in the city is called Amozine embroidery. It is applied with equally beautiful effect to thick and thin materials. It is made and sewn on to the garment while being made by a machine. The same machine embroiders on silk net and Swiss muslin, makes a Boulevard skirt border, and works the monograms on a cloth carriage robe. It trims linen, flannel, cloth, and velvet, and is wrought in cotton, zephyr, worsteds, and silk. There are several different stitches, and several colors may be used at once. A pretty fringe in one color or in many is sewn on the goods while in process of making.

BASQUINES AND REDINGOTES.

Basquines are worn for evening when full opera dress is not required. Like the redingote they are adjusted to the figure, and can be but slightly wadded. They should be made of thick velvet cloth. A pretty one is of scarlet, dotted with tiny beads, black, white, and amber. A beaded fringe is the only trimming.

Redingotes or Polonaise of fancy colored velvets are more worn than black. They are quite long, slightly fitted to the figure, lapped in front with two rows of buttons extending the length of the garment. A wide sash is tied at the back. Wide open sleeves with closed one beneath. A blue velvet redingote is bordered with chinchilla. The dress of which the skirt only is seen is of blue silk, the same shade as the redingote, bordered with a three-inch fold of velvet.

PERSONAL.

THE Indian chief who has given our troops the most trouble in the late battles on the Plains is named SPOTTED-TAIL, and, although a bad sort of aborigine, has a pretty daughter named LIZZIE EPIPIEMIA POCAMONTAS SPOTTED-TAIL, who is said to be intelligent; and the paternal savage proposes to send her to some first-class seminary for education. We infer that Miss L. E. P. SPOTTED-TAIL is not yet "engaged," for, if she were, the old tomahawker wouldn't care about sending her East.

—MR. MARBLE, editor of the World, is a good specimen of the oncoming American journalist. Nine years ago he was a subordinate on the Evening Post, and quite likely may have "dreamed of dwelling in marble halls," though probably little dreamed of managing this World or of living in a four-story brown-stone front (with marble hall). An admirer of Mr. M. pronounces him to be "much the handsomest of the prominent editors of New York; lives in ease, even in luxury; enjoys his library and his dinner; lounges and talks gracefully at the Manhattan Club; is a power in his party, and a pleasant gentleman in society, and that very rare thing—a highly successful and materially prosperous journalist—while still young and in possession of perfect health."

—HUGH HASTINGS, Esq., editor of the Albany Knickerbocker, who went abroad last summer as special bearer of dispatches to several of our foreign ministers (for which he gets pay), asserts it as a fact, that Admiral FARRAGUT was almost "smothered with kisses" by the ladies of the Court of the Queen of Sweden. Also, that the hairs of his officers are "treasured as souvenirs and laid away in gold lockets by many of the most elegant ladies of Stockholm." Mr. HASTINGS is a truthful man. Mrs. H. accompanies him. His word is to be depended upon.

—BAYARD TAYLOR has been to the Grand Chartreuse—the famous monastery in the mountains of Savoy, where the monks make that potent and seductive fluid which dinner-party people deem it en regle to drink when coffee comes in. Nice fellows, those monks—hospitable, intelligent, religious, and very glad to entertain any sensible gentleman who happens to be climbing that way.

—"Who was JUNIUS?" that question so often asked but never yet satisfactorily answered, is believed to be settled by the book published on the 6th of November in London, entitled "Memoirs and Correspondence of Sir PHILIP FRANCIS, K.C.B.," commenced by the late JOSEPH PARKES, and continued and edited by HERMAN MERIVALE." Mr. PARKES was for many years, up to his decease, a close friend and constant correspondent of Mr. THURLOW WREN, and has narrated to Mr. W. many facts that place the identity of JUNIUS beyond doubt. The work will doubtless be promptly republished here.

—WESTON, the walker, now en route from Portland to Chicago, has a rival in the pedestrian line, named SETH W. PAINE, who left town on the 11th inst., on foot, for San Francisco, having put up money that he will accomplish the tramp in less than 150 days. He will write something about it.

—GARIBOLDI told General CALISTO this: "My belief is that the bullet which kills me will be useful to Italy. I can not abandon the duty I owe to my country. I will go to Rome." Every body in America sympathizes with GARIBOLDI, and would be grieved at the announcement that the "bullet" had been forwarded; but if the old gentleman undertakes to fight more battles against long odds the globular-shaped missile will be pretty sure to perforate him.

—In the opinion of Mr. LONGFELLOW ALFRED B. STREET is, without exception, the best delineator of forest-scenery in America. Mr. STREET is a short-statured, spectacled, neat, modest-mannered gentleman, and as State Librarian, at Albany, has a position exactly adapted to his tastes and habits.

—REV. DR. BELLOW, who has been doing Germany for "the Liberal Christian," is about to do a novel. If he can fictionalize as felicitously as he sermonizes, the sooner he begins the better.

—DUMAS, père, is said to have made ten millions of francs with his pen, and spent every sou of it in having a good time. He's a sad old sauteur.

—The Bishop (LEX) of Iowa, really a very good man and a very Low Churchman, wrote a letter to the Bishop of London, warning him against the performances of the Ritualists; and that irreverent Non-Conformist organ—Punch—has versified the communication in the manner following, to wit:

HENRY W. IOWA TO A. C. LONDON.

"To my Pan-Anglican compeer"
(Writes parting I.O.W.A.),
"I owe a debt of gratitude,
Which I can ne'er repay.
As I can't pay, from I.O.W.A!
Accept this I.O.U.—
That ritual poison England's Church,
If unchecked, will undo."

—ALICE TOPP, a tip-top player on the piano, débuté at Steinway Hall on the 14th inst. with éclat. Old Baron Von Bulow gave her letters to prominent people on this side, saying, in the most emphatic language, that there are no fingers in Europe that can rattle over the key-board so rapidly as hers.

—The Bazar has the highest possible pleasure in noting among its persons that toward the building-fund of the Young Men's Christian Association John C. Green, A. T. Stewart, R. L. & A. Stuart, James Brown, Joseph Sampson, H. B. Claflin & Co., W. E. Dodge, W. E. Dodge, Jun., and Loring Andrews gave $10,000 each; and Jay Cooke & Co., E. S. Jaffray & Co., Fred. A. Lane, Stewart Brown, Horace Grey, C. C. Colgate, M. K. Jesup, J. Pierpont Morgan, James Stokes, and J. Taylor Johnston, $5000 each.

—YOUNG CHARLES DICKENS is said to be an exceedingly English young man, clever, popular, much given to boating and athletic sports. Miss DICKENS, the eldest daughter, is understood to be the author of "Aunt Margaret's Troubles," and "Mabel's Progress"—the latter now in course of publication in Harper's Weekly. DICKENS, père, in society is reserved and thoughtful even to melancholy. His voice is sweet and very clear, and its greatest charm is that it rings with his individuality. He enters into every thing he says. So that in his readings his own apparent enjoyment is quite as attractive as his marvelously dramatic delivery. When he tells a story (which is a most infrequent concession) his earnest, sympathetic manner of narration enlists every body's interest. His knowledge of human nature is wonderful, excelling even that of THACKERAY in universality of scope.

—GARIBOLDI's home is not the most enticing place we have read of. In fact, it borders on the shabby. Down to 1861 the furniture consisted of one chair without a back. Some of our U. S. officers then gave him two dozen. The old patriot sleeps on an iron bedstead; a line across his bedroom holds his clothes; no carpet on the floor; papers and books "lie around loose;" lives on fish, macaroni, and wild boar; drinks water; goes to bed at ten; gets up at three; coffee at four. Miss GARIBOLDI sings beautifully. Young men come to see her.

—VICTOR HUGO (so said) doesn't live comfortably with Mrs. HUGO; nor with the children. After going on comfortably with each other for nigh upon fifty years they have had a quarrel, broken up housekeeping, sold off the things, and are now making themselves very unhappy by living apart from each other.

—The Queen has taken to patronizing literary people since she became an author. Not long since she invited Mr. THEODORE MARTIN to make a little visit to Balmoral. He assisted the Queen in making the PRINCE CONSORT book. Mr. MARTIN's wife was Miss HELEN FACTOR, the celebrated English actress.

—The New York Times "Veteran Observer" is a sixty-year old person, named EDWARD D. MANSFIELD, a tall, thin, abstracted gentleman, who keeps a farm at Morrow, about forty miles from Cincinnati, whence he launches great moral ideas upon American citizens.

—The "Hub" folk have been giving a little dinner to LONGFELLOW on the completion of his "Dante," which he has been dinging away at for five-and-twenty years. Only about twenty were present, among whom were BRYANT, HALLECK, DUNN, HOLMES, LOWELL, EMERSON, WHITTIER, AGASSIZ, CURTIS, PARTON, and FIELDS, the latter presiding.

JEWELRY, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

A WALK through the Jewelry Courts of the French, Italian, and English Departments of the great Exposition now closing in Paris impresses many for the first time with the relative position of the style in jewelry among the various modes of personal habilliment or decoration. Ordinary reflection would doubtless credit to the artist's design or the skillful fabricant's manipulation whatever of attraction there may be in an ornament; but Fashion lends its enchantment to parures and robes alike. In justice to the rarer merit and beauty of the former, it may be added that the Goddess is more æsthetic and less capricious in her treatment than in other instances; but her sway is none the less determined, and such exceptional deference is due rather to the limited province of the object than to any default on her part. Those of us whose memory overruns a decade need but a suggestion to recall the different fancies that have obtained for a time—how coral was in great request for certain complexions; the enormous shell cameos which shared provincial popularity with Roman mosaics, equally monstrous in size and merit; the chatelaine fever, when ladies' girdles, emulous of a long antecedent age, bore a pendant and jingling armory of golden keys, scissors, bodkins, etc.; the succeeding epidemic of charms, a veritable handicap, in which the fair sex carried similarly pendant every thing imaginable as weight, from a golden elephant to an enameled harlequin; the transitory eruption of ugly malachite; and the longer and more pleasing of colored stones, topaz, amethyst, and garnet; the Etruscan revival, the Byzantine mosaic caprice, the universal rage for chain bracelets—infinity more creditable, by-the-way, than the present admiration for the stiff and ungraceful bands, of barbaric origin. Farther back than this there were fancies as free and as flighty, of which our grandmothers' jewel-cases may still retain instances: the drop ear-rings, preposterously long, of polished jet, carnelian, or gold; the neck-chains of delicate filigree, and dull yellow hue;

the necklaces of bright gold beads; the heavy fob-chains, not infrequently of silver, made in clumsy links, or of flat rectangular plates joined together by rings, balancing a carved gold seal of cyclopean size against a turnip-shaped watch; the truncated parallelograms of brooches which the ladies wore, and the lyre-shaped breast-pins, bearing colored stones in silver setting, resplendent upon the ruffled shirt-fronts of the gentlemen. Thus does retrospection justify Fashion's claim to an undivided dominion in the field of Jewelry as well as in that of Dress. Daring as the assertion may seem, this all-powerful arbiter has even asserted herself in the province of precious gems, going so far as to utter a temporary interdict against diamonds. Casuists may say that the matter was one of circumstance rather than of fashion; but fashion often subsidizes circumstance, and in this instance did so very palpably. It was in Paris in the Revolutionary era that, almost within a day's passage, the extravagant display of a court whose parasites actually were a blaze of diamonds, gave place to the rigid simplicity of a Directorate whose only insignia were mourning garments and coiffures à la victime. Those who possessed jewels scented the storm afar off, and wore them only at court. "Amidst these fierce antagonistic passions," says Madame Barrera, "taste and elegance vanished; the court parures of the ladies lost all distinctive character; the bastard style of the day was an affected mannerism, which was intended for uniform simplicity. A few rings and snuff-boxes or bonbonnières, enriched with brilliants and the singular appendmetals and the precious stones—are too rare and too costly to admit of the treatment meted out to stuffs and taffetas, and the artistic suggestions as to their composition are of entirely another order than those relating to crinoline and flounces. To illustrate the foregoing statement, not less than to suggest for our readers' benefit the prevailing styles of jewelry, we proceed to name the modes now most in favor. In the first place, and apropos of a season of the year generally distinguished by weddings, the constituents of a bridal parure most in request are pearls and diamonds. A marked change in the setting of these beautiful gems from that of former years will be hereafter described in detail; suffice it at present that they are so set that very little, if any, gold is allowed to appear, the ensemble being a rich and still exceedingly chaste display of the king and queen of jewels, unmarred by any obtrusion of metal. The brooch is generally a circlet of fine pearls inclosing a diamond, ages of two watches, one on either side, with each a huge fob-chain hanging down to the thighs, were about the only articles of jewelry worn by the beaux and the belles of the latter part of this [Louis XVI.] reign. Even this faint gleam of luxury was finally quenched in the revolutionary tempest. The few paltry trinkets worn were fashioned into shapes and bore names to suit the bloody popular mania: ear-rings represented fasces, triangles, liberty-caps, guillotines, and were made of gold of ten or twelve carats."

Singularly enough, though it is not likely that any thing less than the discovery of a mine of gems, faceted and polished to order, or that the earth's crust is in spots solid corindon, will ever again admit of Fashion's tabooing the diamond, as she did in the first days of the Directorate, our own immediate day is reproducing the prevailing style of that terrible time. The same fancy for expressing the object of interest or pleasure in trinket form is now manifest. The fasces and the guillotine of 1789 were but prototypes for our more noble conceits in 1862-3, of American flags in bright enamels, and bayonets in oxidized silver, worn as scarf-pins, or of the horse-shoe and yacht-shaped devices, more recently affected for brooches; and the present popularity of antique designs was anticipated in the French Republican era, when not only personal jewelry but likewise Senatorial costumes came at last to be modeled after Grecian and Roman designs.

We have intimated that Fashion becomes æsthetic when she deals with jewelry, and we would add that this exceptional and very remarkable deference to good taste on her part is alike creditable to both parties. As a general thing the personal ornaments which now obtain are both appropriate and handsome. The materials of which jewelry is composed—the precious metals and the precious stones—are too rare and too costly to admit of the treatment meted out to stuffs and taffetas, and the artistic suggestions as to their composition are of entirely another order than those relating to crinoline and flounces.

To illustrate the foregoing statement, not less than to suggest for our readers' benefit the prevailing styles of jewelry, we proceed to name the modes now most in favor.

vere contrast of brilliants. We give an engraving of a parure from Messrs. TIFFANY & Co., of New York, which very correctly illustrates a style of jewelry worn in select circles in Paris, and, from its perfection of workmanship and elegance of design, is suited for occasions of especially dressy character. It is made of the finest gold, bears a rich yellow tint, similar to the popular Etruscan, and is, in fact, a reproduction—or, more truthfully, an adaptation from the antique. The painting in the centre is exquisitely done in enamel and burned into the gold, for which reason the purest metal is requisite. The enamel not being polished, the effect is consequently infinitely more agreeable, and in better keeping with the setting. The figures are in flesh tint upon a cerulean back-ground, and in the brooch represent Venus rising from the sea; in the ear-rings, two Cupids playing in the waves. This style of jewelry is a legitimate result of the splendid efforts of CASTELLANI to revive the Etruscan art, but has features which commend it to modern taste that are lacking to the great Roman jeweler's work. The general shape of the design is Pompeian; but the accessories, the pendant shells and the beautifully-executed scollop-shell surmounting the pieces, with the conventional dolphins supporting the sides of the brooch, are the exquisite suggestions of the modern artist. The unusual finish of even the most minute details, and the perfect harmony of all, impart to this set of jewelry a loftier character than is generally discoverable in ornaments devoid of precious stones. It is in this way we should avail ourselves of the antique, extracting from its pure font of design the severity of proportion and contour, while a correct appreciation of subsidiary ornament and finish enlivens what might otherwise be rigid by the relieving touch of modern taste. The process of enameling in this instance is a secret with its author, M. RUET, which circumstance limits the production to a very few sets per year. The price of a set ranges from $175 to $200 in gold. In conclusion, it is but justice to term this new form of ornament the most stylish novelty of the season.

The yellow or gold color observable in these ornaments just described lends a richness of effect peculiar to the old, or Etruscan jewelry. Our readers doubtless are, or should be, aware of the different tints of which a gold surface is susceptible, but it is questionable if they appreciate the causes. Gold in the shape of jewelry is always in a greater or less degree alloyed, the purpose being to render the precious material more enduring of wear and retentive of superficial color than it would be in its virgin purity. We do not know that in either England or France, at the present time, statutory regulation directs how fine a piece of jewelry shall be; the standard, however, with all responsible jewelers, is well known to be 18 carats. Now if the alloy used in this purity of production be silver, the color is that generally seen in fine watch-cases and jewelry; if the alloy be copper, the gold has a reddish tinge, at the present quite exceptional, though a generation back it was generally obtaining. The Etruscan—sometimes termed the dead-gold—color, which is noticeable in the articles foregoing, is the result of an entire absence of alloy. Not that the precious metal used is of virgin purity, however, as are the genuine Etruscan relics from which modern art borrows or adapts; the material in the modern instances is pure simply on the surface, the ornaments being submitted to an acid bath till the surface alloy is, so to speak, sweated out, and the real teinte d'or produced. This explanation may relieve some of our readers of the mistaken apprehension that articles of Etruscan gold are artificially colored by extraneous lacquering or otherwise. The necklace and locket accompanying the set are introduced as much from their appropriateness as their popularity. The necklace is of the shape now especially in request, a chain of slightly oval plates, having a breadth of three-quarters of an inch, put together without solder, each link or plate hooking into its neighbor. The wonderful excellence of the workmanship deserves the more credit as it is the result of American skill, though a Parisian design. The locket is similar in general character to the brooch in the set. We also give illustrations of several beautiful specimens of French and English jewelry in the Paris Exposition, the work of celebrated jewelers—Froment-Meurice of Paris, and John Brogden of London. The designs for these jewels have been borrowed from Pompeii, Nineveh, Assyria, and Egypt; and from the collections at the British Museum, the Louvre, Naples, and Copenhagen.

WAITING IN THE DUSK.

Sitting alone in the twilight time—
Alas! how silent the old house seems—
Missing the voices that only chime
In waking fancies or sleeping dreams!
I sit in my mother's old arm-chair,
But where are the others? Ah where? ah where?

Where is our Willie, so grave and wise?
And where is Harry, so true and bold?
Where is Mabel with laughing eyes,
And tresses sprinkled with molten gold?
On Willie's tombstone the moss is gray,
And Harry is sleeping in Biscay Bay.

But Mabel? Mabel may come again:
Her name is still in my daily prayer;
Yet when I stand where our dead are lain,
I'd rather that it were written there.
They heard God call them, and they obeyed;
But Earth called Mabel—and Mabel strayed.

Yet while God spares it is not too late
To turn away from the Tempter's smile;
And so in the lonely house I wait,
Because I expect her all the while:
If strangers met her the day she came,
She might go back to her sin and shame.

I can see the city lie far away,
A sloping path from our house leads down;
And surely, surely, some summer day,
A fading woman will leave the town,
And climb the hill, and traverse the moor,
And enter in at my open door.

FOUND IN THE MUNIMENT CHEST.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

I WAS three-and-twenty years of age, and I had not long been articled to my father, an old-established family solicitor in the comfortable market-town of Orpingdean, Sussex, when I fell in love with Barbara Ainsleigh at our race-ball. We had a race-meeting and a race-ball at Orpingdean, and we put on our gayest aspect at that ripe meridian of the year, when the corn-fields were growing tawny under the July sunshine.

Miss Ainsleigh was the representative heiress and beauty of Orpingdean, just as my father was the representative family solicitor of that prosperous settlement. She lived with her father in a noble red-brick house of the Queen-Anne period, shut in from the high-road by tall iron gates of ponderous scroll-work, and surrounded by a garden—a real old-fashioned garden, in the Italian style, with stone terraces and marble balustrades, on which the peacocks used to strut and scream in the quiet summer evenings; and our summer evenings were uncommonly quiet in the roads and lanes about Orpingdean.

Mr. Ainsleigh was an elderly widower, and Barbara his only child. It is scarcely necessary to add that he adored her, and that her path from infancy to womanhood had been liberally strewn with those metaphorical roses which the hand of affection, when aided by the purse of wealth, can scatter before the footsteps of a household idol. We have no longer our niche for the Penates; but is there not in every home-circle a god or goddess before whom the rest bow the knee in love or fear? Miss Ainsleigh had the worship of love, and she deserved it.

I can scarcely trust myself to describe her. It is so difficult to avoid hyperbole when one writes of one's first love. I will only say that she was a noble English beauty—a dark-eyed, dark-haired Juno, with the freshness of Hebe, and the instinctive grace of Diana.

Mr. Ainsleigh had been for the last twenty years of his life a bibliomaniac; and dearly as he loved his only child, there were some who would have been at a loss to say whether his books and the binding of his books did not usurp the larger share of his divided affections. Never till I knew Barbara's father did I know how much there may be in the outside of a book. The first day I ever spent in Mr. Ainsleigh's house was a revelation for me in the art of book-binding. The beveled edges—the hand-painting sur tranche—the creamy vellum, relieved by red and gold lettering—the thick crinkly morocco, in all shades of sober russet, and glowing crimson, and orange tawny—the grolier, and Gothic, and renaissance—all that is rare and expensive in the art that was in its prime while printing was yet in its cradle. In the little world of Orpingdean it used to be said that if Mr. Ainsleigh had not been a very rich man, he would have been ruined by his bibliomania. But, alas! Orpingdean folks had the vaguest idea of what sums can be squandered on rare old books and exquisite bindings, on Virgils in Italic type, printed at Venice by Aldus Manutius—on early in-folio copies of Erasmus—on a Trésor de la langue latine—or a Maison Rustique by Robert Estienne—on a Strawberry Hill Lucan—on diamond editions by Finlin Didot. We knew that Mr. Ainsleigh's uncle had left him a handsome fortune, but we did not know that it needs the millions of a Huth or a Van de Weyer to support that expensive hobby-horse on which the book-collector prances. Lord Lytton has most truly said that one hobby is a wife, and that half a dozen hobbies are mistresses. Mr. Ainsleigh was faithful to his hobby as ever husband to the partner of his choice. But a man may find his ruin even in a wife, if she happen to be expensive and insatiable.

After the race-ball I saw a good deal of Miss Ainsleigh. My father, and his father and grandfather before him, had been received and liked by the best people in and about Orpingdean. We lived in the town, much to the disgust of my two sisters, who had been "finished" at an expensive Parisian school, and who felt a sense of intense degradation in the near neighborhood of a coal-yard and a wine-merchant. But in this old house in the High Street there were oaken wainscots and spacious rooms, a square paved hall, and a staircase with such ponderous carved balusters as are rarely seen in modern dwellings; and my father refused to exchange the house in which he had been born for the finest and whitest of those new Italian villas, whose campanile towers twinkled in the sunshine on the hills beyond Orpingdean. My sisters protested that the old house smelled of pens and ink, and marveled that any body should be so civil as to visit us in such an odious locality.

People did visit us, however, in spite of the coal-yard, which was exactly opposite our drawing-room windows; and in spite of the wine-merchant, our next-door neighbor, who seemed to make his arrangements with a foreknowledge of the days on which we were to have dinner-parties, so surely did he receive wagon-loads of ponderous cases and bumping hogsheds on that very day and at that very hour in which our guests assembled. My sisters declared that this was his scheme of vengeance against us for not visiting him. "I dare say he will contrive to drop a case off Moet and Chandon some day just as old Lady Hetherside is stepping out of that dilapidated brougham of hers," said my sister Arabella; "and then she will go about saying that she almost met her death upon our doorstep, and no one will ever dare to come and see us again."

Miss Ainsleigh came to us very often, undismayed by the griminess of the coal-yard or the bumping of casks and Champagne cases on the pavement before our neighbor's store-houses. She had been pleased to take a fancy, as it is called, to my sisters, and they were delighted with her beauty and vivacity. I counted for less than nothing in the affair; but I felt, nevertheless, that it was a very nice thing to have sisters; and there was no attraction in Orpingdean strong enough to tempt me away from our spacious, shabby, comfortable old drawing-room, when I knew that Barbara was coming to spend the evening with our girls.

She came very often during the winter, and early spring, and summer, and autumn that succeeded the race-ball, where she renewed her acquaintance with my sisters on their return from the Parisian seminary. Miss Ainsleigh had never been to school. Was she not too precious a creature to be intrusted to the care of strangers? She had been educated under her father's roof by an expensive governess, and by masters innumerable, and the process had made her a very accomplished young person, though rather superficial, according to the dictum of my sisters, who had learned Latin, and moral philosophy, and natural science, and a good many "ologies," which Miss Ainsleigh had not been troubled with.

One of the chief bonds of union between this young lady and my sisters was music. Barbara had a noble mezzo-soprano voice. My sister Arabella had a decent soprano, my sister Louisa an endurable contralto, while I had been endowed with that deep abdominal growl which may be considered either a fine bass or an insufferable nuisance, according to the taste of the listener. It was the fashion at Orpingdean to accept me as a kind of amateur Lablache, and of the execrations that may have been heaped upon me in secret I would rather not think. I was very grateful to Providence for my ability to growl when Miss Ainsleigh came to us; for I was thus enabled to partake in those exercises of the voice which constituted our musical evenings. Oh what duets, and trios, and quartettes we sang in the long winter evenings, while my father nodded behind his newspaper, and my mother nodded over her knitting! What gentle gales we blew, what merry men we uproused, what foxes we assisted in jumping over farmer's gates, what cool grass we inhabited, with what happy laughter we greeted each other's mistakes, and how like to the melody of the spheres Barbara's fresh young voice sounded in the ears of one adoring listener!

Yes, my doom was sealed. From that love at first sight with which I was stricken at the race-ball I might possibly have recovered. Is it not a faculty of youth to be stricken with such sudden fevers, and to recover from them, to lay down its votive wreath at the feet of one divinity to-day, and to pick up the poor frail blossoms, not so very much the worse for wear, and carry them to another shrine to-morrow? This boyish fancy for a beaming smile, and dark tresses, crowned with flowers, might have been fleeting as other fancies; but from the love that grew upon me in the quiet progress of our family intercourse there was no such thing as recovery. We had a garden behind the old house in the High Street, a long grass-plot, very excellent for croquet, and a hazel-walk which seemed to have been made for lovers. We heard the bumping of the casks and cases in a long covered yard next door, and on warm summer evenings a faint odor of port or sherry was wont to pervade the atmosphere. But we played croquet indefatigably, nevertheless, in the summer afternoons and evenings, nor did Miss Ainsleigh scorn to join us in that delightful sport once, and sometimes twice a week all through the croquet season, which, as I take it, extends from the first tolerably fine day in March to the last dry afternoon in October. We walked in the hazel-walk sometimes, Barbara and I, while my sisters and Mr. Dodderly, one of our curates, or Mr. Midvale, his brother in the Church, prepared the croquet-ground, or collected the balls and mallets when the sport was over. The faint stars used to twinkle sometimes in the summer sky above the hazel-trees, and it seemed to me altogether very sweet and very poetical, despite the casks and cases bumping and rolling close at hand, and the odor of fine crusted port that mingled with the perfume of our roses and clematis.

Nothing could have been more trivial and commonplace than our conversation on these occasions. It seemed as if we were trivial and commonplace by choice, for whenever we touched perchance upon any serious subject—our hopes, our dreams, the things we loved, the plans we had formed for the future—we both shrank from the topic as if affrighted, and hastened with nervous precipitancy to return to some frivolous discussion about our last discovery in the science of croquet, the new glee we were learning, the curate's sermon of the previous Sunday, or the popular volume of travels or poems lately received from the book-club.

We loved each other. Barbara must have been the dullest among women if she had failed to discover how fondly she was adored, and, without being a coxcomb, I could not choose but assure myself, with unutterable delight, that I was something more than an ordinary acquaintance in the eyes of Miss Ainsleigh. And so summer and autumn went by, and no week passed in which Barbara and I did not meet—sometimes at my father's house, sometimes at our quiet little Orpingdean dinner and tea parties; sometimes at the old Queen-Anne mansion outside the town, where Mr. Ainsleigh received us whenever we liked to visit him, and where there was a croquet-lawn that had once been a Dutch bowling-green. Barbara's father was very well pleased that his darling should have found pleasant friends in the immediate neighborhood, with whom she could beguile the weariness of a country life. He paid us a ceremonial visit one morning in company with his daughter, and expressed to my mother and sisters his satisfaction upon the subject in a gallant and stately speech. After this he invited our household to a ceremonial dinner, at which we met some of the county magnates, such a dinner as Mr. Ainsleigh only gave about twice a year. He was a man who took very little pleasure in what is called society. The books which lined the walls of every room he lived in were his friends and companions. He existed for them, and he loved them with a complete affection that left no room in his mind for any frivolous attachments. He regarded his daughter with extreme tenderness, and he indulged her every wish with unquestioning alacrity; but whether this beautiful, beaming creature, with the dark air and blooming cheeks, was quite as dear to him as his Boccaccio on large paper, or his original edition of Urquhart's Rabelais, is a question I should scarcely like to decide. He loved her, and he allowed her to do exactly as she liked. I have sometimes thought that he might have been a little less indulgent to this charming daughter if his library had not held the first place in his esteem.

And in all these pleasant meetings, in our croquet-parties and musical evenings, our blowing of gentle gales, and uprousing of merry men, how did the future appear to me, Frederick Wilmot, only son and heir to Andrew Wilmot, solicitor, of High Street, Orpingdean? Could I for a moment consider myself a fitting pretender to the hand of Barbara Ainsleigh, beauty and heiress, future possessor of the grand old red-brick mansion, and of the wide-spreading lands appertaining thereto, to say nothing of that funded estate which Mr. Ainsleigh was said to have inherited from his uncle and adopted father, Lucas Ainsleigh? Alas, I was fain to confess that my hopes were of the faintest order.

I knew that my father had begun life with an ample fortune, and that he must have added considerably to that fortune during the many years of a prosperous professional career. I knew that he would admit me into partnership whenever I proved myself worthy of that honor. But what of that? Was it to be supposed that Mr. Ainsleigh would submit to see his daughter the wife of a solicitor in a country town? Would I submit to such a sacrifice were I the father of such a daughter? I asked myself that question, and replied boldly in the negative. And then I ordered my young hopes—those fair children of the mind—off to execution, and felt myself another Brutus.

Yes; in the future loomed the black shadow of despair. I knew this, and yet was happy. It is so difficult to be unhappy when one is three-and-twenty years of age, and in almost daily companionship with the dear girl one loves. My Barbara's image filled my mind by day and night; but I worked at my dry-as-dust labors in the office with a plodding industry that delighted my business-like father. Ah, those simple, middle-aged people! how little they know of the dramas that are being enacted under their very noses! Oh how Barbara's bright image danced between the lines of leases and covenants, deeds of assignment and bills of sale! and how her sweet face peered out at me from the elaborate curves and flourishes of initial letters, like saint or siren in medieval manuscript!

Well, it was a sweet dream while it lasted. I was awakened by a crash, terrific as the cannonade that roared without the walls of Brescia when Gaston de Foix mounted barefoot to the breach, or as the simultaneous tumbling of fire-irons that sometimes startled my father from his after-dinner nap.

Christmas was close at hand, and I was looking forward to several parties at which Barbara and I were to meet. The shadow looming in the remote future seemed more than usually remote at this period. My sisters made merry with me on the subject of my devotion to Miss Ainsleigh; for it is the property of sisters to be disagreeably acute upon these occasions. I endured their badinage with good-humor; for though they asked me if it was likely that a country-town solicitor could aspire to the hand of a beauty and heiress, their tone seemed to me to imply that they did not think my case utterly hopeless, and I took comfort from their idle discourse.

Miss Ainsleigh made her appearance unexpectedly at our nine-o'clock tea one evening in December, when my father and mother were engaged at an old-fashioned dinner and whist party. My sisters were chattering by the fire, and I was sitting apart pretending to read, and thinking of Barbara, when I heard a carriage stop in the street below. I hurried to the window, scarcely daring to hope that I should see Miss Ainsleigh's smart little brougham.

I did see that admired vehicle, and three minutes afterward Barbara was in the room, shawled and furred, and looking unusually pale in the light of our wax-candles. My father cherished an antipathy to gas, which I have since learned to respect.

"Why, Barbara, this is quite a delightful surprise!" cried my sister Louisa. "Come to my room, dear, and take off your things. Of course you have sent the brougham back?"

"No, dear," Miss Ainsleigh faltered, in tones very different from those we had been used to hear from her lips. "I can't stay long to-night. Papa has a friend with him. See, I have come out in my dinner-dress. I made an excuse for leaving papa and his friend to take coffee alone; and no one but Emms and Phillis Trotter know that I have come out. I—I only came to say a few words to you, Louisa, about something that has happened—at home."

She seemed on the point of bursting into tears, and her grief smote me to the quick. I was hastening to console the object of my adoration when Louisa hustled her out of the room, and Arabella followed, both girls pleased with the excitement of the situation, and utterly indifferent to my agonies. For half an hour I paced the drawing-room in anguish unspeakable; but at the end of that time the three girls returned; and Louisa, who was not such a very obnoxious creature, as sisters go, told me that she had obtained Miss Ainsleigh's permission to tell me the trouble that oppressed her.

"You ought to know almost as much about the law as papa by this time," said Louisa; "and you can most likely explain poor Barbara's position."

"It is not myself I think of," exclaimed Barbara, half crying. "Poverty would not seem so hard to me; but papa—he is so refined; his tastes are so expensive, a sudden reverse would kill him. And he will lose all—even his books, perhaps—if that dreadful paper is what it seems to be."

"Sudden reverse! dreadful paper!" I implored the young lady to be more coherent.

"I—I have found a will of my great-uncle Lucas Ainsleigh's, that makes papa a pauper," she said; and thereupon produced a yellow-looking document, on a couple of sheets of Bath post.

I was well acquainted with the circumstances of Miss Ainsleigh's family. William Ainsleigh, her father, had inherited the estate, which was not entailed, from his uncle, by virtue of a will, dated some years before that gentleman's death, and immediately after his quarrel with his only child, a daughter, who had married a certain James Dashwood, a landscape-painter of some talent, but of no position, against her father's wish. The young lady and her husband disappeared almost immediately after the marriage. It was supposed they had gone to America, where the painter had friends. Lucas Ainsleigh felt the blow keenly, but preserved an obstinate silence upon the subject of his grief. He publicly announced his intention to leave all he possessed to his eldest nephew, William Ainsleigh; and he executed a will to that effect, which document was drawn up by my father, and remained in his possession till Lucas Ainsleigh's death.

The will Barbara showed me was dated a week before the testator's death, the date of which event I perfectly remembered. It was witnessed by a certain Rachel Coles and Andrew Hardwick, both of which names were strange to me. The will seemed a good one. The body and signature were in the same hand. It left the bulk of the testator's fortune to Margaret Dashwood, late Ainsleigh—at that time supposed to be living somewhere in the United States—most probably New York; and to Barbara's father only five hundred a year from funded property.

The testator entreated his nephew to pardon this sudden change of resolution. He felt the hour of death approaching; and as that hour drew nearer his stubborn heart softened more and more to his poor child, and he felt himself bound to make her all possible reparation for his unkindness.

This was the tenor of the document. I read it hurriedly at first, in my excitement, and then carefully, but I could see no legal flaw.

"Where did you find this, Miss Ainsleigh?"

In a chest of old manuscripts, in the room where my great-uncle died," replied Barbara. "He was a collector of curious books and manuscripts, like papa, you know; indeed, it was from him papa learned the taste for these things. It was only this evening I found that dreadful paper. Mr. Lostenwich dined with papa, and after dinner they began to talk about curious manuscripts; and papa said he had a muniment chest filled with very rare papers that he had not even looked at, and among them he believed there was a manuscript treatise by Roger Bacon. Mr. Lostenwich said he would like, of all things, to see such a manuscript. Papa was anxious to show it to him; but he has not been very well lately, and, as I knew the search would involve some fatigue, I begged him to let me hunt for the treatise. He consented, after some little discussion, and then gave me a minute description of the manuscript and the chest it was to be found in. I took Phillis Trotter, my dear, good little maid, to the room with me, and between us we dragged the munificent chest from the cupboard where it had been kept for ages, as we could tell by the thickness of the dust upon the lid. I found the key upon a bunch papa had given me; and after some little trouble succeeded in opening the chest and began my search. Phillis held the candle for me while I knelt down to examine the manuscripts."

"Does Phillis know of this?" I asked, pointing to the will, which lay open before me, and from which I could not entirely withdraw my consideration even while listening to Miss Ainsleigh.

"Yes, Phillis knows. In my first surprise and horror I betrayed every thing. But she is the best of good creatures, and will not breathe a word of this business without my permission. I looked over a great many papers, and threw them back into the chest, but I could see no vestige of Roger Bacon's treatise, with its long Latin name. I was just about abandoning my search in despair when I saw the indorsement—I think you legal people call it indorsement—of that paper. My uncle's name and the words 'last will and testament' excited my curiosity. I opened the paper, and was in the act of reading it, when the door was opened, and an exclamation from Phillis told me of my father's coming. He had been alarmed by my long absence, and had left his friend to come in search of me. I threw the will back into the chest, and answered papa's questions as calmly as I could. I assured him that there was no manuscript of Roger Bacon's to be found in the chest, and persuaded him to return to his guest, and to apologize for my non-appearance. I had recourse to the favorite feminine excuse, a headache, and after sending papa back to the dining-room, I dispatched Phillis to order the brougham, for my first impulse was to come to you with this dreadful paper. And oh, Mr. Wilnot, does this will really mean any thing, and will it reduce papa to poverty, for I fear he has squandered a great deal of money on his books, and has considerably impoverished the estate; and he will have to give all back, will he not, if that paper is binding?"

How could I answer her when she looked at me with such a terror-stricken face, alarmed not for herself—I doubt if she was even conscious that her own interests were at stake—but for the father she loved so fondly!

I was obliged to tell her that to the best of my belief the will was a good one.

"Then I must give it to papa," she answered, sadly. "It would be wicked to keep it hidden for a single day, now that I know the duty it imposes on us. And papa must give up the Hall, and begin life afresh—I am sure he will make the sacrifice bravely, but I fear it will cost him a broken heart. He loves the old Hall so dearly."

And then she began to think of the people interested in the newly-discovered will.

"I wonder where my poor cousin is to be found?" she said; "it is nearly twenty years since my uncle died, and it was years before his death that she married Mr. Dashwood and went to America. She never was known to write to any of her relations after leaving England. I have heard papa say that he tried to find her out, in order to help her, after the property became his; but he never succeeded in obtaining any tidings of her. And now all belongs to her, and she will come back to turn my poor father out of his home, and will never know how kindly he thought of her."

I asked Miss Ainsleigh if she would intrust the will to my keeping until the following morning. She gave me the sweetest and most confiding of smiles as she put the document into my hands.

"Do exactly what seems best to yourself," she said; "I am sure you will only do what is right and honorable. If you find that the will is really valid, please come to the Hall to-morrow morning, and we will tell papa all about it—between us."

And thus we parted; I conducted her to her pretty little carriage, and held her dear hand in mine just a little longer than usual as I bade her good-night.

"If you should ever come to be poor, Barbara," I said, "you will at least know how dearly you are beloved."

This I could not resist saying. For the first time in my life I had called her Barbara. I felt myself blushing in the darkness; but she did not reprove me.

I lit the reading-lamp on my father's office-table, and lay in wait for his return. He came at half past ten, elated by a final "double, treble, and the rub." I sent my mother up to the drawing-room, where the girls were too full of Barbara's troubles to care about hearing the menu of the friendly dinner, and I marched my father into the office, where we sat down side by side and examined the last will and testament of Lucas Ainsleigh.

My father thought as I did. He remembered the names of the two witnesses—both had been old servants of the testator's, and both were dead.

"If they had not been exceptionally stupid they would have taken some means to further the carrying out of the old master's wishes," said my father. "But it is just possible, by-the-way, that Lucas Ainsleigh did not tell them the nature of the document they attested. Some men are so fatally, fatally cautious."

The result of our conversation was my appearance at the Hall early next morning, with the fatal document in my pocket. Barbara came out of her pretty morning-room as the servant admitted me. We stopped on the threshold of Mr. Ainsleigh's study, whispering together for a few minutes before we went in, and it happened somehow that Barbara's hand remained in mine while we whispered. I loved her so dearly, I was so sorry for her sorrow, I was so glad to think that her poverty would bring her nearer to me; there was, in short, such a conflict of emotion raging in my breast, that I may be surely forgiven if, in this tremendous crisis, I forgot to release Miss Ainsleigh's hand.

We went into the study, where the perfume of Russia leather was almost oppressive, and told our story between us, Barbara kneeling by her father's chair, and caressing the thin white hand that hung listless by his side while we broke the intelligence to him. I never saw any one more weak and helpless than Mr. Ainsleigh proved himself on this occasion. He seemed almost stunned by the blow.

"I am afraid I have impoverished the estate, Frederick," he said. "You see the fancies of a book-worm are expensive; and thinking myself a rich man I have been somewhat reckless. I should scarcely like to tell you the money I gave for my Decameron. And it was I who bought the Shakespeare—you may remember, perhaps—that was sold at Willis and Sotherton's three years ago. It is true that at the worst I could sell my books, but it would be hard to part with them. Marcus Aurelius sold all his possessions for the benefit of the state, during that period in which the Germanic war and the pestilence at Rome combined to impoverish the treasury; but he got a good deal of the property back again, and we do not hear of rare manuscripts among the treasures he resigned. And I do not pretend to the nobility of mind displayed by that generous Antonine!"

The bibliomaniac looked round at the grand old folios with a dismal sigh.

"We need not talk about selling your library yet, Sir," I said, cheerily. "My father and I are agreed that the will is a good one, but we have yet to discover whether there is any one alive to claim under it."

This was a new view of the subject, but it did not inspire much hope in the minds of Barbara and her father.

"My cousin was my junior by some years," said Mr. Ainsleigh; "she married early, and is likely to have left a large family—even supposing her to be no longer living."

"The law has only to deal with facts, you see, Sir," I answered, with unabated cheerfulness. "It was, indeed, very easy for me to assume this lively and consoling tone; for my heart was dancing with joy. I knew that Barbara loved me. A very few hours of family trouble seemed to have made us more intimate than a year and a half of croquet-parties and 'gentle gales.'"

After some little discussion it was agreed that an advertisement should be drawn up by my father, requesting Margaret Dashwood, or her heirs, executors, and assigns, to communicate with him immediately, personally or by letter; and further offering to reward any person who should produce evidence of the lady's decease.

"I don't think that will be of much use," Mr. Ainsleigh said. "If Mrs. Dashwood had come back to England she would surely have come to this place, where she was born and brought up."

"We can not be quite sure of that," I replied. "The lady may have returned under circumstances of extreme poverty, and may have been too proud to exhibit her altered status in this place."

"True, true," sighed Mr. Ainsleigh.

"If there should be no response to that advertisement after it has been inserted a dozen times, on alternate days, we may fairly conclude that neither Mrs. Dashwood nor her heirs are to be found in this country; and I will, with your permission, start immediately for America, with a view to finding them, or sufficient evidence of their decease."

"You will go to America?" cried Barbara and her father simultaneously.

They both looked at me as the friends of Theus may have looked at him when he announced his intention of tackling the Minotaur; but I answered their looks of wonder with a smile.

"Crossing the Atlantic is a very small business nowadays," I said, "thanks to Cunard. I shall start before the end of January; and in the mean time all you have to do is to make yourself comfortable and wait the issue of events. Things may not be so bad as you think, Sir."

I felt a courage that was almost desperation as I watched Barbara kneeling by her father's side, and comforting him with tender looks and sweet little half-whispered words and the light caressing touch of her fair hands. Ah, what could not a man achieve for such a woman as that! I felt myself equal to support not only a wife but a father-in-law. Yes, and to find money for Willis and Sotherton into the bargain.

Before I left the Hall that day Barbara and I were solemnly pledged to each other. A detestable man-servant came in with a coal-scuttle just as my sweet girl was melted into tears by the fervor of my devotion. And oh, in what a leisurely manner the wretch renewed the fire, and how we stood, self-conscious as unconvicted felons, while he trifled with the poker, and showed himself neat to punctiliousness in his arrangement of the shovel and tongs!

"And do you really mean to say that you are not afraid of my poverty?" asked Barbara, when the execrable creature had gone.

"I mean to say that I was very much afraid of your wealth," I replied. "I should never have dared to ask the heiress of Ainsleigh Hall to be my wife. It is only the prospect of a change in your circumstances that gives me courage."

I doubt if my life can give me a happier Christmas than that which followed my interview with Barbara. My father's advertisement appeared three times a week in the second column of the Times Supplement; but there was no response worthy even of investigation. Mr. Ainsleigh waited the result with suppressed anxiety; while Barbara and I did our best to support his spirits and to restrain our own. He received my offer for his daughter's hand with resignation—as if it had been the last stroke inflicted by the Nemesis of his house.

"I will not deny that I had hoped a more brilliant destiny for her," he murmured. "She is now but a pauper's daughter, and can not be too grateful for your disinterested affection."

I left Liverpool on the 17th of January, and my business upon the other side occupied the greater part of a year. With infinite labor I hunted out the history of Margaret Dashwood and her husband, together with the history of the two children who had been born to them, both of whom had died unmarried—one an infant, the other a soldier in the late Civil War. Death had settled all claims that might have been asserted under the will found in the munificent chest. I went back to England late in the autumn, carrying with me ample evidence of the decease of Mrs. Dashwood and her heirs. She died without a will, and on her death the property would have lapsed naturally to her father's eldest nephew.

Barbara and I are to be married early in the spring. I nobly offered to release her from her engagement; she, in a spirit as noble, refused to be released. Her father is resigned, and even happy. There is another Decameron to be sold at Willis and Sotherton's in the coming spring, of an older and rarer edition than the large-paper copy he has cherished so fondly hitherto; and whether he looks forward with most anxiety to the loss of his daughter or the acquisition of the Decameron is an enigma I shall not attempt to solve.

We are to live at the old Hall, whence I am to trudge to and fro to the office daily. The little preliminary discussions of affairs between my father and Mr. Ainsleigh have revealed the fact that the latter gentlemen have contrived to muddle away a great deal of money, and is by no means a rich man. If Mrs. Dashwood or her heirs had been alive to claim the estate his position would have been a very miserable one.

The good people of Orpingdean, however, believe that I am going to marry a great heiress, and no doubt have a great deal to say among themselves on the subject of my good fortune.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Tuesday Eve.—"What a dismal place this is!" I said to myself this morning, as I entered Dr. July's reception-room. Went to consult him about Johnny's sore throat. Some half a dozen were waiting to see him. Room dark, not a book or newspaper to be seen, walls bare—absolutely nothing to occupy one's time, excepting an illegible medical certificate, and an old map of Mexico, which hung over the mantle. And doctors' reception-rooms are about alike, so far as my experience in this city goes. No matter how lucrative their practice is, all who go to consult them await their turn in an unattractive room. Have not visited every physician, so there may be exceptions. Had occasion, when in Boston a short time ago, to call on a well-known oculist of that city. Was delighted with his rooms—bright, cheerful, tastefully furnished; books of engravings on the tables, paintings and pictures on the walls, and numerous little curiosities and ornaments well worth examination, invited attention. As for myself, I found such entertainment in an elegant copy of Doré's "Munchausen," that I was quite sorry when my time of waiting was over. Wish physicians generally would follow such a good example.

The English papers speak of Miss Kate Bateman's success in "Leah" in the most extravagant terms of praise. To-day Mr. N— gave me a copy of a note from Dr. Mosenthal, the author of Leah, to Miss Bateman. Some of the quaint expressions—but here it is entire:

"MY DEAREST MISS BATEMAN,—Just now finding in the newspapers the notice 'Miss Bateman as Leah,' in Liverpool, I send you the author's best welcome, and I hope you will kindly receive it among the enthusiasm of your audience. Remember now, dearest child of Leah's father, remember the Italian sister, Pietra, translated with mastery by M. Oxenford. The poor lady a prisoner in her adopted father's writing-table, waited for your return and hopes from you her deliverance. Don't forget her! I believe that your name united to mine had chances enough in England to risk a second time! Dear Miss, God bless you and help you to understand my English."

"Yours, most obediently,
"DR. MOSENTHAL."

Newspapers appear to be pun-ishing our new Russian possessions by invidious remarks. Have gleaned from various sources the following items, which, on the whole, make up a very fair description:

"The remoteness of Russian America makes it a fur country."

"Its northern latitude makes it an ice-o-lated country."

"Its perpetual snow and lack of vegetation make it a white bear country; but a good bearing country for all that."

"Its fisheries will set many people to cod-gitating."

"Ladies, if you visit that country, be sure and take along your umbrellas—to protect you from the rain, dears."

Every little while I see in print a veracious account of "the oldest person known in the United States." Sometimes this versatile "person" is a man, sometimes a woman, now white, and then colored. The latest sketch of this kind—and certainly it bears the aspect of truth—is of a colored woman, Mrs. Flora Stuart, of Londonderry, New Hampshire. She was born in Boston, in 1750, and was a slave until slavery fell into disrepute in New England. A short time ago she went to Manchester, and had photographs of herself taken, and was very much surprised at the process.

Wednesday.—"Mr. Typeset," said I, this morning, as my husband, in a state of semi-somnambulism, made his appearance when breakfast was half over, "I've been reading the newspapers this morning since you were not here. It was only to keep up the practice on your behalf; but I have found some valuable items. Listen!" And I read from the newspaper, which, after Mr. T.'s own peculiar fashion, was negligently reclining against the handle of the sugar-bowl and the nose of the sirup-pitcher: "Alarm-clocks have been made that, besides rousing the sleeper, will ignite a match and light a candle for him to get up by, and also boil a cup of coffee for the early riser's breakfast. The wonderful couch which tilted its occupant out upon the floor at any desired hour was effectual, no doubt; but perhaps the prettiest and most agreeable of these contrivances was the bed made by a Bohemian mechanic in 1863, which set off with one of Auber's gentle airs when it was pressed by a tired body, and thundered forth a clashing march at the time the sleeper desired to be awakened."

"But, my dear," began Mr. Typeset, in a tone of voice which not only indicated that he was still half asleep but also convicted me of gross negligence.

I poured a cup of coffee for him immediately. Naturally I should have apologized, any properly-trained wife ought to have done so. But "woman's rights" flashed through my mind; and by the time I had recalled six instances at breakfast and dinner yesterday, when Mr. T., barricaded by newspapers, was utterly oblivious to every thing else, I—well—I thought it would seem awkward to apologize and turned again to my newspaper.

"There is a man in Baltimore who has just completed an extraordinary clock, a wonder of the age. It runs eight days. It wakes up the entire household, having a special alarm to rouse the master of the house. It lights the gas and kindles a fire in the stove. I am not sure," continued I, running my eye along the paragraph, "but that it gets the breakfast."

"But I don't want an alarm-clock," said Mr. Typeset, whose feelings were softening under the influence of his coffee and muffins. "Nothing could be more delicious than this coffee, and I'm sure the making of it is under your special charge." (How I repented not having made an apology!) "And as to waking me up, you could get no alarm more effectual than the small child you send every morning for that purpose. She is both persistent and ingenious. 'Papa,' said she this morning, rushing into the room—'Papa, it is time to get up!' Of course I knew it was, but I was sleepy and didn't stir. 'You won't have any breakfast if you don't get up,' she continued. Upon that I opened one eye, but it closed up immediately. Then I heard her say, in an under-tone, 'I'll make him cold!' One grand tug at the blankets—well, in short, I had to get up! But will you continue the exercises of this morning by reading something more to me? There is nothing I enjoy so much as listening to you—when all the newspapers are quite out of my reach."

At this gentle hint my eye fell on a couple of the morning journals, which lay, still unfolded, near my own plate. Of course I politely passed them over to Mr. Typeset. The next moment a paragraph in the newspaper before me caught my attention. So apropos was it that I could not forbear reading aloud:

"The entrance to a woman's heart is through her eye or ear; but a philosopher has said the way to a man's heart is down his throat."

"Did you speak, my dear?" asked Mr. T., looking up. He was already buried in politics.

Friday Eve.—The poor sewing-girls! Some of them, who have fallen into the clutches of the hard-hearted and grasping, are to be pitied. They are expected to be honest, faithful, prompt, and perfect in their work for a mere pittance. Read in the papers this morning of a poor girl in this city, who engaged to make pantaloons for a tailor at the rate of sixteen cents a pair. After she had made a few pairs she asked for her money, when her employer pretended he had discovered a defect in the work, refused to pay, and finally drove the girl from the house. On investigation, it was found the man was paid fifty-six cents for making each pair, so that he realized a profit of forty cents clear from every pair of pantaloons made by the girls in his employ. Under the threat of instant imprisonment, he paid the sewing-girl her due.

This reminds me of an advertisement I lately saw in an English paper:

"SERVANT-OF-ALL-WORK WANTED for a Widow Lady and her Daughter, in a small cottage 13 miles from London. She must be honest, truthful, active, civil, clean, and an early riser. Wages £3 a year. Address, stating name and address of last mistress, Miss B—, C—, Surrey."

Honesty, truth, activity, civility, cleanliness, and early-rising, all expected for about fifteen dollars a year!

Am quite amazed at some facts (?) I have just seen stated. Never exactly realized before that our mother Eve was such a giantess as a certain learned French investigator, with perfect satisfaction to himself, proves her to have been. He gives a table of the relative height of several eminent personages; and declares that "Adam was precisely 123 feet 9 inches high. Eve was precisely 118 feet 9.75 inches high. Noah was precisely 103 feet high. Abraham was precisely 27 feet high." But Julius Caesar was only "precisely 5 feet high!" What a fall was that! But there's nothing like having these historical matters properly investigated!

An English journal records a most "remarkable instance of attenuation." It appears that a lady of prepossessing exterior has for some months been observed gradually dwindling away to nothing. The rapidity of her wasting away may be realized when it is stated that only a year ago she was absolutely an obstruction on the pavements and at shop-windows, while now her superficial area scarcely exceeds that of an ordinary parish-pump. The painful sight of the poor creature's skirts clinging to her ankles, round which she seems to wrap them closely as though for warmth, excites compassion. Strange to say, however, she still presents the same pleasant countenance as formerly, and beneath the smallest of bonnets smiles cheerily as of old. No hopes are at present entertained of this unfortunate lady's recovery.

This is good advice, and worth making a note of: "Let all troublesome topics be avoided at meals. Do not dwell upon the difficulties of business, the delinquencies of domestics, or discipline the children at the dinner-table, for a cheerful spirit not only gives relish for food, but a good start at digesting the same."

A novel and pretty mode of introducing perfume after a dinner à la Russe, is thus described: "After the table-cloth slips were removed a servant on each side of the table came with a tiny silver watering-pot and sprinkled the whole length of it with rose-water. The rose of these miniature watering-pots was so fine that the table-cloth did not become the least damp to the touch, but an agreeable perfume was almost insensibly diffused."

Saturday Eve.—Shall I try this recipe? Cut it from an evening paper: "Potatoes boiled and mashed hot are good in short-cakes and puddings; they save flour and shortening." I don't pretend to be a "first-class cook," as the applicants for places say they are; but am inclined to think that by following that recipe not only flour and shortening, but also short-cakes and puddings would be saved in my house. However, there's nothing like experimenting. Bridget may try it some day when we all dine out!

Design for Pillow.

THE design for this pillow is traced on black velvet, and worked in satin over-and-knot stitch, with crocheted silk. The colors of the corn-poppies, pansies, starwort, and ears are naturally like those of the originals, the different shades of which can be discerned from the illustration. If it is desired to have the leaves and flowers raised, silk should be laid under. We advise inexperienced embroiderers to use a frame.

Crochet Work-bag.

MATERIALS, split zephyr (of the colors given in embroidery pattern, page 93), gold thread, silk tassels, green silk, and narrow green ribbon.

This tasteful bag is in the Turkish fashion, and consists of four long strips, triangular at the bottom, which are worked in single crochet stitch, with split zephyr and gold thread, and sewed together on the wrong side. The bag is lined with green silk, and ornamented on the ends with tassels. A crochet lace of black worsted and gold thread covers the seams, and trims the top and middle. The ribbon is run in the top.

Bamboo Basket.

MATERIALS, 1 lackered split bamboo, $\frac{1}{2}$ inch wide and $1\frac{1}{2}$ yds. long; 8 very narrow bamboos, also lackered, 8 inches long; fine white cord, blue silk, blue ribbon, and $\frac{3}{4}$ yard blue silk cord.

This beautiful little basket is made of bamboo, bent in the requisite shape, and wound round with cord, the top being made of blue silk, with silk cord strings. The body of the basket is five inches in diameter, and seven inches in height. The bottom is made of the small, and the sides and handles of the large bamboo. The illustration on page 93 shows the process of manufacture. The bag is made of silk, seven inches wide and fifteen inches long, hemmed at the top and bottom, and basted inside on the bottom of the basket.

Cigar Receiver.

THIS unique and ingenious article is cheaply and easily made. A large scallop shell forms the receptacle for the cigar ashes, supported by crab's claws on either side. The pedestal is formed of a block of varnished wood, three inches in diameter and half an inch thick. A thick ratan, three inches long, is inserted into a hole in the middle of this block, and serves to support the shell. A bunch of long, small green feathers, simulating reeds, is tied around the bottom of the ratan. The meat is then taken out of two boiled crabs, and the shells are fastened together with gum arabic; they are next coated with a mixture of cinnabar and copal varnish, and are fastened on the outside of the cigar receiver with gum arabic, being secured to the pedestal with a tack. Lastly, the dried head of a pike is fastened on with gum arabic and two tacks. The open gills of the fish serve to hold the matches, which are struck on a small rough shell, which is also secured by a tack. The illustration shows the appearance of the cigar receiver when completed.

Opera Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—Gored under-skirt and low corsage of white satin, tunic of white poul-de-soie with satin stripes, bordered with a broad bias satin fold. Under-skirt trimmed with fourteen satin rouleaux. The tunic reaches to the shoulder and forms a corsage behind. Empire coiffure, profusely ornamented with foliage. Necklace and ear-rings of brilliants. White kid gloves, white fan, and point lace handkerchief.

Fig. 2.—Pearl-colored dress, with satin overskirt, trimmed round the bottom with a pleated tulle flounce, with a band of Solferino satin between each pleat. Over-skirt of the same satin, trimmed with a narrower flounce. Marie Antoinette fichu, with short lappets falling on each side. Coiffure composed of a Louis XV. cap, formed of a shell of tulle, in which are set flat shells of satin and velvet, with crystal grelots. Pearl necklace and ear-rings. Hair rolled back from the front, and falling forward from behind the ears in long crêped locks.

Fig. 3.—Blue dress of poul-de-soie. Waist covered with a corsage of puffed tulle. Coiffure similar to that of Fig. 2, composed of roses, spangled with gold, and satin shells. White cashmere opera-cloak, trimmed round the bottom and on the sleeves with satin point. Chignon rolled loosely, with long crêped locks falling forward from behind.

Fig. 4.—Young girl. Tulle dress, puffed all the way down from the corsage. Pink underskirt of taffetas, trimmed round the bottom with bias folds of pink satin, on which are scattered a few sprays of leaves, to match those of the coiffure. Under-waist and sash of pink taffetas. Coiffure similar to the last, of pink roses and leaves, and satin shells. Short Eugénie curls over the forehead. Narrow pink ribbon tied loosely round the neck.

Children's Costumes.

tabs, bordered with a bias fold covered with swan's-down. Russian toquet of white royal velvet, trimmed with blue velvet. Cashmere half-boots, edged with swan's-down. Swan's-down belt. Kid gloves to match the dress.

Fig. 2.—Breton costume for young girl from 10 to 14 years old. Dress of white cashmere, with lapels embroidered, in colors, and silver buttons, overlapping each other. Chemisette of cashmere, with broad box pleats. Lapels embroidered in colors, four inches in length, fall from the shoulder on front and back over the pleats. The hem up the front, wristband, and shoulder piece are likewise embroidered. Paletot like the dress. Metternich hat of white felt, trimmed with a velvet band. Long braids of hair falling on the shoulders. High boots, of the same color as the dress, with gloves to match.

Fig. 3.—Negligée dress for little girl from 7 to 8 years old. Chinese blouse of light Bismarck Russian cloth, with lapels of dark Bismarck. Under-skirt of Russian cloth, of a darker shade. Siamese hat of felt, trimmed with velvet. High boots to match the dress, with gloves of the same color.

Fig. 4.—Albanian costume for a little boy from 4 to 6 years old. Skirt of poplin, with alternate pleats of gray and black. Jacket to match, embroidered with braid, with flowing sleeves and under-sleeves of the same material, trimmed with braid and buttons. Cravat of black ribbon. Oriental sash of green silk. Nansook shirt front. Cashmere toquet, with band of black velvet. Gaiters of gray cloth, to match the shade of the dress, and trimmed with braid.

Fig. 5.—Dress for little boy from 8 to 10 years old. Jacket with rolling collar. Vest and trousers of black velvet, with Milanese buttons. Cravat of China foulard. Patent leather boots. English velvet cap. Black kid gloves.

KITTY AND THE CLOCK.

"ONE day my black-and-white Kitty got tired of playing," said Aunt Mary to Alice.

"Did she?" said Alice.

"Yes; and what do you suppose she did then?"

Alice shook her head slowly. "I don't know. What was it?"

"I will tell you. She went into the dining-room, and looked all around to see if there was any thing there to amuse her. Just over the table was the clock—the same clock that is there now. Somebody had left the door of the clock open a little way. Kitty heard the clock saying, 'Tick, tick,' and she pricked up her ears and looked around to see what was making that little noise. She knew it was somewhere over the table. So she sprang up with all her might, caught hold of the edge of the table, and climbed up. Then she looked up, and through the door, which was open a little way, she saw something moving to and fro—Aunt Mary moved her hand forward and backward to imitate the motion of a pendulum—"and saying, 'Tick, tick—tick, tick.' 'Oh!' thought Kitty, 'there is a mouse; I will catch it.' So she gently put up her paw, and pushed the door of the clock further open. Then she could see the pendulum better."

"What a funny looking mouse!" said Kitty to herself; "but I'll catch it!"

Kitty watched it slyly for a moment, and then sprang up and gave the pendulum a hard knock with her paw. But she could not stick her claws into it. The pendulum swung back and forth unsteadily, saying, 'Tick, tick,' but not so loud as before. Kitty watched it wonderingly, all ready for another jump.

"What a queer mouse!" said she; "but I'll catch it!"

"In a moment she gave another jump, and tried to stick her teeth and claws into it. But it was so hard she could not. So she dropped back on the table to watch it. The pendulum moved only a very little, and its 'Tick, tick' was so low that Kitty could scarcely hear it."

"It is almost dead," said Kitty to herself. "I will give it one more pat, and that will finish it."

Kitty jumped at the pendulum again, smelled of it, tried to bite it, and then let it go. The pendulum said 'Tick, tick,' and then stopped. It did not move at all.

"I don't believe it is a mouse after all," thought Kitty; "at any rate, I am sure it is not good to eat."

Kitty looked at it a moment longer. She was very sorry the pendulum was not a mouse. Then she went away.

"Oh, Auntie!" said Arthur, who was sitting at the table, with his book before him, but listening all the while to the story, "that is not true, is it?"

"It is true that my black-and-white kitten stopped the clock once, just in that way," replied Aunt Mary. "I suppose she thought the pendulum was a mouse."

"Who found it out?" asked Arthur.

"Grandmamma. This was the way. When Grandmamma went into the dining-room a little while afterward, she saw the clock-door wide open, and the pendulum not moving. 'Why, my clock has stopped,' said she. 'I must have forgotten to wind it up this morning.' So she went to wind it, but she found that it was all wound up."

"Why," said she, "what can be the matter with my clock?"

"She looked at it carefully, but she could not find any trouble with it. So she set the clock going, and it said, 'Tick, tick—tick, tick,' as well as ever."

"I wonder what stopped the clock!" said Grandmamma to herself as she went away.

"But the next day Kitty jumped upon the table again to see if that strange mouse was alive. The clock-door was open a little way, and she pushed it open a little further and jumped up to the pendulum. Just then Grandmamma came into the dining-room, and so she saw who was the rogue. She watched Kitty a moment, thinking it was a funny trick; but she was careful to shut the door after that."

"Won't you open the clock-door and let me see it tick?" asked Alice.

So Aunt Mary got up and opened the clock-door. Alice silently watched the pendulum as it said "Tick, tick—tick, tick," for a moment or two.

"That's enough," said she.

So Aunt Mary shut the clock-door.

HOW ARAB WOMEN ARE TREATED.

IN all ages all civilized races have loved, cherished, and protected the gentler sex. The Oriental nations have principally married them; and the barbarous tribes have invariably enslaved them. Of civilized peoples the American is the tenderest toward the ladies; the English the most formally respectful; the French most fastidiously polite. There are no degrees of comparison in the manner in which the Orientals and barbarians treat their dames. Among the first they are mere toys; among the latter mere beasts of burden. But among all barbarous races—Chinese, Malay, Hottentot, Indian, and Arab—the life of the Moorish woman is perhaps the saddest and most unsatisfactory.

The Arabs say of a boy, "It is a benediction;" of a girl, "It is a malediction." The Moors, who are only Arabs dwelling in towns, hold the same opinion. Born of poor or rich parents, the Moorish females are treated alike with indifference and contempt, being looked upon only as chattels. The Moorish girl grows up kicked and cuffed and beaten if she belongs to the poorer classes; left in a corner, abandoned to her negress attendant, if she comes of a noble house. Poor, her only desire will be to escape from the drudgery of home to the comparative ease of the streets; rich, she will eat, and grow up and marry, with no thought but of the wildest coquetry, no ambition but for intrigue. They are by no means stupid; they are perfectly capable of receiving instruction and education, as has been proved by French experience in Algeria; but when once returned from the schools to the bosom of their families (to use an expression for which they have no term, and of which they have no comprehension) their improved condition only becomes an additional weight of misery to them, for according to Mussulman prejudice a woman is a thing and nothing but a thing, whatever may be her education or the powers of her intellect. With the Arab a woman is no longer the sister who is formed, by religious tradition, from man's side, to point out the intimate bonds which unite her to him; she is nothing but the servant of the tent, the sad instrument of her master's pleasures, or the slave of his caprice; she is no more than the beast of burden, whose value varies with its beauty. The Arab says of a man who has lost his wife, "What a misfortune!—she was at least worth a hundred duros;" or else, "No matter, the deceased is a loss of ten."

Polygamy, covering as it does the most hideous immorality under the legal mantle, and giving constant food to jealousy and hatred, makes the tent a very hell. The stick is the only means employed by the lord and husband to reduce the atmosphere of his home to the temperate from the boiling point. It would be dreadful to relate all that is inflicted by Arab brutality upon the sex. Arab girls are married and become mothers at a very early age—sometimes as early as thirteen or fourteen. The population would be very great, were the children taken care of; but they are restricted, in the way of clothing, to an amulet tied round the neck by a string, until such time as they can walk, and then receive only a cotton shirt, sometimes spend their early life lying naked in the puddles, and consequently die in great numbers.

The Arab-wife has, as a natural result of her degraded position, very little delicacy, and no modesty whatever.

GASTRONOMY.

THE gastronomic science has not been disdained by the greatest minds. "The love of good living is a venial sin in men of wit," said Talleyrand, who was himself a gourmet, and who was excelled by none in the art of giving a dinner and presiding at the head of a table.

Louis XV. did not scorn to mix pastry with his royal hands; the great wit and jurist, the Prince de Cambacères, was a gourmet; his friend, M. d'Aigrefeuille, was so likewise; and Brillat-Savarin, Grimod de la Reynière, de Coblentz, and the Marquis de Cussy were renowned at once for their wit and their love of good cheer. Rossini and Roqueplan, the most refined of men, are both gourmets and gourmands, and Alexander Dumas is more—he is a cook of genius, who prides himself more on his skill in mixing a salad than on his most brilliant writings.

Beethoven also took it into his head one day that he was a great cook; and, with this belief, turned his old housekeeper out of doors, adorned himself with a paper cap and a white apron, and set to work to prepare his own meals. This lasted for some time to his satisfaction, for he believed in his skill; but one day the unlucky thought struck him to invite several of his friends to applaud his cookery as they applauded his music, and he entreated them to come without ceremony to dine with him. They eagerly accepted. At the appointed hour all sat down to the table, but shouts of laughter soon took the place of the expected applause. The soup had been salted three times; the roast meat was burned to a cinder; the vegetables were raw, and the side-dishes execrable. Nobody touched any thing, not even poor Beethoven, who was discomfited at his fiasco; and it was with great difficulty that his friends succeeded in dragging him to one of the most celebrated restaurants in Vienna, whither they repaired to finish their dinner on rising from the table. The lesson, however, was not lost; the next morning the great composer, who had sacrificed music to omelets, recalled his housekeeper, and threw his paper cap and white apron to the dogs.

The Italian Amerani, little known for his talent as a musician, but who became celebrated for the invention of a famous soup, often repeated the axiom: "So long as there are authors there will be no progress in comedy; and so long as there are cooks there will be no progress in cookery."

Jean Jacques Rousseau, who made such pretensions to sobriety, was also a gourmand of the first water, as the following anecdote proves:

One day a rich stranger, who was curious to see the celebrated philosopher, and had obtained a letter of introduction to him, repaired to the Rue de la Plâtrière, and reached the house of Rousseau just as the latter was about to sit down to a more than frugal dinner.

"I will not invite you to share my humble repast," said Rousseau to the stranger; "it is unworthy of you and your fortune; but for me it is sufficient: it is that of the poor man and the philosopher." He followed up these words by a long tirade on temperance, frugality, sobriety, and kindred virtues. The honest stranger went away enchanted and converted, resolving thenceforth to imitate so perfect a model.

That very evening he went to sup with the Marchioness de Caylus, and, according to his resolution, ate little, listened much, and observed more. He was seated at the left of the Marchioness, whence he could see all the guests save one, who was at the right of the lady of the house, and was entirely hidden by her; but if he did not see this man's face he saw his hands and plate; for the plate was constantly filled and emptied by the aid of the hands which unceasingly carried to the mouth all the contents of the plate.

"What a glutton!" thought the stranger; "it is quite certain that this man has never, like me, enjoyed the unspeakable happiness of hearing the great Jean Jacques Rousseau discourse on temperance!"

As he made this reflection the hostess leaned back in her chair to give an order to a servant behind her, and by this movement revealed her neighbor at the right. Oh horror! the guest whom he had just censured for gluttony was no other than Rousseau himself!

Since the art of gastronomy has such illustrious disciples we think that we shall not offend the dignity of our readers by giving them from time to time practical recipes for the compounding of dainty viands—not stereotyped recipes, taken from cookery books and often useless, but those which come to us sanctioned by the indorsement of those who have tried them and found them good. We give some examples, to be followed by others:

OMELET.—Soak a tea-cup of bread crumbs over night in a cup of new milk. Beat the yolks and whites of three eggs separately mix the yolks with the bread and milk, stir in the whites, add a tea-spoonful of salt, and fry the whole brown. This makes a delicate omelet sufficient for six persons.

EGG TOAST.—For six persons take two eggs, one cup and a half of milk, and flour enough to make a stiff batter. Cut stale bread in thin slices, dip into the batter, and fry brown in butter, and serve hot for breakfast.

CORN FRITTERS.—This is a delicious dish for breakfast, or for dessert, with wine sauce. Grate eight ears of corn, add four eggs well beaten, three table-spoonfuls of flour, and one tea-spoonful of salt, beat well, and fry brown in butter or beef drippings.

FRUIT PUDDING.—Two Sally Lunn's (usual baker's size), split into thin slices and well buttered. Line a common pudding dish with the slices. Pare ripe peaches, and fill the dish. Add half a cup of water and a trifle of sugar and spice. Cover the top with more of the buttered slices. Cook till done. Cover the top with a crust of bread or a plate, so that it will not burn. Serve hot with a sweet sauce. This is a delicious pudding and easily made. Apples or other fruit may be substituted for peaches.

STEAMED PUDDING.—Three cups of molasses, one pound of chopped suet, three eggs, two cups of sour milk, one tea-spoonful of soda (with two tea-spoonfuls of cream and tartar if the milk is not sour), three heaping cups of chopped raisins, two ditto of currants, one tea-spoonful of cloves, and two ditto of cinnamon. Add equal parts of Graham flour and corn meal sufficient to make a stiff batter, and steam the whole for four hours. Eat with wine sauce.

SWEET CAKE.—Take half a cup of butter, one and a half cups of white sugar, half a cup of sweet milk, one tea-spoonful of cream of tartar dissolved in milk, the whites of six eggs beaten to a stiff froth, one and a half cups of sifted flour mixed with half a cup of corn starch, and half a tea-spoonful dissolved in warm water the last thing before putting in the pans. Bake twenty minutes.

VELVET CREAM.—Put three-fourths of a package of Cox's gelatine in a bowl, and pour over it a tea-cup and a half of wine; add the rind and juice of one lemon; let it stand an hour, then place it in a tin cup over the fire for a few minutes till the gelatine is dissolved, and pour it into a quart of cream sweetened to the taste with loaf sugar, beating it hard all the while. When about the thickness of soft custard pour it into the mould.

PUFF CAKE.—Three cups of flour, three eggs, two cups of white sugar, one cup of milk, four ounces of butter, two tea-spoonfuls of cream of tartar, and one tea-spoonful of soda.

MAHOGANY CAKE.—One cup of sweet milk, one large egg, one cup of flour; mix well, and bake in cups for half an hour in a quick oven. This is an excellent breakfast cake. The recipe makes six cups—three tea-spoonfuls to a cup.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XI.

THE IMPROVISATORE.

THE character of Beatrice unfolded more and more every day, and every new development excited the wonder of Brandon.

She said once that music was to her like the breath of life, and indeed it seemed to be; for now, since Brandon had witnessed her powers, he noticed how all her thoughts took a coloring from this. What most surprised him was her profound acquirements in the more difficult branches of the art. It was not merely the case of a great natural gift of voice. Her whole soul seemed imbued with those subtle influences which music can most of all bestow. Her whole life seemed to have been passed in one long intercourse with the greatest works of the greatest masters. All their works were perfectly well known to her. A marvelous memory enabled her to have their choicest productions at command; and Brandon, who in the early part of his life had received a careful musical education, knew enough about it to estimate rightly the full extent of the genius of his companion, and to be astonished thereat.

Her mind was also full of stories about the lives, acts, and words of the great masters. For her they formed the only world with which she cared to be acquainted, and the only heroes whom she had power to admire. All this flowed from one profound central feeling—namely, a deep and all-absorbing love of this most divine art. To her it was more than art. It was a new faculty to him who possessed it. It was the highest power of utterance—such utterance as belongs to the angels; such utterance as, when possessed by man, raises him almost to an equality with them.

Brandon found out every day some new power in her genius. Now her voice was unloosed from the bonds which she had placed upon it. She sang, she said, because it was better than talking. Words were weak—song was all expression. Nor was it enough for her to take the compositions of others. Those were infinitely better, she said, than any thing which she could produce; but each one must have his own native expression; and there were times when she had to sing from herself. To Brandon this seemed the most amazing of her powers. In Italy the power of improvisation is not uncommon, and Englishmen generally imagine that this is on account of some peculiar quality of the Italian language. This is not the case. One can improvise in any language; and Brandon found that Beatrice could do this with the English.

"It is not wonderful," said she, in answer to his expression of astonishment, "it is not even difficult. There is an art in doing this, but, when you once know it, you find no trouble. It is rhythmic prose in a series of lines. Each line must contain a thought. Langhetti found no difficulty in making rhyming lines, but rhymes are not necessary. This rhythmic prose is as poetic as any thing can be. All the hymns of the Greek Church are written on this principle. So are the Te Deum and the Gloria. So were all the ancient Jewish psalms. The Jews improvised. I suppose Deborah's song, and perhaps Miriam's, are of this order."

"And you think the art can be learned by every one?"

"No, not by every one. One must have a quick and vivid imagination, and natural fluency—but these are all. Genius makes all the difference between what is good and what is bad. Sometimes you have a song of Miriam that lives while the world lasts, sometimes a poor little song like one of mine."

"Sing to me about music," said Brandon, suddenly.

Beatrice immediately began an improvisation. But the music to which she sang was lofty and impressive, and the marvelous sweetness of her voice produced an indescribable effect. And again, as always when she sang, the fashion of her face was changed, and she became transfigured before his eyes. It was the same rhythmic prose of which she had been speaking, sung according to the mode in which the Gloria is chanted, and divided into bars of equal time.

Brandon, as always, yielded to the spell of her song. To him it was an incantation. Her own strains varied to express the changing sentiment, and at last, as the song ended, it seemed to die away in melodious melancholy, like the dying strain of the fabled swan.

"Sing on!" he exclaimed, fervently; "I would wish to stand and hear your voice forever."

A smile of ineffable sweetness came over her face. She looked at him, and said nothing. Brandon bowed his head, and stood in silence.

Thus ended many of their interviews. Slowly and steadily this young girl gained over him an ascendancy which he felt hourly, and which was so strong that he did not even struggle against it. Her marvelous genius, so subtle, so delicate, yet so inventive and quick, amazed him. If he spoke of this, she attributed every thing to Langhetti. "Could you but see him," she would say, "I should seem like nothing!"

"Has he such a voice?"

"Oh! he has no voice at all. It is his soul," she would reply. "He speaks through the violin. But he taught me all that I know. He said my voice was God's gift. He had a strange theory that the language of heaven and of the angels was music, and that he who loved it best on earth made his life and his thoughts most heavenly."

"You must have been fond of such a man."

"Very," said Beatrice, with the utmost simplicity. "Oh, I loved him so dearly!"

But in this confession, so artlessly made, Brandon saw only a love that was filial or sisterly. "He was the first one," said Beatrice, "who showed me the true meaning of life. He exalted his art above all other arts, and always maintained that it was the purest and best thing which the world possessed. This consoled him for exile, poverty, and sorrow of many kinds."

"Was he married?"

Beatrice looked at Brandon with a singular smile. "Married! Langhetti married! Pardon me; but the idea of Langhetti in domestic life is so ridiculous."

"Why? The greatest musicians have married."

Beatrice looked up to the sky with a strange, serene smile. "Langhetti has no passion out of art," she said. "As an artist he is all fire, and vehemence, and enthusiasm. He is aware of all human passions, but only as an artist. He has only one love, and that is music. This is his idol. He seems to me himself like a song. But all the raptures which poets and novelists apply to lovers are felt by him in his music. He wants nothing while he has this. He thinks the musician's life the highest life. He says those to whom the revelations of God were committed were musicians. As David and Isaiah received inspiration to the strains of the harp, so, he says, have Bach and Mozart, Handel and Haydn, Beethoven and Mendelssohn. And where, indeed," she continued, in a musing tone, half soliloquizing. "where, indeed, can man rise so near heaven as when he listens to the inspired strains of these lofty souls?"

"Langhetti," said Brandon, in a low voice, "does not understand love, or he would not put music in its place."

"Yes," said Beatrice. "We spoke once about that. He has his own ideas, which he expressed to me."

"What were they?"

"I will have to say them as he said them," said she. "For on this theme he had to express himself in music."

Brandon waited in rapt expectation. Beatrice began to sing:

"Fairest of all most fair,
Young Love, how comest thou Unto the soul?
Still as the evening breeze
Over the starry wave—
The moonlit wave—

"The heart lies motionless;
So still, so sensitive;
Love fans the breeze.
Lo! at his lightest touch,
The myriad ripples rise,
And murmur on.

"And ripples rise to waves,
And waves to rolling seas,
Till, far and wide,
The endless billows roll,
In undulations long,
For evermore!"

Her voice died away into a scarce audible tone, which sank into Brandon's heart, lingering and dying about the last word, with touching and unutterable melancholy. It was like the lament of one who loved. It was like the cry of some yearning heart.

In a moment Beatrice looked at Brandon with a swift, bright smile. She had sung these words as an artist. For a moment Brandon had thought that she was expressing her own feelings. But the bright smile on her face contrasted so strongly with the melancholy of her voice that he saw this was not so.

"Thus," she said, "Langhetti sang about it; and I have never forgotten his words."

The thought came to Brandon, is it not truer than she thinks, that "she loves him very dearly?" as she said.

"You were born to be an artist," he said, at last.

Beatrice sighed lightly. "That's what I never can be, I am afraid," said she. "Yet I hope I may be able to gratify my love for it. Art," she continued, musingly, "is open to women as well as to men; and of all arts none are so much so as music. The interpretation of great masters is a blessing to the world. Langhetti used to say that these are the only ones of modern times that have received heavenly inspiration. They correspond to the Jewish prophets. He used to declare that the interpretation of each was of equal importance. To man is given the interpretation of the one, but to woman is given the interpretation of much of the other. Why is not my voice, if it is such as he said, and especially the feeling within me, a Divine call to go forth upon this mission of interpreting the inspired utterances of the great masters of modern days?"

"You," she continued, "are a man, and you have a purpose." Brandon started, but she did not notice it. "You have a purpose in life," she repeated. "Your intercourse with me will hereafter be but an episode in the life that is before you. I am a girl, but I too may wish to have a purpose in life—suited to my powers; and if I am not able to work toward it I shall not be satisfied."

"How do you know that I have a purpose, as you call it?" asked Brandon, after a pause.

"By the expression of your face, and your whole manner when you are alone and subside into yourself," she replied, simply.

"And of what kind?" he continued.

"That I do not seek to know," she replied; "but I know that it must be deep and all-absorbing. It seems to me to be too stern for Love; you are not the man to devote yourself to Avarice; possibly it may be Ambition, yet somehow I do not think so."

"What do you think it is, then?" asked Brandon, in a voice which had died away, almost to a whisper.

She looked at him earnestly; she looked at him pityingly. She looked at him also with that sympathy which might be evinced by one's Guardian Angel, if that Being might by any chance become visible. She leaned toward him, and spoke low in a voice only audible to him:

"Something stronger than Love, and Avarice, and Ambition," said she. "There can be only one thing."

"What?"

"Vengeance!" she said, in a voice of inexpressible mournfulness.

Brandon looked at her wonderingly, not knowing how this young girl could have divined his thoughts. He long remained silent.

Beatrice folded her hands together, and looked pensively at the sea.

"You are a marvelous being," said Brandon, at length. "Can you tell me any more?"

"I might," said she, hesitatingly; "but I am afraid you will think me impertinent."

"No," said Brandon. "Tell me, for perhaps you are mistaken."

"You will not think me impertinent, then? You will only think that I said so because you asked me?"

"I entreat you to believe that it is impossible for me to think otherwise of you than you yourself would wish."

"Shall I say it, then?"

"Yes."

Her voice again sank to a whisper.

"Your name is not Wheeler."

Brandon looked at her earnestly. "How did you learn that?"

"By nothing more than observation."

"What is my name?"

"Ah, that is beyond my power to know," said she with a smile. "I have only discovered what you are not. Now you will not think me a spy, will you?" she continued, in a pleading voice.

Brandon smiled on her mournfully as she stood looking at him with her dark eyes upraised.

"A spy!" he repeated. "To me it is the sweetest thought conceivable that you could take the trouble to notice me sufficiently." He checked himself suddenly, for Beatrice looked away, and her hands which had been folded together clutched each other nervously. "It is always flattering for a gentleman to be the object of a lady's notice," he concluded, in a light tone.

Beatrice smiled. "But where," he continued, "could you have gained that power of divination which you possess; you who have always lived a secluded life in so remote a place?"

"You did not think that one like me could come out of Hong-Kong, did you?" said she, laughingly.

"Well, I have seen much of the world; but I have not so much of this power as you have."

"You might have more if—if—" she hesitated. "Well," she continued, "they say, you know, that men act by reason, women by intuition."

"Have you any more intuitions?" asked Brandon, earnestly.

"Yes," said she, mournfully.

"Tell me some."

"They will not do to tell," said Beatrice, in the same mournful tone.

"Why not?"

"They are painful."

"Tell them at any rate."

"No."

"Hint at them."

Beatrice looked at him earnestly. Their eyes met. In hers there was a glance of anxious inquiry, as though her soul were putting forth a question by that look which was stronger than words. In his there was a glance of anxious expectancy, as though his soul were speaking unto hers, saying: "Tell all; let me know if you suspect that of which I am afraid to think."

"We have met with ships at sea," she resumed, in low, deliberate tones.

"Yes."

"Sometimes we have caught up with them, we have exchanged signals, we have sailed in sight of one another for hours or for days, holding intercourse all the while. At last a new morning has come, and we looked out over the sea, and the other ship has gone from sight. We have left it forever. Perhaps we have drifted away, perhaps a storm has parted us, the end is the same—separation for evermore."

She spoke mournfully, looking away, her voice insensibly took up a cadence, and the words seemed to fall of themselves into rhythmic pauses.

"I understand you," said Brandon, with a more profound mournfulness in his voice. "You speak like a Sibyl. I pray Heaven that your words may not be a prophecy."

Beatrice still looked at him, and in her eyes he read pity beyond words; and sorrow also as deep as that pity.

"Do you read my thoughts as I read yours?" asked Brandon, abruptly.

"Yes," she answered, mournfully.

He turned his face away.

"Did Langhetti teach you this also?" he asked, at last.

"He taught me many things," was the answer.

Day succeeded to day, and week to week. Still the ship went on holding steadily to her course northward, and every day drawing nearer and nearer her goal. Storms came—some moderate, some severe; but the ship escaped them all with no casualties, and with but little delay.

At last they passed the equator, and seemed to have entered the last stage of their journey.

CHAPTER XII.

THE STRUGGLE FOR LIFE.

At length the ship came within the latitude of the Guinea coast.

For some days there had been alternate winds and calms, and the weather was so fitful and so fickle that no one could tell in one hour what would happen in the next. All this was at last terminated by a dead, dense, oppressive calm like those of the Indian Ocean, in which exertion was almost impossible and breathing difficult. The sky, however, instead of being clear and bright, as in former calms, was now overcast with menacing clouds; the sea looked black, and spread out before them on every side like an illimitable surface of polished ebony. There was something appalling in the depth and intensity of this calm with such accompaniments. All felt this influence. Although there was every temptation to inaction and sleep yet no one yielded to it. The men looked suspiciously and expectantly at every quarter of the heavens. The Captain said nothing, but cautiously had all his preparations made for a storm. Every half hour he anxiously consulted the barometer, and then cast uneasy glances at the sea and sky.

But the calm which had set in at midnight, and had become confirmed at dawn, extended itself through the long day. The ship drifted idly, keeping no course, her yards creaking lazily as she slowly rose and fell at the movement of the ocean-undulations. Hour after hour passed, and the day ended, and night came once more.

The Captain did not turn in that night. In anxious expectation he waited and watched on deck, while all around there was the very blackness of darkness. Brandon began to see from the Captain's manner that he expected something far more violent than any thing which the ship had yet encountered, but, thinking that his presence would be of no consequence, he retired at the usual hour.

The deep, dense calm continued until nearly midnight. The watchers on deck still waited in the same anxious expectation, thinking that the night would bring on the change which they expected.

Almost half an hour before midnight a faint light was seen in the thick mass of clouds overhead—it was not lightning, but a whitish streak, as though produced by some movement in the clouds. All looked up in mute expectation.

Suddenly a faint puff of wind came from the west, blowing gently for a few moments, then stopping, and then coming on in a stronger blast. Afar off, at what seemed like an immeasurable distance, a low, dull roar arose, a heavy moaning sound, like the menace of the mighty Atlantic, which was now advancing in wrath upon them.

In the midst of this the whole scene burst forth into dazzling light at the flash of a vast mass of lightning, which seemed to blaze from every part of the heavens on every side simultaneously. It threw forth all things—ship, sea, and sky—into the dazzled eyes of the watchers. They saw the ebon sky, the black and lustrous sea, the motionless ship. They saw also, far off to the west, a long line of white which appeared to extend along the whole horizon.

But the scene darted out of sight instantly, and instantly there fell the volleying discharge of a tremendous peal of thunder, at whose reverberations the air and sea and ship all vibrated.

Now the sky lightened again, and suddenly, as the ship lay there, a vast ball of fire issued from the black clouds immediately overhead, descending like the lightning straight downward, till all at once it struck the main truck. With a roar louder than that of the recent thunder it exploded; vast sheets of fire flashed out into the air, and a stream of light passed down the entire mast, shattering it as a tree is shattered when the lightning strikes it. The whole ship was shaken to its centre. The deck all around the mast was shattered to splinters, and along its extent and around its base a burst of vivid flame started into light.

Wild confusion followed. At once all the sailors were ordered up, and began to extinguish the fires, and to cut away the shattered mast. The blows of the axes resounded through the ship. The rigging was severed; the mast, already shattered, needed but a few blows to loosen its last fibres.

But suddenly, and furiously, and irresistibly, it seemed as though the whole tempest which they had so long expected was at last let loose upon them. There was a low moan, and, while they were yet trying to get rid of the mast, a tremendous squall struck the ship. It yielded and turned far over to that awful blow. The men started back from their work. The next instant a flash of lightning came, and toward the west, close over them, rose a long, white wall of foam. It was the van-guard of the storm, seen shortly before from afar, which was now upon them, ready to fall on their devoted heads.

Not a word was spoken. No order came from the Captain. The men awaited some word. There came none. Then the waters, which thus rose up like a heap before them, struck the ship with all the accumulated fury of that resistless onset, and hurled their utmost weight upon her as she lay before them.

The ship, already reeling far over at the stroke of the storm, now, at this new onset, yielded utterly, and rolled far over on her beam-ends. The awful billows dashed over and over her, sweeping her in their fury from end to end. The men clung helplessly to whatever rigging lay nearest, seeking only in that first moment of dread to prevent themselves from being washed away, and waiting for some order from the Captain, and wondering while they waited.

At the first peal of thunder Brandon had started up. He had lain down in his clothes, in order to be prepared for any emergency. He called Cato. The Hindu was at hand. "Cato, keep close to me whatever happens, for you will be needed." "Yes, Sahib." He then hurried to Beatrice's room and knocked. It was opened at once. She came forth with her pale, serene face, and looked at him.

"I did not lie down," said she. "I knew that there would be something frightful. But I am not afraid. At any rate," she added, "I know I will not be deserted."

Brandon said nothing, but held out to her an India-rubber life-preserver. "What is this for?" "For you. I wish you to put it on. It may not be needed, but it is best to have it on." "And what will you do?" "I—oh! I can swim, you know. But you don't know how to fasten it. Will you allow me to do so?" She raised her arms. He passed the belt around her waist, encircling her almost in his arms while doing so, and his hand, which had boldly grasped the head of the "dweller in the wreck," now trembled as he fastened the belt around that delicate and slender waist.

But scarcely had this been completed when the squall struck the ship, and the waves followed till the vessel was thrown far over on her side; and Brandon seizing Beatrice in one arm, clung with the other to the edge of the skylight, and thus kept himself upright.

He rested now for a moment. "I must go on deck," he said. "I do not wish you to leave me," was her answer. Nothing more was said. Brandon at once lifted her with one arm as though she were a child and clambered along, grasping such fixtures as afforded any thing to which he could cling; and thus, with hands and feet, groped his way to the door of the cabin, which was on the windward side. There were two doors, and between them was a seat.

"This," said he, "is the safest place for you. Can you hold on for a short time? If I take you on deck you will be exposed to the waves."

"I will do whatever you say," she replied; and clinging to the arm of the almost perpendicular seat, she was able to sustain herself there amidst the tossing and swaying of the ship.

Brandon then clambered out on deck. The ship lay far over. The waves came leaping upon her in successive surges. All around the sea was glistening with phosphorescent lustre, and when at times the lightning flashed forth it lighted up the scene, and showed the ocean stirred up to fiercest commotion. It seemed as though cataracts of water were rushing over the doomed ship, which now lay helpless, and at the mercy of the billows. The force of the wind was tremendous, exceeding any thing that Brandon had ever witnessed before.

What most surprised him now was the inaction of the ship's company. Why was not something being done? Where was the Captain?

He called out his name; there was no response. He called after the mate; there was no answer. Instantly he conjectured that in the first fierce onset of the storm both Captain and mate had been swept away. How many more of that gallant company of brave fellows had perished he knew not. The hour was a perilous and a critical one. He himself determined to take the lead.

Through the midst of the storm, with its tumult and its fury, there came a voice as full and clear as a trumpet-peal, which roused all the sailors, and inspired them once more with hope. "Cut away the masts!" The men obeyed, without caring who gave the order. It was the command which each man had been expecting, and which he knew was the thing that should be done. At once they sprang to their work. The main-mast had already been cut loose. Some went to the fore-mast, others to the mizzen. The vast waves rolled on; the sailors guarded as best they could against the rush of each wave, and then sprang in the intervals to their work. It was perilous in the highest degree, but each man felt that his own life and the lives of all the others depended upon the accomplishment of this work, and this nerved the arm of each to the task.

At last it was done. The last strand of rigging had been cut away. The ship, disencumbered, slowly righted, and at last rode upright.

But her situation was still dangerous. She lay in the trough of the sea, and the gigantic waves, as they rolled up, still beat upon her with all their concentrated energies. Helpless, and now altogether at the mercy of the waves, the only hope left those on board lay in the strength of the ship herself.

None of the officers were left. As the ship righted Brandon thought that some of them might make their appearance, but none came. The Captain, the mate, and the second mate, all had gone. Perhaps all of them, as they stood on the quarter-deck, had been swept away simultaneously. Nothing could now be done but to wait. Morning at last came to the anxious watchers. It brought no hope. Far and wide the sea raged with all its waves. The wind blew with undiminished and irresistible violence. The ship, still in the trough of the sea, heaved and plunged in the overwhelming waves, which howled madly around and leaped over her like wolves eager for their prey. The wind was too fierce to permit even an attempt to rig a jury-mast.

The ship was also deeply laden, and this contributed to her peril. Had her cargo been smaller she would have been more buoyant; but her full cargo, added to her dangerous position as she lay at the mercy of the waves, made all hope of escape dark indeed.

Another night succeeded. It was a night of equal horror. The men stood watching anxiously for some sign of abatement in the storm, but none came. Sea and sky frowned over them darkly, and all the powers which they controlled were let loose unrestrained.

Another day and night came and went. Had not the Falcon been a ship of unusual strength she would have yielded before this to the storm. As it was, she began to show signs of giving way to the tremendous hammering to which she had been exposed, and her heavy Australian cargo bore her down. On the morning of the third day Brandon saw that she was deeper in the water, and suspected a leak. He ordered the pumps to be sounded. It was as he feared. There were four feet of water in the hold.

The men went to work at the pumps and worked by relays. Amidst the rush of the waves over the ship it was difficult to work advantageously, but they toiled on. Still, in spite of their efforts, the leak seemed to have increased, for the water did not lessen. With their utmost exertion they could do little more than hold their own.

It was plain that this sort of thing could not last. Already three nights and three days of incessant toil and anxiety, in which no one had slept, had produced their natural effects. The men had become faint and weary. But the brave fellows never murmured; they did every thing which Brandon ordered, and worked uncomplainingly.

Thus, through the third day, they labored on, and into the fourth night. That night the storm seemed to have reached its climax, if, indeed, any climax could be found to a storm which at the very outset had burst upon them with such appalling suddenness and fury, and had sustained itself all along with such unremitting energy. But on that night it was worse for those on board, since the ship which had resisted so long began to exhibit signs of yielding, her planks and timbers so severely assailed began to give way, and through the gaping seams the ocean waters permeated, till the ocean, like some beleaguering army, failing in direct assault, began to succeed by opening secret mines to the very heart of the besieged ship.

On the morning of the fourth day all hands were exhausted from night-long work, and there were ten feet of water in the hold.

It now became evident that the ship was doomed. Brandon at once began to take measures for the safety of the men.

On that memorable day of the calm previous to the outbreak of the storm, the Captain had told Brandon that they were about five hundred miles to the westward of the coast of Senegambia. He could not form any idea of the distance which the ship had drifted during the progress of the storm, but justly considered that whatever progress she had made had been toward the land. Their prospects in that direction, if they could only reach it, were not hopeless. Sierra Leone and Liberia were there; and if they struck the coast any where about they might make their way to either of those places.

But the question was how to get there. There was only one way, and that was by taking to the boats. This was a desperate undertaking, but it was the only way of escape now left.

There were three boats on board—viz., the long-boat, the cutter, and the gig. These were the only hope now left them. By venturing in these there would be a chance of escape.

On the morning of the fourth day, when it was found that the water was increasing, Brandon called the men together and stated this to them. He then told them that it would be necessary to divide themselves so that a sufficient number should go in each boat. He offered to give up to them the two larger boats, and take the gig for himself, his servant, and the young lady.

To this the men assented with great readiness. Some of them urged him to go in the larger boat, and even offered to exchange with him; but Brandon declined.

They then prepared for their desperate venture. All the provisions and water that could be needed were put on board of each boat. Fire-arms were not forgotten. Arrangements were made for a long and arduous voyage. The men still worked at the pumps; and though the water gained on them, yet time was gained for completing these important preparations.

About mid-day all was ready. Fifteen feet of water were in the hold. The ship could not last much longer. There was no time to lose.

But how could the boats be put out? How could they live in such a sea? This was the question to be decided.

The ship lay as before in the trough of the sea. On the windward side the waves came rushing up, beating upon and sweeping over her. On the leeward the water was calmer, but the waves tossed and raged angrily even there.

Only twenty were left out of the ship's company. The rest were all missing. Of these, fourteen were to go in the long-boat, and six in the cutter. Brandon, Beatrice, and Cato were to take the gig.

The sailors put the gig out first. The light boat floated buoyantly on the waters. Cato leaped into her, and she was fastened by a long line to the ship. The nimble Hindu, trained for a lifetime to encounter the giant surges of the Malabar coast, managed the little boat with marvelous dexterity—avoiding the sweep of the waves which dashed around, and keeping sufficiently under the lee to escape the rougher waves, yet not so much so as to be hurled against the vessel.

Then the sailors put out the long-boat. This was a difficult undertaking, but it was successfully accomplished, and the men were all on board at last. Instantly they prepared to row away.

At that moment a wilder wave came pouring over the ship. It was as though the ocean, enraged at the escape of these men, had made a final effort to grasp its prey. Before the boat with its living freight had got rid of the vessel, the sweep of this gigantic wave, which had passed completely over the ship, struck it where it lay. Brandon turned away his eyes involuntarily.

There was a wild shriek—the next moment the black outline of the long-boat, bottom upward, was seen amidst the foaming billows.

The men who waited to launch the cutter were at first paralyzed by this tragedy, but there was no time to lose. Death threatened them behind as well as before; behind, death was certain; before, there was still a chance. They launched the cutter in desperation. The six men succeeded in getting into her, and in rowing out at some distance. As wave after wave rose and fell she disappeared from view, and then reappeared, till at last Brandon thought that she at least was safe.

Then he raised his hand and made a peculiar signal to Cato.

The Hindu understood it. Brandon had given him his directions before. Now was the time. The roll of the waves coming up was for the present less dangerous.

Beatrice, who during the whole storm had been calm, and had quietly done whatever Brandon told her, was now waiting at the cabin-door in obedience to his directions.

As soon as Brandon had made the signal he hurried to the cabin-door and assisted Beatrice to the quarter-deck. Cato rowed his boat close up to the ship, and was waiting for a chance to come within reach. The waves were still more moderate. It was the opportunity for which Cato had been watching so long. He held his oars poised, and, as a sudden swell of a wave rose near the ship, he forced his boat so that it came close beside it, rising high on the crest of the swell.

As the wave rose Brandon also had watched his opportunity as well as the action of Cato. It was the moment too for which he had been watching. In an instant, and without a word, he caught Beatrice in his arms, raised her high in the air, poised himself for a moment on the edge of the quarter-deck, and sprang forward into the boat. His foot rested firmly on the seat where it struck. He set Beatrice down, and with a knife severed the line which connected the boat with the ship.

Then seizing an oar he began to row with all his strength. Cato had the bow oar. The next wave came, and its sweep, communicating itself to the water, rolled on, dashing against the ship and moving under it, rising up high, lifting the boat with it, and bearing it along. But the boat was now under command, and the two rowers held it so that while it was able to avoid the dash of the water, it could yet gain from it all the momentum that could be given.

Brandon handled the oar with a dexterity equal to that of the Hindu, and under such management, which was at once strong and skillful, the boat skimmed lightly over the crests of the rolling waves, and passed out into the sea beyond. There the great surges came sweeping on, rising high behind the boat, each wave seeming about to crush the little bark in its resistless grasp, but notwithstanding the threat the boat seemed always able by some good luck to avoid the impending danger, for as each wave came forward the boat would rise up till it was on a level with the crest, and the flood of waters would sweep on underneath, bearing it onward.

After nearly half an hour's anxious and care-had an opportunity to get some rest from their exhaustive labors. Beatrice at last yielded to Brandon's earnest request, and, finding that the immediate peril had passed, and that his toil for the present was over, she obtained some sleep and rest for herself.

For all that day, and all that night, and all the next day, the little boat sped over the waters, heading due east, so as to reach land wherever they might find it, in the hope that the land might not be very far away from the civilized settlements of the coast. The provisions and water which had been put in the boat formed an ample supply, which would last for a long time. Brandon shared with Cato in the management of the boat, not allowing his man to have more of the labor than himself.

During these days Brandon and Beatrice were of course thrown into a closer intimacy. At such a time the nature of man or woman becomes most apparent, and here Beatrice showed a noble calm and a simple trust which to Brandon was most touching. He knew that she must feel most keenly the fatigue and the privations of such a life; but her unvarying cheerfulness was the same as it had been on shipboard. He, too, exhibited that same constancy and resolution which he had always evinced, and by his consideration for Cato showed his natural kindness of heart.

"How sorry I am that I can do nothing!" Beatrice would say. "You are killing yourself, and I have to sit idle and gain my safety at your expense."

"The fact that you are yet safe," Brandon would reply, "is enough for me. As long as I see you sitting there I can work."

"But can I do nothing? It is hard for me to sit idle while you wear out your life."

"You can sing," said Brandon.

growing brighter and brighter every hour. Was it cloud, or was it something else? This was the question that rose in Brandon's mind.

The sky grew brighter, the scene far and wide opened up before the gathering light until at last the sun began to appear. Then there was no longer any doubt. It was LAND.

This he told to Beatrice; and the Hindu, waking at the same time, looked earnestly toward that shore which they had been striving so long and so earnestly to reach. It was land, but what land? No doubt it was some part of the coast of Senegambia, but what one? Along that extensive coast there were many places where landing might be certain death, or something worse than death. Savage tribes might dwell there—either those which were demoralized by dealings with slave-traders, or those which were flourishing in native barbarism. Yet only one course was now advisable; namely, to go on till they reached the shore.

It appeared to be about fifty miles away. So Brandon judged, and so it proved. The land which they had seen was the summit of lofty hills which were visible from a great distance. They rowed on all that day. The water was calm and glassy. The sun poured down its most fervid beams, the air was sultry and oppressive. Beatrice entreated Brandon now to desist from rowing and wait till the cool of the night, but he was afraid that a storm might come up suddenly. "No," he said, "our only hope now is to get near the land, so that if a storm does come up we may have some place of shelter within reach."

After a day of exhaustive labor the land was at last reached.

High hills, covered with palm-trees, rose before them. There was no harbor within sight, no river outlet, but a long, uninterrupted extent of high, wooded shores. Here in the evening they rested on their oars, and looked earnestly at the shore.

Brandon conjectured that they were somewhat to the north of Sierra Leone, and did not think that they could be to the south. At any rate, a southeasterly course was the surest one for them, for they would reach either Sierra Leone or Liberia. The distance which they might have to go was, however, totally uncertain to him.

So they turned the boat's head southeast, and moved in a line parallel with the general line of the shore. That shore varied in its features as they passed along: sometimes depressed into low, wide savannas; at others, rising into a rolling country, with hills of moderate height, behind which appeared the summits of lofty mountains, empurpled by distance.

It was evening when they first saw the land, and then they went on without pausing. It was arranged that they should row alternately, as moderately as possible, so as to husband their strength. Cato rowed for the first part of that night, then Brandon rowed till morning. On the following day Cato took the oars again.

It was now just a week since the wreck, and for the last two days there had not been a breath of wind in the air, nor the faintest ripple on that burning water. To use even the slightest exertion in such torrid heat was almost impossible. Even to sit still under that blighting sun, with the reflected glare from the dead, dark sea around, was painful.

Beatrice redoubled her entreaties to Brandon that he should rest. She wished to have her mantle spread over their heads as a kind of canopy, or fix the sail in some way and float idly through the hottest part of the day. But Brandon insisted that he felt no evil effects as yet; and promised when he did feel such to do as she said.

At last they discovered that their water was almost out, and it was necessary to get a fresh supply. It was the afternoon of the seventh day. Brandon had been rowing ever since mid-day. Beatrice had wound her mantle about his head in the style of an Eastern turban so as to protect him from the sun's rays. Looking out for some place along the shore where they might obtain water, they saw an opening in the line of coast where two hills arose to a height of several hundred feet. Toward this Brandon rowed.

Stimulated by the prospect of setting foot on shore Brandon rowed somewhat more vigorously than usual; and in about an hour the boat entered a beautiful little cove shut in between two hills, which formed the outlet of a river. Far up its winding course could be traced by the trees along its borders. The hills rose on each side with a steep slope, and were covered with palms. The front of the harbor was shut in from the sea by a beautiful little wooded island. Here Brandon rowed the boat into this cove; and its prow grated against the pebbles of the beach.

Beatrice had uttered many exclamations of delight at the beauty of this scene. At length, surprised at Brandon's silence, she cried,

"Why do you not say something? Surely this is a Paradise after the sea!"

She looked up with an enthusiastic smile. He had risen to his feet. A strange, vacant expression was in his eyes. He made a step forward as if to land. His unsteady foot trembled. He reeled, and stretched out his arms like some one groping in the dark.

Beatrice shrieked and sprang forward. Too late; for the next moment he fell headlong into the water.

"WITHOUT A WORD HE CAUGHT BEATRICE IN HIS ARMS," ETC.

ful rowing Brandon looked all about to find the cutter. It was nowhere to be seen. Again and again he looked for it, seeking in all directions. But he discovered no sign of it on the raging waters, and at last he could no longer doubt that the cutter also, like the long-boat, had perished in the sea.

All day long they rowed before the wind and wave—not strongly, but lightly, so as to husband their strength. Night came, when Brandon and Cato took turns at the oars—not over-exerting themselves, but seeking chiefly to keep the boat's head in a proper direction, and to evade the rush of the waves. This last was their constant danger, and it required the utmost skill and the most incessant watchfulness to do so.

All this time Beatrice sat in the stern, with a heavy oil-cloth coat around her, which Brandon directed her to put on, saying nothing, but seeing every thing with her watchful, vigilant eyes. "Are you afraid?" said Brandon once, just after they had evaded an enormous wave.

"No!" was the reply, in a calm, sweet voice; "I trust in you."

"I hope your trust may not be vain," replied Brandon.

"You have saved my life so often," said Beatrice, "that my trust in you has now become a habit."

She smiled faintly as she spoke. There was something in her tone which sank deep into his soul.

The night passed and morning came. For the last half of the night the wind had been much less boisterous, and toward morning the gale had very greatly subsided. Brandon's foresight had secured a mast and sail on board the gig, and now, as soon as it could be erected with safety, he put it up, and the little boat dashed bravely over the waters. The waves had lessened greatly as the day wore on; they no longer rose in such giant masses, but showed merely the more common proportions. Brandon and Cato now

"What?"

"Langhetti's song," he said, and turned his face away.

She sang at once. Her tones rose in marvelous modulations; the words were not much, but the music with which she clothed them seemed again to utter forth that longing which Brandon had heard before.

Now, as they passed over the seas, Beatrice sang, and Brandon did not wish that this life should end. Through the days, as they sailed on, her voice arose expressive of every changeable feeling, now speaking of grief, now swelling in sweet strains of hope.

Day thus succeeded to day until the fourth night came, when the wind died out and a calm spread over the waters.

Brandon, who waked at about two in the morning so as to let Cato sleep, saw that the wind had ceased, and that another one of those treacherous calms had come. He at once put out the oars, and, directing Cato to sleep till he waked him, began to pull.

Beatrice remonstrated. "Do not," said she, in an imploring tone. "You have already done too much. Why should you kill yourself?"

"The wind has stopped," answered Brandon. "The calm is treacherous, and no time ought to be lost."

"But wait till you have rested."

"I have been resting for days."

"Why do you not rest during the night and work in the daytime?"

"Because the daytime is so frightfully hot that work will be difficult. Night is the time to work now."

Brandon kept at his oars, and Beatrice saw that remonstrances were useless. He rowed steadily until the break of day; then, as day was dawning, he rested for a while, and looked earnestly toward the east.

A low, dark cloud lay along the eastern horizon, well-defined against the sky, which now was Embroidery Patterns for Cravats, etc.

See illustration, page 93.

THESE patterns can be worked with embroidery cotton on Swiss muslin, batiste or nanook, or with crocheted silk, worsted, etc., on cloth, reps, or cashmere, and can be executed in satin stitch edged with chain stitch, or in button-hole stitch. The first figure is worked with worsted on cloth, and the ground is left remaining. The second figure is worked with embroidery cotton on muslin, the ground being cut out.

Infant's Knitted Boot.

See illustration, page 93.

MATERIALS for the pair, 3 oz. black worsted. This little boot is knit of black worsted, and furnished with a leather sole. Begin at the bottom by casting on 124 stitches, and knit eight rounds in plain knitting stitch before beginning to narrow. In the 9th round knit the three middle stitches as one, so as to narrow 2 stitches, and repeat this narrowing every second round five times; in the following 12 rounds (from the 21st to the 32d round) knit the two middle stitches together; from the 33 to the 38th round the three middle stitches, and from the 39th to the 44th round the two middle stitches again. Knit the following 6 rounds without narrowing; then knit 23 rounds for the upper part, knitting and purling two stitches alternately. The sole must be put on by a shoemaker.

Infant's Knitted Sock.

See illustration, page 93.

MATERIALS for the pair, 1 oz. red, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. white single zephyr. This sock is knitted in a pique pattern, the main part of red, and the stripes and fringe of white wool, and is tied with a cord and balls of red worsted.

Scale Stitch.

See illustration, page 93.

THIS stitch serves for the trimming of hoods, shawls, etc., and is made with double white and single scarlet zephyr. On a foundation of the white wool work as follows: 1st row, with white wool, * 3 double crochet in the following stitches of the foundation, and 2 chain, with the last 3 foundation stitches remaining. Repeat from * to the end of the row. 2d row, with scarlet wool. * 1 single about the middle of the 3 double, 3 chain, 1 single, about the middle of the 3 remaining stitches of the foundation, 3 chain. Repeat from * to the end of the row. 3d row, with white wool. 1 single in the next single, 1 chain, * 8 double in the single, which is worked in the foundation and around the chain scallop of the previous row, 2 chain. Repeat from * to the end of the row. 4th row, with scarlet wool. 1 single in the next stitch of the previous row, * 3 chain, 1 single, around the middle of the next 3 double, 3 chain, 1 single around the next scarlet single of the previous row, and also around the chain scallop. Repeat from * to end. 5th row, with white wool. 3 double around the next single of the previous row, 2 chain, with the last twice 3 chain and 1 single exceeding, 8 double in the following single of the preceding row, which is worked in the single and chain scallop of the previous row. Repeat from * to end. The illustration will show further details.

Simulated Fur trimming for Cloaks, Hoods, etc.

See illustration, page 93.

THIS trimming is made of white double zephyr and chinchilla split zephyr in the following manner: Wind the white zephyr closely round a netting-needle an inch in circumference, and sew the rounds together, one by one, with fine silk; then slip them from the needle, thus making a sort of loop fringe. Make three similar strips, sew them together, and cut and shear the loops. Prepare a similar strip of the chinchilla worsted, wound on a somewhat finer needle, and roll the two together in the manner shown in the illustration.

Shell Stitch.

See illustration, page 93.

THIS stitch is crocheted with lilac and white single zephyr in a striped pattern, and is used for sofa pillows, foot-stools, etc. The shells form the bias stripes, and are worked alternately in four rows of white and four rows of lilac wool.

Two Crochet Borders for Sofa Pillows, etc.

See illustration, page 93.

THE first of these borders is crocheted with white single zephyr in single crochet stitch: it numbers six rows. The foundation is embroidered in cross-stitch with violet worsted in a Greek pattern, as shown in the illustration, and the edges are finished in button-hole stitch with the same worsted.

Fig. 2 consists of seven rows worked in single crochet stitch with white single zephyr. In five of these rows bias strips are worked in double crochet with dark and light green zephyr, as follows: 2 single crochet with white worsted, * the last of the same being looped with dark green; then with the same 1 treble in the 1st stitch of the second row, looping the double crochet with the light worsted; then work with the same light worsted 1 treble in the 2 stitches of the 2d row, this last treble being looped with white worsted; then 2 single with white wool in both the next stitches and repeat from *. A row of single crochet, alternately 1 stitch of white and 1 of green, looping each with the other, finishes the border on either side.

Round Hat with Scarf.

See illustration, page 93.

ROUND hats are worn very small, with low crowns. The one shown in our illustration is of gray felt, bound with narrow blue velvet, and is trimmed with a scarf of heavy blue silk, eight inches wide, is wound round the hat and tied behind. The ends of the scarf are trimmed with silk fringe. An aigrette of gray feathers and small bronze leaves is fastened on the side.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

The first number is excellent; the contents are varied, the illustrations abundant and well executed; the descriptions of material and make-up plain and sufficient.—Evening Post.

The New York Bazar will soon become as popular in this country as its celebrated prototype of Berlin is in Europe.—N. Y. Times.

A first-class family journal, and can hardly fail to attain an immense circulation.—Boston Transcript.

HARPER'S BAZAR will be not only a journal of fashion—and fashion is a great power in the world—but something more: a publication calculated to be of the utmost service in the work of disseminating sound views on many social subjects, and in helping to promote the cause of education. We believe the undertaking to be quite original, for no other periodical of the kind is now published, and we are certain it will be entirely successful, not only as a business enterprise, but in respect to those higher offices of journalism which concern the entire country.—Boston Traveller.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

The ladies' joy.—N. Y. Home Gazette.

The best journal of fashion in this country.—Philadelphia Post.

Will take its appropriate place at once in the front rank of our periodical literature.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

It is the authority in its specialty. It is conducted with admirable taste and skill, and it is as bright in its letter-press as it is attractive in its pictures.—Hartford Press.

The ne plus ultra of American journals.—Courier (Georgetown, D.C.).

The ladies have now an organ in which taste and culture are both considered.—Commercial Advertiser.

HARPER'S WEEKLY BAZAR has made its first appearance, and the completeness of its furnishings, both artistic and literary, warrant us in ascribing to it at once the position of leading fashion paper in America.—Home Journal.

It is just the agreeable and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son and husband and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

It is decidedly the best journal of the kind that has yet appeared in this country.—Methodist Home Journal.

All that the most fastidious could desire.—Christian Advocate.

In a year's time a family would as soon be without a box of matches as HARPER'S BAZAR.—N. Y. Leader.

The ladies will be delighted with it.—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Equal to the best European example.—Rochester Gazette.

The BAZAR has at its start many claims for admission to the family circle, and will, doubtless, be generally read and sought after by ladies every where throughout the country.—Army and Navy Journal.

We need not say "It will succeed," for it has succeeded already.—Philadelphia Press.

Destined to take a high place at once.—Baltimore American.

Will soon be found indispensable in almost all families.—Baltimore Journal.

The neatest and most elegant fashion publication.—Troy Whig.

A centre to which taste will look for its expression.—New York Evening Mail.

Whether we consider its claims as based upon the elegance and superiority of the paper, its typographical appearance, the taste and judgment displayed in the engravings, or the literary contributions contained in its pages, we unhesitatingly pronounce it to be superior in each and every particular to any other similar publication here or abroad.—Philadelphia Legal Intelligencer.

We have rarely seen any thing in this line which surpasses this new birth among periodicals.—Toledo (Ohio) Blade.

Will be one of the great American successes.—Detroit Free Press.

This elegant weekly.—Detroit Post.

Our ladies need no longer be dependent upon the French and German fashion papers, for they now have an American paper that surpasses them all.—Philadelphia City Item.

Edited with great taste and spirit.—New Haven Palladium.

Looks as if it were likely to become a very powerful institution.—Globe (St. John's, N.B.).

Its appearance gives ample guarantee of success.—Round Table.

A handsome sheet.—New York Citizen.

In every respect a first-class newspaper for ladies.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

The editorial matter is bright and sensible, and the stories are very readable.—Liberal Christian.

It will be a great favorite.—Zion's Herald.

TWO MARRIAGES. By DINAH MARIA MULLOCK (Mrs. CRAIK), Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Christian's Mistake," "A Noble Life," &c., &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50.

We have no hesitation in affirming the "Two Marriages" to be in many respects the very best book that the author has yet produced. Rarely have we read a work written with so exquisite a delicacy, full of so tender an interest, and conveying so salutary a lesson.—British Quarterly Review.

All the stories by the author of "John Halifax" have an excellent moral; something tangible, real, and satisfactory.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The author of "John Halifax" can not help writing gracefully: all her sentiments are pure, refined, and womanly. Her English is always good, and her skill in suggesting the unspoken details of a story resembles that of the pieces of music called Songs without Words.—Athenaeum.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

have just received TWO FULL CARGOES of the
FINEST NEW CROP TEAS.

22,000 Half Chests by Ship Golden State.

12,000 Half Chests by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

Oolong (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
Mixed (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
English Breakfast, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
Imperial (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Young Hyson (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Uncolored Japan, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Gunpowder, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.
Coffees roasted and ground daily.
Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.
Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643), N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lots at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.
We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

THE ROYAL CHART FOR DRESSMAKING.

THE ROYAL CHART surpasses every system hitherto known for cutting and fitting ladies' and children's dresses.

The distinctive merits which have gained for it so much celebrity throughout Europe, the patronage and entire confidence of the most eminent dressmakers, warrant the prediction that in America, where fashion and economy are studied, its use will become universal.

The immense superiority of the Royal Chart over every other system is established beyond a question.

There is a wonderful fascination in every garment cut by it.

It is confidently recommended as a safe and reliable system to cut by, fitting any form with absolute certainty. Agents wanted. Address

JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN.
By DINAH MARIA MULLOCK (Mrs. CRAIK). With Illustrations by HOPKIN. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

This is a very good and a very interesting work. It is designed to trace the career from boyhood to age of a perfect man—a Christian gentleman—and it abounds in incident both well and highly wrought.
Throughout it is conceived in a high spirit, and written with great ability.—Examiner.

John Halifax, the hero of this most beautiful story, is no ordinary hero, and this his history is no ordinary book. It is a full-length portrait of a true gentleman —one of nature's own nobility. It is also the history of a home, and a thoroughly English one. The work abounds in incident, and is full of graphic power and true pathos. It is a book that few will read without becoming wiser and better.—Scotsman.

EMPIRE BONNETS.

EMPIRE AND RESTORATION BONNETS.

IN contrast with the prevailing styles of the day, we give an illustration of the bonnets worn during the First Empire of France and the Restoration. We are wearing again the Marie Antoinette fashions; who knows how soon we shall arrive at the accompanying head coverings, which now seem so grotesque? We commence the description of the hats and bonnets illustrated in our engraving with

Fig. 1. at the top of the left-hand corner. This is a straw-hat, trimmed with straw ornaments and green ribbon, and looks odd enough, with the brim tied down over the ears. The hair is worn à la Titus.

Fig. 2 is a velvet toque, surmounted with two white feathers, fastened by a bow of pink ribbon.

Fig. 3.—High white capote, short at the ears, and trimmed with a chicorée. Blue ribbons, and white feathers shaded with blue. Strings buttoned under the chin. These three bonnets belong to the period of the First Empire; the following to that of the Restoration:

Fig. 4.—Black Amazon hat, edged all round with white lace. Pink ribbons. Pink and white feathers (1815).

Fig. 5.—Large bonnet, styled Chapeau de Miso, of white watered gros de Naples. Tuft of three lilac plumes, to match the shade of the Polish redingote (October, 1818).

Fig. 6.—White hat, with the brim depressed in front, trimmed with four large white feathers, worn at concerts, and also at balls by ladies who did not dance (January, 1819).

Fig. 7.—Amazon riding-hat (shaped like a man's), of yellow watered gros de Naples. White veil, added by ladies from the time that this hat was adopted by the courtesans (January, 1819).

Fig. 8.—Scotch hat, of black velvet, with black curled feather (November, 1819).

Fig. 9.—Capote à l'Anglaise, of white gauze, trimmed with a cluster of white pond lilies, pale lilac ribbon and puffs (July, 1819).

Fig. 10.—Leghorn bonnet, depressed in front, and trimmed with roses and corn-colored ribbon (June 1819).

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

I.

ANNO 1700, just at the promenade hour on the 21st of June, certain good citizens of Brussels observed a remarkable group assembled in front of the summer-house of the wealthy Madame van Heeren in that city. This lady, who had just recovered from a slight illness, was seated in the veranda in company with a French cavalier and a very young Abbé; and was receiving the first visit of her most intimate friend. There would have been nothing singular in this, especially as Madame van Heeren was a widow, had not both she and her friend worn dresses of so peculiar and striking a pattern that they would have been ridiculous if the ladies had not for years been lawgivers in matters of taste and fashion. Such a thing was unheard of—the dress not falling in massy, luxuriant folds as was prescribed by the then newest fashion, but stuffed out and gathered behind into a sort of ball, which, though it may perhaps have looked well enough on the standing lady, was somewhat too striking in the case of Madame van Heeren, who was sitting down. “Just see,” whispered one of the most curious of eaves-droppers to her neighbor, “how hideous Madame van Heeren’s padding looks all ruffled up against the back of her chair, as if it did not know where—no—I wouldn’t for worlds follow such a tasteless fashion, particularly as I have no occasion for it. And yet she, too, has a Juno-like figure, or have we perhaps?”—and here she cast a searching glance on Madame van Heeren—“been deceived and taken appearance for reality?” Such were the criticisms indulged in by the observers until gradually the crowd dispersed, the men with mocking laughter and derision on their lips, the ladies wearied and distracted, but at the same time thoughtful.

Six weeks later the walks were filled with dresses stuffed out and buttoned up behind; and those petty gossips who had been the most severe in their criticisms six weeks before, now sailed proudly by, strutting in borrowed majesty. Madame van Heeren from behind her rose-colored windows looked half-complacently and half-maliciously on her followers and leaned back contentedly in her chair, little thinking that she had laid the foundations of a fashion destined to reign for two centuries, and inaugurated the era of crinolines and hoop-skirts!

The origin of this fashion is generally attributed to Madame de Pompadour, who was not born until twenty years after this period. But she is entitled only to the honor of having brought the hoop-petticoat to its culminating point. Its invention is due unquestionably to Madame van Heeren or rather her dress-maker.

FACETIÆ.

‘BUT DRIVER (to Conductor of opposition ‘Bus). “I’ve knowed yer ever since you was born. I knowed yer poor mother; she had two on yer that time. One was a werry nice little boy, t’other was half a hidiot—a sort of brown paper feller. The werry nice little boy died werry young, he did.”

NURSE.—“Did you ring, Ma’am?”
NAUGHTY LITTLE GIRL.—“No; I rang. Take Mamma away, please. She’s very cross and disagreeable!”

AN OLD SAW NEW SET—What can’t be endured must be caricatured.

A “NEAT” DRINK—Spruce Beer.

At a recent hippophagous dinner in Paris, after the removal of “horse,” an old soldier of the Empire gave the memory of “Ney.”

What species of punishment is most probably the pleasantest to undergo?—Capital punishment.

What carpenter’s implement does the carpenter himself minutely resemble?—The screw-driver.

When do dogs remind you of “A Life on the Ocean Wave?” etc., etc.—When you see ‘em barking.

When is a raisin like a tinted engraving?—When it’s (s)toned.

The proper day for marriage—Weddings-day.

LAST MAN.—“This can’t be my hat, surely?”
SERVANT.—“Yessir, that’s your ‘at, Sir.”
LAST MAN.—“Quite sure?”
SERVANT.—“Oh, yessir; quite sure, Sir.”
LAST MAN.—“Well, then, hanged if I haven’t been and taken some other fellow’s head!”

A little girl, hearing it said that she was born on the Queen’s birthday, took no notice of it at the time; but a day or two after asked her father if she and the Queen were twins?

“Cablegram” is the latest from the mint of word counterfeiters.

An up-town painter announces that, among other portraits, he has a representation of “Death as large as life.”

A RITUALISTIC KING.—Edward the Confessor.

The latest novelty in fire-arms is a gun which is capable of being discharged with a reprimand.

During the late bathing season, a pompous individual walked up to the office of a sea-side hotel, and with a considerable flourish signed the book, and in a loud voice exclaimed, “I’m Lieutenant-Governor of —.” “That doesn’t make any difference,” says the landlord, “you’ll be treated just as well as the others.”

“Why do you always buy a second-class ticket?” asked a gentleman of a miser.
“Because there is no third-class ticket,” was the reply of the latter.

Dinner and Morning Dresses.

Fig. 1.—This engraving represents one of the greatest novelties of the winter—the robe à grandes dispositions. It is of violet poult-de-soie, with a cluster of pansies at the bottom of each breadth, concealing the seams. The stems of the pansies are formed of violet satin rouleaux; the leaves are likewise cut out of violet satin, as well as the petals of the flowers, with the exception of the two upper ones, which are of violet velvet. The sprig of coral which connects each of the bouquets with the belt, and covers the seam of the breadth, is formed of rouleaux of violet satin, like the stems of the flowers.—The skirt is gored with a little fullness in the back, and is cut with a long train. The belt is straight and fastens in front, and is edged with satin rouleaux. A scarf of violet taffetas, trimmed to match the skirt, depends from the belt behind. The waist is high-necked, with close sleeves, and is trimmed down the seams with satin rouleaux, a pansy being placed on the shoulder as an epaulet, and another at the bottom of the sleeve. The pansies are finished in the centre with a little round button covered with yellow silk, around which a few radiating lines are embroidered with silk of the same color.

Fig. 2.—Morning dress of white cashmere, confined at the waist by a belt edged with purple braid, and fastened with a purple button. The same braid forms a double row of trimming down the front on either side of the large purple buttons which close the front of the dress; and also trims the pocket and forms an epaulet on the shoulder. The neck is likewise trimmed with small bands of purple braid. The skirt is gored, with a train. Hair turned back à la Grecque, and confined with a purple bandelette.

Visiting, Morning, and Children's Dresses.

See illustration, page 100.

Fig. 1.—Girl 10 years old. Hungarian toquet of black velvet, with a feather, turned up at the side and rounding in front. Full suit of black velvet, lined with white silk, and trimmed with bias folds of taffetas. The paletot has two long tabs in front. It is edged with swan's-down, and slightly adjusted at the waist. High Polish boots, Bismarck kid gloves.

Fig. 2.—Visiting Dress.—White royal velvet bonnet, with blue-and-white feather, band of blue velvet in front, and fall of blue velvet behind. White satin strings. Suit of blue plush. Empress skirt, with train. Over-skirt forming a jacket. Small standing collar. Waist high, the right front overlapping the left diagonally from the top to the bottom, and closed with silk buttons and large bias button-holes. Palm leaves embroidered in silk on the waist and over-skirt. Venetian hanging sleeves, and flounce of rich lace, set on a little full. Light kid gloves.

Morning Dress. Coiffure of guipure lace, falling in a point over the chignon, with strings tying behind. High-necked dress of light-blue taffetas, gored, without pleats, and with demitrain. Sleeveless sacque of white taffetas, cut wholly on the bias, and slightly adjusted at the waist; with small standing collar, and trimmed with two rows of blue velvet, of the same shade as the dress, as seen in the illustration. Blue chenille cord and tascel.

Evening Dresses.

See illustration, page 100.

Fig. 1.—Dress of mauve taffetas, with very long train, trimmed with a deep flounce surmounted by a ruche of violet taffetas. Neck cut square, with under-waist of puffed tulle, edged with two rows of violet velvet on rich point d'Angleterre. Short puffed sleeves, with bands of violet velvet separating the puffs. Belt of violet taffetas. Coiffure of violet ribbons.

Fig. 2.—Dress of white poult-de-soie. Gored skirt, trimmed round the bottom with a coquille of corn-colored taffetas, corselet-ceinture of corn-colored taffetas, confined by bretelles of pinked taffetas, forming a ruche which encircles the top of the corselet. Large rosette, and double lapels bias on the sides. Under-waist low in the neck, with short puffed sleeves, confined by a corn-colored band. Coiffure composed of an artistically-wrought jewel. White gloves.

Crinoline.

See illustration on double page.

This crinoline, which may be made of muslin or woollen stuff, has six small hoops around the bottom. Cut from Fig. 1 one piece, and from Figs. 2-4 each two pieces; join the parts to correspond with the figures on the pattern, hem the bottom, and put on tapes for the hoops, on the wrong side. Hem the edges of the slit, which is left open between Figs. 1 and 2 from 1 to the top. On the left side of the skirt lay a single pleat in the top of the skirt from X to ●, and put on the binding. Cut double from Figs. 6 and 7.

Boy's Suit.

See illustration on double page.

This suit, for a boy from 6 to 8 years old, consists of jacket, vest, and trousers, and is made of dark-blue cloth, trimmed with black braid, white cord, and white buttons. For the trousers, cut from Figs. 8, 9, 11, and 12 each two pieces, allowing for a seam two and a half inches wide on the bottom of Figs. 8 and 9. Face the fronts, set on the under band, Fig. 10, and put on the buttons and button-holes, as marked in the pattern. Join the backs and fronts from 11 to 12, 13 to 14, and 15 to 16, leaving the seam open from 12 to 13 for the pocket, which is faced with the same material as the outside. Set on the trimming, and sew up the fronts from 15 to 18, and the backs from 15 to 19. Hem the bottom, put on the waistband, and finish with belt and buckle. For the vest, cut from Fig. 13 the fronts, both outside, interlining, and lining, and from Fig. 14 the back, of black muslin, double with a seam through the middle. Make the slit for the pockets along the double line in Fig. 13, cord the edges with white cord, and stitch a muslin pocket underneath, having first faced it with cloth. Cord the edge of the vest with white cord, sew narrow black braid round the edge, and face the front and bottom with cloth, having first sewed the buttons on the right side. Make the button-holes in the corresponding side. Run the backs together on the wrong side and turn them. Put on the straps and buckle, and join the fronts and back.

For the jacket, cut from Figs. 16 and 19 each two pieces, from Figs. 17 and 18 each one piece, the last double, and from Fig. 20 the sleeves. Face the fronts with a strip of the same material as the outside, five inches wide at the top and three inches wide at the bottom. Make a slit for the pocket, put on the lapel, trimmed as in the illustration, and sew in the pocket. Join the fronts and back, and set on the collar, which is rolled along the dotted line. The button-holes are on the left side, both sides being furnished with buttons. The sleeves are sewed up from 36 to 37, and a pleat is laid from x to o; they are faced round the bottom with the same material as the outside, trimmed to match the rest of the jacket, and sewed in the arm-hole, according to the figures on the pattern.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1867.

THE BEST READING CHEAP.

MRS. MULOCK CRAIK'S new Love Story, "The Woman's Kingdom," will be commenced in HARPER'S MAGAZINE for January, and will be continued through the year. It will occupy about one-eighth of each Number, and so will cost subscribers fifty cents. When completed, the English edition will cost 10s. sterling; about equivalent to $7.

Mr. JAMES DE MILLE'S novel, "Cord and Cresce," now appearing in HARPER'S BAZAR, will run through several months. When published in book form the probable price will be $4. In the BAZAR its cost is about twenty-five cents.

Mr. WILKIE COLLINS'S new Novel is soon to appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY. If it runs to the usual length of his stories it will occupy about one year; and when published in London the cost will be a guinea and a half; equal to about $11. The cost to those who obtain it in the WEEKLY will be about one dollar.

Our first large COLORED FASHION PLATE will shortly appear, to be followed at brief intervals by others, prepared expressly for HARPER'S BAZAR, and unequalled for taste and beauty.

Single Subscribers to HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied from the beginning to the end of the year 1868, which will complete the first Volume, for the yearly price of four dollars.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied together for ten dollars, or any two at seven dollars.

HOW WE FEED.

REGARD to the kind of food we eat is hardly more essential to health than the manner of eating it. There is no country in the world where there is such abundance of good raw material for the supply of the dietetic necessities of man, or where there are so many people with the means of obtaining it, as in the United States. It may be added that there is hardly a nation that derives so little enjoyment and benefit as the American from its resources. These, which are so plentiful with us, and, if properly used, calculated to bestow so much pleasure and physical good, give a great deal less of either than the meagre supplies of less productive countries. Our abundance of food, so far from being a benefit, is made by perverse use an injury. We have so much that we undervalue it, and deem it unworthy of the care which is necessary in its preparation for wholesome nutrition. We thus confine ourselves mostly to the grosser articles of diet, or such as are ordinarily called plain food, and which require but little art to adapt them to the taste.

We are entirely too carnivorous in this country. We feed too exclusively on steaks of beef, chops of mutton, cutlets of veal, and joints of meat. All our dishes being what the French call pieces of resistance the national stomach is kept in a constant state of active assault. This overstrains its energy, and produces that malady so common with us which the doctors call atonic dyspepsia; that is, the indigestion which arises from weakness in consequence of overwork.

The physiologists tell us that the human system requires for its proper nutrition a variety of food. There must be a due proportion of oily, albuminous, and saccharine matter to render the diet of man wholesome. Neither bread, meat, nor sugar, however necessary as a part of the whole, is sufficient alone to sustain the health and vigor of man. There must be a proper quantity of each in every daily meal. The experience of good livers with their regular succession of courses of soup, fish, meat, vegetables, and dessert, have long since settled this matter of variety of food to their own satisfaction, and in accordance with the teachings of science. Our country friends are apt to scorn all lessons from such a quarter, but we assure them that in regard to their manner of eating they may follow the example of the fashionable with advantage. We know of nothing more dangerous to health than the higgledy-piggledy tables of our country cousins, where flesh, fowl, fish, and all the productions of the earth are mingled together in a confusion that perplexes the taste, and prevents all discrimination of choice. To eat such meals requires the voracity which rustic labor can alone give, and to digest them demands such a stomach as nature refuses to man, but grants, it is said, to the ostrich.

It is always well to begin the dinner as every Frenchman does, with soup. This quiets the excessive craving of the stomach, but does not completely satisfy the hunger; and by thus subduing its voracity prevents it from inordinate indulgence in food that is less easy of digestion. So also is there a good reason why the sweet things should be eaten at the close of the dinner. All saccharine food has the effect of quickly satiating, and if taken at the commencement of a meal would satisfy the appetite so completely that it would be indisposed for the other more substantial articles of diet necessary to the proper nutrition of the body.

MUSIC—AN ECONOMICAL INVESTMENT.

NO better investment can be made for the benefit of a family than that which is necessary to secure to them a good musical education. Money so invested may be made to bring larger, better, and surer returns than if put out at interest, or invested in stocks, land, or life insurance. Simply as a means of recreation it will pay liberally, bringing large returns not only in happiness and health, but also in money, by saving the necessity for other more expensive and less beneficial amusements.

Among the most beneficent of Divine institutions is the family, and perhaps the most precious of Anglo-Saxon characteristics is that love of home in which we excel most other races. Whatever can help to make home attractive, and to cultivate and strengthen family ties, is to be sought after as a great good. Music in a family accomplishes this in an eminent degree. While it serves as an unalloyed recreation, rendering home attractive, it also tends to cheerfulness and good feeling. An hour spent daily by father, mother, and children in musical recreation will bear precious fruit, as many can testify from experience. How many parents have had occasion to lament in after-life that during the youth of their children they did not make the necessary efforts and sacrifices to render home attractive, and so lost the benefit of cultivated affection and strengthened influence, and incurred the great evil of baneful amusements found away from home!

As a means merely of recreation, home attraction, and of moral and esthetic culture in a family, a good musical education is a profitable investment. It is not a useless luxury, even when considered only in this light. We have no sympathy with that smart-appearing but false utilitarianism which declares that the best musical instrument for a young lady to learn to play upon is a sewing or washing machine. These are good in their places and for their purposes; but an organ, a piano-forte, harp, or guitar has a higher mission and usefulness.

But there is another view in which the veriest utilitarian must acknowledge that a musical education is commonly a wise investment, even for one who can provide for scarcely more than the necessities of living. The advantage of endowing children with any knowledge or skill which will enable them to earn a livelihood is appreciated, and education and training are largely directed to this end. With great pains and expense boys are educated as lawyers, physicians, and for various learned and useful professions and trades, that they may have as good facilities as possible for supporting themselves. Girls are prepared as teachers or for other avocations, and there is earnest complaint that more means of support are not available to them. Now a knowledge of music sufficient to enable one to teach, direct a choir, or to be in some other way a means of support, is attainable by the great majority, and this with the expenditure of less time and effort than is necessary to qualify one as a good teacher of common English branches of education. The demand for such services has in times past been inadequately supplied, and there can be no doubt that this need will continue and increase. Those familiar with the matter will testify that the increasing demand for music-teachers is not fairly met. It is more difficult to find a good teacher for a given position than to find a satisfactory place for a competent teacher. Moreover, this is a respectable and remunerative profession, which is open to women as well as men. Therefore, as a provision for the future, the furnishing of the opportunity for the attainment of such knowledge and skill, even at considerable cost, is economical and wise. That man is shrewd who, though he do not care for music, or value its educational and recreative uses, and though he confidently expects to leave his children well provided for pecuniarily, yet assiduously cultivates their musical skill, merely as a provision for future reverses, just as he might provide his boys with a trade or profession which he believed they would never have occasion to use.

Let no one who has a family count a musical education as an extravagance; it is an economy, and likely to prove the best investment he can make.

A NEW SERIAL STORY BY WILKIE COLLINS.

WE are very glad to announce that the publication of "The Moonstone," a new serial story, by WILKIE COLLINS, will begin in an early Number of Harper's Weekly. By a special arrangement with the author himself, the story will be printed from his own manuscript, and will be regularly issued simultaneously with its appearance in England. It will be profusely illustrated with original designs by PARSONS, JEWETT, and others.

WILKIE COLLINS is now an acknowledged master in English fiction. In that great art of the story-teller, a skillful construction of plot, and the maintenance of an intense and sustained interest from the beginning to the end, he has no rival. The "Woman in White," which the readers of the Weekly will remember, was one of the most extraordinary of English novels; and the opening of "The Moonstone" which we have read is not less striking than that of the "Woman in White." It has the same crisp, clear-cut description; the same strange spell of mystery, and introduces an element quite unfamiliar hitherto in the multitude of novels—which the reader will discover in due season—and which the author will be very sure to manage with the utmost skill.

We strongly urge our readers to begin with the beginning of "The Moonstone," and to follow it carefully as it proceeds, for no stories, from their peculiar construction, better repay serial reading than those of WILKIE COLLINS.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Railroad Conductor.

MY DEAR SIR,—Where a man's duties are vaguely defined it is often very hard for him to "keep his manners" toward those who seem impertinent and intrusive. I have often watched you as you made your way through the car, and I have been delighted with the urbanity with which you answer some questions, and rather surprised by your extreme indifference to others. Thus, when the other evening your attention was called to a beastly, drunken man who occupied one of the seats, and actually terrified all the ladies by his conduct, you shuffled along, and when asked to remove him returned no answer, and, slamming the door went out, leaving us all at the mercy of his ribaldry or his surliness.

Now, Sir, what is the difficulty? Why is it that you tolerate drunken passengers? A drunken man is a madman; yet how often has every traveler seen you too irresolute to deal with him as you would with other, often very much smaller, nuisances! I have seen a drunken man enter the car, reel into a seat, sing the most intolerable songs, shout, tell stories, and generally brawl, and the conductor pass through the car, look at the offender curiously or severely, and pass out. Perhaps the directors had made no provision for the emergency, drunkenness being so infrequent. Perhaps the conductor was doubtful which might get the best of it in a tussle. Perhaps he thought of subsequent revenge, or of actions for damages. But, whatever his feeling, it was surely very bad manners to leave passengers exposed to such a pest.

Let me pray you, dear Mr. Conductor, to vindicate the reputation of your manners, and to expel the next drunken man you find in your car. You need not necessarily leave him by the way-side. You can stow him in the baggage-car in such a way that he can neither hurt himself nor any thing else. And if you can not manage him alone you can summon the brakeman; and I have no fear but that you can easily raise a posse among the passengers if necessary. A brave leader is seldom without followers. By this course you will establish yourself in the regard of all decent travelers. You will gain self-respect, and you will be, consequently, more respected.

And why, dear Sir, should you allow passengers to stand in a car, when you see that it is owing to their unwillingness to ask the people who have piled shawls and bags upon a seat to remove them? I have seen a woman in very expansive skirts overspreading a whole bench or seat with her impediments accumulated around her and calmly reading, while passengers of the other sex could find no place, and the conductor saw it and knew it. Was it not your duty gently to state the case to the young woman, or old, as the case might be; to say to her: "Madam, will you be good enough to make room?" And if she demurred, to add: "Madam, will you be so kind as to remove your shawls from the seat which you have not paid for?" You, Mr. Conductor, are in a sense the host of the train. It is for you to provide for the comfort of your guests; and to do it not like a police-officer dealing with roughs, but like a gentleman in his house.

I know a conductor upon a road which shall be nameless who seemed to unite in himself all the excellences of conductors. His address to every person was courteous, and whether it were a poor old woman who was half-confounded by being in a car, or a child, or the President of the road, his manner was so friendly that it was pleasant to watch its influence. It reassured all the forlorn passengers, of whom there are always a great many. It was inspiring to those who do not often get kindly treatment from the persons with whom they deal; and it put every body unconsciously into good-humor to see so genial a face and to observe such patient attention. Then, my dear Mr. Conductor, you should have seen him at night! He understood instinctively, as every gentleman does, the feelings of others. When he entered the car in the middle of the night, or at any time when the passengers might be supposed to be sleeping, he did not slam the door and shout out "Tickets!" so that every body was startled out of sleep as if a band of guerrillas had fired upon the train and hoarsely summoned it to surrender, and was consequently angry and peevish when he discovered that it was only the conductor bawling for tickets. This, I say, was not his way. He came in quietly, and if a man were asleep he touched him upon the shoulder quietly, and if he were awake punched his ticket and passed on.

It was a very small thing, but it was very agreeably different from the other conductor upon the same route who burst into the car like a whirlwind, stormed through and thundered out, leaving every body disturbed and indignant. It was a very small thing indeed. But the secret of good-manners is in small things. It is in tones, in looks, in movements. A nod, a word, a smile, are often enough to show that a man is a gentleman and not a boor. Thus nothing tests a person more truly than the treatment of servants. What are they? What but men and women giving honest work for honest wages? It is honest service, precisely like that of the shoemaker, the tailor, or the butcher, or of the stock-broker, the lawyer, and the doctor. Is there any thing in the relation to release us from the duty of courtesy, of common politeness, of good-manners? I confess, Mr. Conductor, that I like to see a man, or a woman, or a child, who says "Good-morning" to the waiter who is spreading the breakfast-table, and who does not behave toward the various "help" of the house as if they were invisible or did not exist. Nobody cares to have any personal relation a wholly pecuniary one; and in the case of such perpetual personal contact it must be very uncomfortable and extremely ridiculous to refrain from courtesy lest familiarity should breed contempt. Breed fiddle-sticks! as Aunt Draco would have said. The best ordered household I ever saw, Mr. Conductor, was that of a housekeeper who had the most simple and friendly manners toward all her "hands." I did indeed once know a merchant who made it a rule that none of his clerks should know him or speak to him in the street. He insisted that the connection between them was entirely mercenary, and he did all that he could to make it so. But could there be any greater folly? Would the man have been harmed by their personal respect? Would his business have been injured if, through regard for him, his clerks had had a pride and interest in it?

In all these matters, dear Mr. Conductor, it is the little things that make up the great thing. It is the gracious word and act that make up the whole character of courtesy. A peg in your shoe is a very small thing, but in walking how large a thing it becomes! The harsh, rough manner which I have remarked—not, of course, in you, my dear friend, but in some of your fraternity—is adopted, I am told, toward the understrappers, and it is hard to change it when the occasion and the persons are different. I could hardly believe my ears when I heard one whom I had much respected hurling a volley of oaths at some understrapper for some trivial offense; and when I suggested that there seemed to be a very remarkable disparity between the wrath and the occasion, I was told that it was necessary to make the fellows know their places, and they could never be taught except by a tornado of scolding when any thing went wrong.

This is a very common rule of action, and a mighty poor one it is. I remember that a friend of mine who had traveled beyond me and beyond railroads, Mr. Conductor, for he had been in Egypt before the rails were laid, told me that his dragoman used always to accompany his orders to his subordinates with a cut of the rhinoceros-whip; and the dragoman explained to my friend in a smile, as in a marginal note, that it would not be supposed he meant what he said if he did not emphasize his word with a blow. Well, even if it were true in Egypt, it is not so here; and I have no doubt that if you inquired, even there, you would find that it was the rhinoceros-whip which had made the necessity for the rhinoceros-whip. A man may be perfectly firm, he may insist that men shall do their duty, even to the point of confronting, not the whip in your hand, but the pistol, and yet his firmness may be perfectly unruffled and quiet. Noise is not force; and when those who are set to obey you have learned that you will be obeyed, you need not emphasize every word with the rhinoceros-whip.

So you see, dear Mr. Conductor, that you do not every day run the gauntlet of hundreds of eyes without a pretty strict scrutiny and reflection; and naturally you are not brought into contact with so many persons of every age and character without great opportunity of helping or incommoding them. Please to remember how much pleasanter cheerful good-nature is than surliness. We are no longer children, dear Sir, the large majority of us who travel under your charge, and we are not imposed upon by being scurvily treated. It does not dispose us to pull out our tickets any more nimbly, and you do not get through the car any more rapidly for shouting out "Brisk! brisk!" Dear Mr. Conductor, why is it that if you say to people, "Hi, hi! hurry up!" they don't and won't hurry up? The instinctive response of fallen human nature is, "Oh, are you in a hurry?" I have seen it lamentably often in your official beat. I have seen a deliberation in taking out tickets that was appalling. I have seen men descend, as it were, into every pocket, and emerge from every one with an air of surprise at not finding something, until at length, after you had plainly evinced your opinion of the proceeding, I have seen the ticket produced from a pocket into which I am ready to be sworn I had once already seen the hand descend.

I do not excuse the passenger who is so ill-behaved. No, Sir; far from it. But I feel very sure that the ticket would have been found at the first trial if the look, the tone, the air of the demand had been really courteous. You know how it was with the wind, and sun, and the traveler before railroads. And it is my firm opinion that the sun has not even yet lost his power.

Your friend in the corner seat,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

OUR modistes are busy with evening toilettes for opera, balls, and full-dress dinner parties. Corsets of evening dresses are merely corselet ceintures, or girdles of silk, over lace or tulle chemisettes. When an over-skirt of silk is worn the girdle and skirt are cut in the Gabrielle style, without shoulder-straps. When separated from the skirt the corsage extends over the shoulders, and is exceedingly low and square in front and back. Puffs of tulle fill out the squares to a proper height. Belts and sashes have entirely done away with pointed waists. Some dresses just imported, instead of being laced, are buttoned behind with large flat button-holes covered with the material of the dress.

Sleeves are either very short and puffed, or long lapels hanging under the arm, not behind it, with merely a rosette or flower over the shoulder.

Skirts of all kinds of material are gored with long trains. The front and sides are flat and close-fitting. A handsome train of medium length is formed by sloping the skirt gradually until the back widths are a yard longer than the front. An imported bridal dress measures three yards from the belt to the edge of the train, and the back widths of a white Antwerp silk are four yards long. Trained skirts are not pointed, but rounded gradually, or cut off square. Double skirts are made of two materials, the under one of rich silk with an over-skirt or tunic of lace looped at the sides, the front forming an apron, or a gauze or tulle trained skirt with long peplum or tunic of silk. The under-skirt is not trimmed.

Marie Antoinette fichus of real lace and of tulle are worn over colored silks, and are very becoming to slender figures. They are crossed in front, with long flowing ends at the back.

Sashes are worn either at the back or side, and are short or long according to fancy, but are always broad, cut on the bias, and heavily trimmed at the ends. When made of the material of the dress they are lined with white satin, and bordered with lace or piped with thick cords. Knotted fringe is sewn on the bias ends, or they are caught together with a chenille tassel. Waistbands with ornamental rings for sashes are very much worn. The rings are now made of wooden molds covered with velvet or satin.

GAZE DE CHAMBERY, TULLE, ETC.

First among thin material is the beautiful gaze de Chambery. This gossamer tissue is brocaded with gilt and silver threads in bouquets and in robes. Thick satin stripes alternate with delicate gauze in a most effective way. Plain white Chambery, at two dollars a yard, is trimmed with puffing and plaited ruffles or with tinsel ribbons. Tunics and over-dresses of colored silk are worn over trained Chambery skirts. Sleeves and high bodice of gauze puffed, with silk ruches or small flowers between the puffs. Over-dress low, and rounded at the top, the skirt slashed at the side with long sashes between. A brocaded robe of white gauze overworked with blue is sold unmade for fifty dollars. Another pattern embroidered with gold thread is marked $150. A pretty style is an over-dress or fourreau of white Chambery striped with cerise or violet satin, with a trained skirt of glacé silk the color of the satin stripe.

Lyons tulle is spangled with colors or gilt and beaded with crystal, the pattern costing fifty dollars. No material is so universally becoming. It softens the complexion of both blonde and brunette. It is prettily embroidered with gay colors and with straw.

TROUSSEAUX.

Trousseaux of point appliqué and point d'aiguille are imported at from twelve hundred to two thousand dollars. They only, however, form a small part of the bridal toilette. They consist usually of a lace shawl, veil, wide flounce for wedding dress, narrower lace for garniture, mouchoir, and fan cover all in the same pattern. The fan is mounted with white silk and mother-of-pearl.

White satin, the traditional bridal dress, is at length rivalled by the magnificent Antwerp silk, heavily corded, a yard and a half wide, and sold at twenty-five dollars a yard. This silk is handsome enough to dispense with all trimming. The lustrous poult-de-soie antique, and a silk with thick satin cords, sold at twelve dollars, are also sold for wedding dresses.

Tarletane, grenadine, and tulle are selected for bridesmaids. Several skirts of tulle and tarletane alternately, often five or seven, produce a beautiful effect, each differently trimmed with puffs, ruches, lace, and satin folds. Moss fringe and tinsel passementerie are suitable trimming. Flowers are, however, prettier for bridesmaids. They are arranged round the bertha and as a girdle.

VELVET, SATIN, AND BROCADE.

Colored Lyons velvet is eighteen dollars a yard. Ten yards makes a trained gored dress. Satins vary from seven to twelve dollars. Capucine and purple with tunics of Chantilly lace and Mexican blue with point lace tunic are very handsome. Chiné silks at five dollars, with bouquets of flowers artistically grouped on white grounds and the brocades we have spoken of before; glacé silks in new shades, gros grain in plain colors at six dollars a yard, and the shaded chameleons complete the list of thick materials for evening dresses.

COIFFURES.

Wreaths of small flowers, with but little foliage, are worn for head-dresses. Coronets are arranged entirely without leaves. Trailing vines fall on the shoulders, or are twined around the chignon. Hawthorn wreaths, verbenas, clematis, and marguerites, with gilt stamens, and glittering with crystal dew-drops, are favorite coiffures. Chrysanthemums and china asters of velvet and crape form pretty bandeaux between rows of puffs, or above the short curls on the forehead. White lilac and orange blossoms are mingled together for bridal garnitures. Cape jessamine and apple blossoms of wax are mingled in the same tiara. A set for a bride consists of wreath for the hair, shoulder knots, bouquet for corsage, and vines for bertha and girdle. Necklace and wristlets are added for very youthful brides.

OPERA CLOAKS AND HATS.

A new style of opera cloak, or rather scarf, is straight, with a fold pointed in the back, forming a hood like the Arab cloaks. It crosses in front, one end being thrown over the shoulder in the Spanish fashion. A white velvet cloth made in this way is braided with gold and scarlet. Fringe of gilt and scarlet surrounds the edge.

A gored circular cloak of scarlet cashmere is trimmed up the gores with an appliqué of white plush leaves, edged with gilt, with wide white cheville fringe with gilt drops. Another is a long paletot of white velours, braided with black and gilt in large medallions. A flounce of black lace, braided with gilt, is sewn on the edge over long white chenille fringe. Lining of white silk plush. The chenille fringe under lace presents a peculiarly soft appearance, and is a favorite design with one of our most tasteful modistes.

An Opera Fanchon of white illusion studded with seed pearls is puffed over white satin. Sprays of mother-of-pearl, representing tiny lilies of the valley, separate the puffs. Marabout fringe tipped with pearl falls over the chignon. Full-blown rose with gilt stamens above the forehead. Another of tulle foundation is in the Marie Stuart shape, entirely covered with white feather daisies. A fine fillagree chain serves to hold the daisies securely.

Opera hoods, knitted in a loose stitch of split zephyr, are overshot with silk floss and crystal beads. Cashmere baschliks and ermine hoods are becoming and comfortable for extra carriage wrappings.

DINNER AND BALL DRESSES.

A dinner dress, imported ready-made and just out of the Custom-house, is of parrot-green satin. Round waist, low and pointed at the neck, and buttoned with satin buttons. Puffs of illusion and thread insertion fill out the corsage to a proper height. Thick pipings of white satin extend from the shoulders to the belt. Short puffed sleeves laid in pleats edged with thread lace. Gored skirt, the back width measuring three yards from belt to end of train. A broad lapel is simulated on the train by pipings and lace, ending with a large bow of satin bordered with lace, and lined with white satin. A wide flounce of thread lace, headed by satin cords, extends around the dress, gradually widening toward the back. Below this flounce is a ten-inch puff of satin, caught up at intervals in pleats by diagonal rows of piping. The price is $300.

A ball dress is of white satin. Long trained skirt with three broad rouleaux of gros grain above the hem. Over-skirt of white gaze de Chambery. This is long and bordered by tinsel ribbon three inches wide. The skirt is looped up at each side with tinsel cords and tassels. Low satin bodice, above which rises a puffed chemisette of Chambery. Short sleeves.

Another of Lyons tulle is too elaborate to be minutely described. There were seven skirts, each differently trimmed with blond lace, plaited ruffles, and pipings.

A long peplum of lavender silk worn with these skirts was pointed in front and back with two deep sashes on either side.

A Bismarck gros grain, suitable for a full dress dinner, is adorned on the skirt with pansies of every shade embroidered on the goods and transferred on the skirt in groups on the front width. Low corsage with bertha covered with pansies.

A capucine, or nasturtium-colored, satin has a plain train with tunic of Chantilly lace. Another of the same shade, an imported dress, has a high corsage with Marie Antoinette fichu, piped with satin and edged with white blond lace. Coat-sleeve trimmed on the outside seam with crosscut bands of gros grain, caught at short intervals with five bows of the material bordered with lace. An apron is simulated on the front width with bias puffs trimmed in the same manner, and finished with a bow and fringed ends. This dress is imported, ready-made, at three hundred dollars.

A more simple toilette is of rose-colored glacé silk, with an upper skirt of illusion of the same color. The trained skirt is untrimmed.

The illusion skirt is bordered with a pinked ruche of the glacé silk and several rows of narrow piping. Puffs of illusion separated by narrow ruches form a bertha on the glacé corsage. A fourreau dress of white India muslin, trimmed with puffs and wide Valenciennes lace, is worn over a slip of blue glacé silk.

VARIETIES.

Purple, it is predicted, is to be the leading color, now that Bismarck is on the wane. A carriage dress and paletot of English velvet, with silk finish, is of deep church purple, with a shaded spot. Trained skirt, scalloped and edged with a thick silk cord. The front width is plain, and overlapped by the scalloped train. Ring molds covered with velvet hold sashes on each side of the back of the skirt, in which are concealed loops for buttoning up the train. Mantilla paletot trimmed with chenille fringe. Price, two hundred and fifty dollars.

Another purple suit is of corded silk, with skirt and paletot in the style just described. The trimming is of black appliqué lace and fringe. Material for the waist is furnished. Price, ninety-five dollars.

Still another purple novelty is a velvet sacque cloak, the price of which is a hundred and sixty dollars. The velvet is shaded with pin-head spots. Trimming of satin rouleaux and flounce of black thread lace. Greek sleeves lined with white satin quilted in diamonds. Tight sleeves to be removed at pleasure.

A morning dress of gray cashmere is trimmed with a band of ruby velvet vandyked at the edges, laid over the shoulders, and extending half-way down the skirt both back and front. Stripe of velvet on the outside seam of the coat-sleeve and around the edge of the skirt. Velvet pocket-flaps set on horizontally. Large velvet buttons.

A novelty, called the Russian gored knitted skirt, has just been introduced, which is designed to supersede the ordinary flannel skirt. It is made of merino, is warm and clinging, does not shrink, and is a serviceable garment for cold weather.

PERSONAL.

HALLOR's last few days and hours are described by a correspondent of the Tribune, who says that the poet left this city on the 14th of October, in a poor state of health, and with a presentiment that he should never return.

"During his week's sojourn he declined all invitations, and left his hotel to visit his physician twice, and for a short stroll with the witer on Broadway. On our return he appeared more like himself, told me some of his raciest stories, and asked me to repeat to him Lady Nanny's exquisite poem 'The Land of the Leal.' As I did so, I saw the tears in his eyes, and when I concluded he said, wringing my hand, 'There are no poets so tender and musical as those of Scotland; and then a change coming over him, he recited some of the martial passages from Marmion, while his eyes fairly blazed with enthusiasm, and the old genial smile lit up his still fine features. He then alluded to DROKENS, and said, 'I must come down and lead him, and if he is not too much lionized, perhaps I can capture him, and we three, with TUCKERMAN, will have a quiet and cozy dinner together.' On Sunday morning Mr. HALLOR walked out for the last time, his object being to consult his physician, Dr. CANFIELD. The medicine prescribed afforded him temporary relief, but on Monday and Tuesday he complained of feeling very unwell, and during that period he received several visits from his physician. He retired earlier than usual on Tuesday, saying to his sister, Miss HALLOR, 'I am afraid I shall not live till morning.' A few minutes before 11 o'clock she went to his bedroom, and found him sitting up in his bed. He said, 'Marie, hand me my pantaloons, if you please.' She turned to the other side of the room to get them, but before she reached her brother's bedside he had fallen back dead—expiring without a moan or a struggle. And so

"He gave his honors to the world again,
His blessed part to Heaven, and slept in peace."

—One of the most elegant of the private parties given to General SHERIDAN during his last visit to this city was that of Senator THOMAS MURPHY, in East Thirty-ninth Street, which took place on the 26th ult. Among the guests were most of the prominent legal, literary, political, and financial celebrities of the metropolis.

—Miss CAMILLA WEBB, a clerk in the Treasury Department at Washington, was seen by Baron VON HAYE, of the Belgian legation, who wanted to have her for a wife, proposed, and married. They are on the point of going to Europe on the "trial trip."

—It was a very neat and proper thing for Mr. ROBERT BONNER to give HENRY WARD BEECHER $5000, in addition to the $25,000 previously paid, simply because the story was spun out a little longer than was at first intended.

—The three most beautiful women now extant in Paris are said to be the ladies DUDLEY and GRANVILLE and the Duchesse de Monchy. When they appear the Parisians are agape with wonder and admiration.

—They do say that the Crown Prince of Prussia gets his wife (VICTORIA's daughter) to write his speeches for him. She is good and bright, and must be a great comfort to the young man.

—General GRANT has shown his usual sagacity in selecting for command of the new School of Artillery at Fortress Monroe General WILLIAM F. BARRY. It was General B. who organized the artillery arm of the Army of the Potomac, and commanded the artillery in SHERMAN's "March to the Sea." In this unprecedented campaign General BARRY had sixteen field-batteries, comprising sixty-eight guns. As an artilleryist he is without a superior.

—Mr. DROKENS uses no scenery at his readings, but arranges his lights in a peculiar way, and carries his own gas-fixtures with him. He has his own plan of lighting the platform on which he reads, and in England a gas-fitter usually traveled in his suite to fix the things. We discharge a pleasant duty in mentioning the above facts.

—It is stated as a fact that during our troubles Mr. SEWARD wrote over to GARIBOLDI offering him a major-generalship in our army, but Mr. G. declined on the ground that the war was merely to restore the Union, and not to abolish Slavery. It really looks as though the Italian patriot was in a bad predicament—his army scattered, he in quod, and LOUIS NAPOLEON and VICTOR EMANUEL arranging matters to suit themselves.

—Massachusetts folk are doing special honor to the memory of the late Governor ANDREW. WHIPPLE, the cleverest New England essayist, is preparing his biography, while the people of trade and manufacture are raising $100,000 to be presented to his family. One of the Governor's confidential friends states that he did not desire the nomination of Vice-President with General GRANT, but aspired to the Attorney-Generalship under the next Administration. It is also asserted that General GRANT placed more confidence in Governor ANDREW than in any other statesman of the day. Last winter he invited him and family to spend some weeks with him in Washington.

—A new five-act play, called "Light at Last, or the Shadow on the Casement," written by Colonel FITZGERALD, will be produced at the Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia, on the 30th of December. The piece appeals to Woman, and will command her earnest sympathy. Mrs. JOHN DREW, who will play the principal part, praises the play highly. Colonel FITZGERALD has just finished an historical play in three acts.

—THEODORE TILTON, the Raphael-faced young editor of the Independent, who looks a poet if ever a man did, has collected his fugitive poems in a volume under the title of the "Sexton's Tale," etc., which is graceful and interesting in spite of its lugubrious title. Mr. TILTON is one of the youngest editors of New York, and is a charming conversationalist.

—Ex-Governor MATTESON, of Illinois, deported himself very paternally and properly on the 7th ult., at the marriage of his two daughters; that is to say, he gave each an annuity of $5000 per annum. Once in a while the Governor comes down to New York, and indulges in what Wall Street folk call "just a little fly-er" at stocks.

—Mrs. JENNY VAN ZANDT, one of the cleverest of our American operatic artists, is the daughter of Blitz, the old gentleman so famous for diablerie.

—When LOUIS NAPOLEON and EUGENIE have their little verbal disagreements they speak in English, our language having greater strength of expression. The Empress is now preparing a series of brilliant private theatricals for Christmas time. Doubtless she would like to act, but how could one

"Expect an Empress of her age
To speak in public on the stage!"

—WALTER WHITMAN, the writer of mysterious poetry, says he never had more than four dollars at any one time since he was born. As a financial statement this could hardly be called satisfactory, were it not for the fact that his liabilities have always been limited. Mr. W. is now going on quite comfortably as a clerk in the U. S. Attorney-General's Office, Washington, for which he receives ample compensation.

—Mr. DUFFEE, an opulent young gentleman of Fall River, Massachusetts, has purchased KAULBACH's great cartoon of the "Reformation," which won the gold medal for historical painting at the Paris Exposition. The picture is 23 by 25 feet in size, and contains groups of the principal personages who contributed directly or indirectly to the great work of LUTHER. The painting is to be exhibited in New York, and will doubtless create a great sensation, as it has done in European art-circles.

—Lord AMBERLEY (Earl Russell's son) and Lady AMBERLEY (Earl Stanley's daughter), whenever they go among us, visit first the public schools, hospitals, prisons, and public institutions. They are peering into every thing that will enlighten them as to our way of doing things. When he gets home and begins to speak in Parliament the British subject will be favored with Lord A.'s notions of us.

—What a charming person must be Mrs. VAN DYKE, of Trenton, who went about among her friends and collected $2000 for an impecunious poetess, Mrs. HAWARTH; and what a good man Mrs. VAN DYKE's husband, the Judge, who is going to build the HAWARTH a cottage at Long Branch!

—The physicians of the Rev. ALBERT BARNES have convinced him that it is no longer prudent for him to continue pastoral charge over the congregation to whom he has preached for forty years; so he withdraws. His "Notes" on the New Testament sell as well as ever, and a new and very handsome edition, like the English, is in process of stereotyping by HARPER & BROTHERS.

—Senora DA ANGELA ALVARADO, Spanish, has had a wonderful breathing-spell, having done this planet the honor of appearing upon it one hundred and two years ago. Not long since she counted up three hundred and forty children, grands, great grands, great great grands, and one g. g. g.—which is about as numerous a party as we have known to emanate from any one Spanish lady.

—"Little PARTI," as we middle-age people used to call her, continues to be all the rage in Paris. A gentleman, who writes entertaining letters from that city to a Cincinnati paper, says that "her reappearance was a most brilliant one, and she was welcomed most enthusiastically, appearing first in the favorite rôle of Amina: and it was noticed, by-the-way, that she wore a magnificent pair of diamond ear-rings, present from the Sultan. And the old Turk was quite right to make such a graceful acknowledgment; for even the Light of his Harem, and be she a Nourmahal, can not warble to him such delicious music as our fascinating Italo-American prima donna! We have had more perfect artists—MALIBRAN and GRISI in their palmy days—but never a voice more pure and sympathetic than that of PARTI, never a cantatrice who, from a combination of personal beauty, arch and winning manners, and conscientious artistic culture, was more fascinating on the stage than she. Her toilettes are simply perfect."

—Lord ADELBERT CECIL, one of the F.F.'s of England, is not only a very religious person, but has taken to preaching, and attracts large congregations at the Assembly Rooms, Stamford. He usually conducts the service without assistance.

—General SHERIDAN still hovers about New York, enjoying himself hugely. He is much dined, theatre, Central Park, etc., and understands pretty well what it is to be a popular hero.

—Lord DERBY's "Iliad," having had great sale in England, is about to be published in cheap form. It is not generally known that the profit arising from the copyright is made over by his lordship to Wellington College, and that a Derby Prize for the best, noblest, most open, just, manly, and most beloved boy—if there be any such (selected by his fellows)—receives the prize of £50 each year.

—ANTONIO BABILI, the well-known musician, has turned publisher as well, and is issuing an album of his compositions in ten numbers, containing thirty pieces of music, each of which is dedicated to one of his pupils. The collection makes a beautiful volume, which will doubtless be appreciated by the Signor's friends and admirers, as well as by the musical public at large.

—Mrs. SPOFFORD's sister, MARY PRESCOTT, is said to have fine literary talent.—JEAN INGELOW's poems have sold largely in this country—50,000 copies.—English theatrical manager has offered Mrs. Mowatt RITONIE $30,000 for a certain number of theatrical performances.—The Countess of GAINSBOROUGH, one of Queen VICTORIA's bridesmaids, died recently in England. She long ago became a Romanist. At the funeral Archbishop MANNING, also a convert, preached the sermon.—It is announced that Queen VICTORIA will next season emerge from her comparative seclusion.—The French Empress has purchased several acres of land for the purpose of establishing a model farm.

Silk Button.

See illustration, page 101.

For the benefit of our country readers, who sometimes find it difficult to obtain trimmings, we give an illustration of the process of making a pretty button for cloaks, etc. For this, it is only necessary to cover a wooden button mould with silk, and to wind it with cord and twist in the manner shown in the engraving. Jet beads and bugles may also be sewed on the button with good effect.

Work and Negligé Basket.

See illustration, page 101.

This basket, covered and trimmed in the manner shown in the illustration, forms a tasteful addition to a sitting-room, and will be found very useful for large pieces of work or for a general catch-all. The frame of the basket is twenty-eight inches in height and twenty inches in diameter, and is made of bamboo or other cane. The cover, which is rounding, exactly fits the top of the basket, and is covered with embroidered canvas or cloth. The accompanying pattern, which gives one quarter of the design, is well adapted to this purpose. A curtain or lambrequin, embroidered from the pattern given in our last Number, and trimmed with tassels, falls nearly to the bottom of the basket.

Cravat.

See illustration, page 101.

This cravat is made of lilac ribbon, an inch wide, run through fifteen leaves embroidered in button-hole and lace stitch on muslin. The accompanying illustration shows these leaves of the original size. To make them, draw the pattern on muslin, work the outline in button-hole stitch over a piece of card-board, then cut out the inside and make seven rows of lace stitch within the edge, working the first row in the button-hole stitch, and so on, still over the card-board.

Crochet Under-Skirt.

See illustration, page 101.

MATERIALS: 1 lb. 9 oz. scarlet 12 fold zephyr; 1 strong crochet needle.

This under-skirt is crocheted of scarlet 12 fold zephyr, in Victoria stitch, and is finished on the bottom with a bias strip, scalloped on the edge, in the same stitch. It is three quarters of a yard long and three yards wide.

Worsted and Bead Tassel.

See illustration, page 101.

This tassel is easily made, and serves to trim covers, cushions, pillows, etc. The original is made of six pendants of worsted, each encircled at regular intervals with beads, and finished at the end with bead loops. These pendants are six inches long, and consist of twenty strands each. They are wound at either end with silk, and are sewed fast at the top to a crochet button, suspended from a worsted loop.

Oriental Embroidered Hood.

See illustration, page 101.

This hood is of white cashmere, with a cape, fastened behind with a knot of silk cord, with tasseled ends, and is tied under the chin with cords and tassels. The hood is lined with white silk, with a thin layer of wadding between. Both hood and cape are embroidered with colored crochet silk, in satin stitch, and edged with black lace an inch in width.

CLOTHES-STICKS;

OR,

GRANDPA GRUMP'S RECIPES FOR AMERICAN LADIES.

Showing how to grow Old and Ugly at Twenty-five, and how to make themselves as Miserable as possible.

PREFACE.

DEAR LADIES,—The theory of books on beauty, hygiene, and morals has always been that you were anxious to be happy, handsome, and long-lived; but much watching of your peculiarities has convinced me that this theory is incorrect (though nobody has had the courage to say so), and I am confident that these recipes will meet a great want in your lives and literature. As far as possible I have reduced them to a system, beginning where we must all begin, with the children; and as all systems must have a name, I venture to propose that of "The Chinese method;" for if you will remember what you have read of the solicitude with which these ingenious barbarians squeeze the feet of their female children, and the results, and compare both with the recipes, you can not but agree with me that the title is happy, though the matter, of course, will rest subject to your approval.

For the rest, I beg that it shall be understood that in all this I nowhere express my own opinions, but am simply taking human nature as I find it. And I remain,

Your faithful friend and admirer,
GRANDPA GRUMP.

HOW TO MAKE YOUR CHILD FLABBY AND SICKLY.Rule First.

Always remember that by some strange mistake of the Creator your girls have as many muscles as your boys. These muscles grow with exercise, and the child's young blood will constantly urge her to use them in shouting, running, leaping, and capering. This is a provision of nature. Remember that it is exceedingly difficult to get around a provision of nature; and, unless you commence early, that your child may develop into an active and healthy young lady. Always say hush! when she shouts or sings. If she leaps, or capers, ask her, "Is that like a lady-like little girl?" If she runs, remind her that she has torn her frock, and punish her in proportion to the bigness of the tear. Much may be done also in this line by dressing her in silks, fine muslins, ribbons, laces, crimps, and kid-boots, and impressing on her the importance of these decorations. The child's natural vanity is thus enlisted on your side, and she becomes a law unto herself, so that I have seen a miss of six years for whom already a skip, hop, and jump was clearly impossible, and who walked along Broadway with the mincing propriety of a belle of eighteen.

Rule Second.

You have now two great difficulties before you. More provisions of nature, in fact! The sun constantly builds up that fire that we call vital heat, and the air feeds it; and both are as necessary to us as to our plants. To avoid these provisions of nature in a world full of sunlight and air requires some ingenuity, but our modern civilization accomplishes it. Remember to have curtains at all your windows, and to keep your blinds closed and curtains drawn. See that your daughter avoids the sun, and wears a veil. Have no ventilators in your houses, and your doors and windows fitted perfectly tight. But above all things, place your child at school at the earliest possible age. During five or six of the best hours in the day you can thus make sure that her legs, arms, and muscles generally are kept quiet, per force; and a short calculation will convince you that in this way you can make "nature's provision" null and void for one-third of each year. For the ends we have in view it will be desirable also that the school-room shall be ill-ventilated and closely packed. The blood at every breath comes up to the lungs for oxygen; but if there are thirty girls in a room that holds just air enough for twenty, and no place to let bad air out, or fresh air in, you see that the blood will carry back to the vital organs, instead of oxygen, noxious gases and the waste matter thrown off from each girl's system. It is a beautiful device! A most efficient method for slow poisoning and interchange of diseases!

I take for granted that you will not fail to appreciate it, and I now address myself to the young ladies that it will develop.

HOW TO FOSTER THE SEEDS ALREADY SOWN.Rule First.*Stagnate!*Rule Second.*Stagnate!!*Rule Third.*Stagnate!!!

What do I mean? This, my dear young ladies: Every organ of your body is governed by the same rule as water. To be healthy it must have motion. When unstirred it stagnates and festers. This is why you are continually told by those stupid people who persist that you ought to be healthy, and that you wish to be healthy, to exercise till you find yourself in a gentle glow. Their "gentle glow" means that your body has received a new impulse and motion of heat; and in fact, it is by such impulses that the body is kept in good working order. But we want that stillness of bearing and freedom from emotion that is called lady-like, and how is one to attain such a demeanor, I should like to know, with a great bouncable body in "good working order?" Faugh! We are going to compress you, after the Chinese method, down to a clothes-stick. And now I come back to my rules of stagnation.

RULES FOR MAKING OF CLOTHES-STICKS.

Rise late. By the time that you have had your fourth nap after daylight you will feel that life is a muddle. You are then in a fine humor for getting up. Dawdle. If you like to be cross you may sulk; but you are not to be angry for fear of rousing yourself. Drink a cup of coffee or a glass of wine, but push away your breakfast; for, in consideration of our objects, you should harry and worry your stomach as you would your bitterest enemy. Never let it know what to expect, or give it stated periods of rest. Decline your meals, and nibble cakes, caramels, sweet-meats, and pastries; here a little, and there a little. This constant teasing and provoking will result in dyspepsia, bad teeth, and bad breath, and bring us well on toward our objects.

Avoid all exercise beyond a slow walk. Don't climb, for it will cut your shoes. Never be brisk, or you will get flushed. Never bake or sweep, for that is vulgar, and will spoil your hands. Never walk on country roads, for you will soil your skirts, and besides, all these things have brutal tendencies toward health!

Better than all these precautions, however, is the habit of tight lacing. By all means pull the string tighter every day. It will be well, even, if you will sleep in your corsets; you will lose less time, and accomplish a great many delightful results. By perseverance you will shut up the air-cells in the lower part of your lungs, and you may entertain reasonable hopes of a consumption in good season. By constant squeezing you may also contract your stomach. You will thus be forced to eat very much less. The manufacture of blood will be correspondingly diminished; and in this way, while eating duly three meals a day, you can reduce your system to a half-starved condition. The squeezing, besides, will push other important organs out of their places. These diseased organs will act on others, and the disorder will go on increasing, something as circles widen in the water when you throw in a stone. You are not to expect all these effects at once, however. Curb your impatience. At this stage you are only tending the seeds of our harvest. For the present, you must be content to be languid, perhaps a little pale, and possibly to want appetite, or have short breath, at the most.

RULES FOR MENTAL PRESSURE.

Clothes-sticks, you know, have no heads. If you will be a perfect and complete clothes-stick, you must dispense with all of yours but the shell. Consider your brain as an old lumber-room. Lay away the few declensions, boundaries, rules, and problems that you have learned, in the dust, and forget them. If you hear your father or brothers talking with men of intelligence, don't listen to them, but commence to chit-chat with somebody about crochet or a dress-trimming. Read nothing but sensation novels. Be careful to learn nothing of life outside of your set. Avoid women who have had any experience of life as stupid and dull. You can come near, in this way, to a perfect vacuum in your mental arrangements, and will be at liberty to concentrate your ambition and energy on fashion-plates and husband-hunting; and having nothing to do but to get new dresses and wait for a husband, you have reached our ideal. You are now good clothes-sticks, and we are at liberty to touch on the important subject of—Matrimony.

Rule First.

You will have observed that the people who make you happy are the good people; therefore, if a good man admires you snub him as prosy.

Rule Second.

To scare away men of sense laugh continually, and ask how they can be so sarcastic?

Rule Third.

You know that a man who gets drunk is likely to beat his wife, and sure to disgrace his children; and that a licentious man betrays women, and will betray his wife. Therefore, if a fast man offers you his admiration, regard him with a certain favor due to your notion that there is something manly and dashing in betraying women, and in staggering about too drunk to talk distinctly.

Rule Fourth.

As your husband will be your master, and can make you the most happy or the most miserable of women, be careful to know beforehand as little as possible about his habits and temper.

If you follow faithfully these directions you have reason to hope that you will get a bad husband, in which case you will have no further need of me, as he can make you sufficiently miserable. But if by chance you prove unsuccessful, here are the following recipes for making a bad husband out of a good one.

RECIPES FOR DISENCHANTMENT.First.

Lay aside for company wear your smiles and the pretty coquetties with which you beguiled him. Meet him tired and complaining, or dawdling and frony. Wear your hair badly. Lounge ungracefully. Discard courtesies and elegances of manner. Photograph yourself over and again in his unwilling memory in your worst looks, and most disagreeable phases. This will correct certain hazy theories of his about your superiority to the rest of womankind, and will bring you down to a level where he can look at you critically; and this will commence to cool his affection, for no one of us is good and great enough to bear scrutiny without a little mist of affection about us.

Next.

Men are coarse creatures at the best. They have no fine intuitions. He will not suspect at first that you are a clothes-stick. He will think that you are a woman, and that you are fond of him. In that case snub him. Meet his ill-imagined demonstrations with assurances that he is silly, and that now he has ruffled your crimps and curls.

This will do away with his day-dreams about a pleasant-faced little woman, who should always meet him with a kiss.

Thirdly.

As soon as possible give him a taste of your temper. Sulk or storm, whichever is your forte. In spite of himself his remembrances of you will grow gradually to be shrewish and snarling.

Fourthly.

Be as unreasonable as possible. Insist that his cares are nothing to yours. When he is tired declare that he is cross or stupid; and remind him continually that he once was agreeable. This will teach him to think with dread of coming home.

Fifthly.

Never lose a chance to twit him. If he mistakes or errs in judgment, or fails in any undertaking, never let him hear the last of it. This will teach him to tell you nothing, and to keep his business to himself.

Sixthly.

Neglect him. Take no heed of his buttons. If he hates shad have it every day in the season. If he likes a bright fire don't have it. This is to irritate him with the conviction that, though he provides the house, he is of no consequence in it.

Seventhly.

Always be odd when he is even. If he asks you to drive have a bit of sewing to finish. If he is going on a journey discover sixteen excellent reasons why you should stay at home. If he talks to you about his business, say that you can not understand it, and go to sleep while listening to his pet plan. This will bring him gradually to the conviction that you are two instead of one, and that if he finds sympathy he must look for it elsewhere.

Next.

Resign the management of his house to your servants. Walk through your kitchen occasionally, but declare that though you know the waste is frightful you can not be at the trouble of constantly fighting your servants. This will create a steady drain on his resources, and give him an encouraging sensation of climbing up hill with a stone about his neck.

Again.

Drop your accomplishments. Forget the very little you ever knew. Read nothing. Take no interest in the events of the day. Immerse yourself in Berlin wools and crochet. Your husband, while you are thus falling behind, will learn and advance if he does nothing but mingle with other men. In this way he will be forced to admit to himself that you are a very ordinary woman, and that he must expect no real companionship from you.

Finally.

Never lose a chance to quarrel, and in every quarrel be careful to tell him of all the blunders he has committed, and of the contempt that you feel for him.

This will bring him to a feeling of active dislike, which he will soon make manifest if he is not a saint and a martyr; and, meanwhile, you will have discovered a change in yourself; for we are coming now to our harvest and the results of our first recipes.

How shall I describe this change? Suppose rusted wheels and rotting wood; set the motion, and it snaps here and breaks there, and is with difficulty patched up, and finally crumbles into powder. The wife and mother is the commandant of the home fortress. She should have some knowledge and much ability and activity to govern well. As you knew nothing beyond dress-trimmings and the declensions and boundaries, and had at once to learn and govern, your position was one of great difficulty. You needed at least that body in "fine working order" of which we made light a while back; and you brought half a stomach, two-thirds of a pair of lungs, shrunken muscles, and cold, thin blood. Like the rusted machinery, it was snap here and break there. You have dyspepsia. There are two or three things that you do eat, and every thing else that you are not to touch. You have low spirits, and a gray complexion, or yellow spots on your face. You have grown very thin. You dawdle now of necessity, for you are always so tired of mornings. You have continual headaches, till you know by heart the very beginning of the pain over your left eye. Your hair has commenced to fall. You are ill when you walk. You have aches, and pains, and stitches, and cramps. People say you are nervous, and that all American women are sickly. You are nervous. You are afraid of the steam cars, and horses, and burglars, and accidents in general. Your husband and children may or may not be kind, but in any case they have their outside occupations and pleasures in which you have neither strength nor spirit to share. If you were clever and intelligent you would still have a hold on society. If you had courage and activity you might have interests with your family. If you had heart and mind, though flat on your bed, you might be desired both of society and your family. But a woman who has lost her freshness and has no wit, an old clothes-stick, on whom jaunty hats and dresses are now ridiculous, you must be laid aside or remain so much useless lumber in the way, when you should be in the prime and glory of your womanhood.

Such a woman, in the abstract, must be regarded as a failure; but as the result of the Chinese method, and of my recipes, she is a success; and as such I present her to the consideration of American ladies now in training for clothes-sticks.

IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN.A new Version of an old Story.

WEBSTER HOXIE was playing a part. People do not fall into a somnolent state in a twinkling, and he had been wide awake, staring with great brown eyes into the coal-fire when the little French clock on the mantle struck four. Two minutes after, when the widow Hoxie and Bessie Appleton entered the room, they had found his great shaggy head thrown back in the crimson easy-chair, his eyes closed, and his breathing heavy and regular, like one in sound sleep.

"Poor boy!" sighed the widow Hoxie, who always seemed to see a vision of youth in her son Webster notwithstanding his thirty years, his heavily bearded face, his stalwart frame, and manly, independent ways. "Poor boy! his journey has worn him quite out. Bessie, my child, he's a handsome boy, isn't he?"

"Boy!" echoed Bessie Appleton's cheery voice. "Why, Mrs. Hoxie, he is 'bearded like a pard,' and I suppose he is ever so old!"

"Oh no, Bessie, he was only thirty his last birthday," replied the widow Hoxie. "Thirty years! Why it seems to me only yesterday that I held him, a babe, in my arms. There's been many changes since then, Bessie, and he's had his ups and downs too."

"Yes, ma'am, I suppose he was very much down when—"

"Hush!" said the widow Hoxie, laying her finger on her lips. "Don't ever mention that woman's name in his presence. I've had the hardest work to keep the girls still, and they're going to her wedding to-night."

"Yes, ma'am; we were looking at her carte de visite to-day when Mr. Webster came in. I hid it as quick as I could in the folds of my dress. I knew you took Miss—her picture out of the parlor, and hung it with its face to the wall in the attic, and I wouldn't have let him see that carte de visite for the world."

"You are quite right, my child," said Mrs. Hoxie, approvingly. "I am glad to see you so considerate. And you know, dear, you have a great way of quoting Miss—that woman's opinions and doings and dress. Do be careful now that dear Web has come."

"Yes, ma'am," was the obedient answer. "I declare, Mrs. Hoxie, here is a book on the parlor-table that has her name in it—'Rose Austin Murray.' Shall I take it up to the garret and put it with the picture, and the port-folio of her sketchings, and the sofa-pillow she made?"

"Yes, dear; and don't say a word about the wedding. Give the girls a caution too, and go quietly up stairs after tea and get ready."

"If you'd rather I wouldn't go I won't stir a step," said Bessie Appleton, pausing at the door.

"No, my child; you've made great reckoning on it, and it would be too bad to keep you home. Of course I haven't any respect for that woman, but she has never wronged you or the girls."

"Mrs. Hoxie, if you please—"

"Yes, Bessie," and the mild-faced woman smiled pleasantly on the girl, who stood at the door blushing violently and twisting the knob in awkward indecision.

"If you please, Mrs. Hoxie—I would be glad if you—I mean I—"

Bessie broke quite down. Mrs. Hoxie looked puzzled.

"Yes, my child," she said, encouragingly.

"That's just it," said Bessie, abruptly. "I like to have you; it's very sweet to me; but since Mr. Webster has come—you know I am no relation, and he might not like it. Besides, the girls laughed to-day when you said it, and made some very silly remarks. I am very sensitive. I hope you are not offended."

"My child, I don't understand at all."

"If you'd please not call me your child," said Bessie, suddenly, looking very foolish and very pretty as she gave the door-knob a decided wrench and stood with the evident intention of escaping as soon as practicable.

"What upon earth!" exclaimed the old lady.

"Why, my—why, Bessie!"

The old lady laughed until the tears rolled down her face.

"I know it was foolish. I beg your pardon," said Bessie, with hot crimson cheeks and head drooped low.

"Well, I'll remember, Bessie," said Mrs. Hoxie. "As for Web's caring, he's altogether too generous for that. Web has a great heart, my dear. That woman over yonder, who will look like a queen to-night in her satin and pearls, don't know what a noble heart she has bartered for another man's gold."

"No, ma'am," and Bessie went out.

"Whatever put that in the girl's head?" mused the widow Hoxie. "It must have been Kate and Ethel's work. So foolish! Web isn't likely to get over that woman's treatment. Silly women do have such a power over strong men!"

Three girls and the widow Hoxie, holding a white dress between them, half an hour after, dropped the dress and their tones in sudden fright as Webster Hoxie entered. Bessie Appleton was the first to recover her equanimity, and she gathered up the thin white robe and thrust it in a closet. Webster Hoxie's eyes followed her with an odd expression in their depths.

"What does this mean?" he asked. "Any body would think you were making a dress to wear to my wife's funeral."

"He came pretty near hitting it," whispered Kate Hoxie, crossing over to Bessie Appleton; "it's to wear to his fiancée's wedding."

"Mother," he said, suddenly throwing himself on the sofa, "where is my old sofa-pillow?"

"Bessie put it away," replied Mrs. Hoxie, evasively.

"I would thank Miss Appleton to replace it," said Webster Hoxie.

Bessie looked up with a frightened face. To be called Miss Appleton by Webster Hoxie was a strange thing. An orphan whom Mrs. Hoxie had taken to educate, and who had grown to be the educator of Mrs. Hoxie's nieces, she had always been called Bessie by the son of her foster-mother. She glanced from the son to his mother, and seeing the anxiety on her face, said: "The pillow is faded and very shabby, Sir."

"Bessie shall make you a new one," said Mrs. Hoxie.

"I don't like new things. They don't look well established," said Webster Hoxie, a trifle ungraciously. "If Miss Appleton will bring me my pillow I will be much obliged."

Bessie went to the attic and brought down the pillow.

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Webster Hoxie, shaking it vigorously and surveying the handsome worsted pattern, somewhat faded. "That has ten years' service in it yet. What signifies the fading of these outside wools? The utility of a sofa-pillow depends on its feathers. It's as good, for all practical purposes, as the day it was made;" and Webster Hoxie settled his great shaggy head on the faded sofa-pillow, as complacently as if it had no memories to haunt or vex him.

"What have you done to the walls?" he asked, after a minute's pause, glancing around the room. "They look very naked. Haven't you taken some of the pictures away? Miss Appleton, what is missing?"

"There was a picture over the mantle," said Bessie, hesitatingly.

"I knew there was something bright and cheerful taken away," exclaimed Webster Hoxie. "I always want something to relieve the nakedness of the walls—a bit of color of some sort, it don't make much matter what it is."

"I'll put up one of the landscapes to-morrow," said Mrs. Hoxie.

"Nonsense!" rejoined her son. "That won't look natural. When I went away three years ago an oval frame encircling a bright face hung over the mantle. Miss Appleton, if you have stowed such a picture away, may I trouble you to replace it?"

Bessie brought down the picture. It was that of a young girl with golden hair and pale-blue eyes, a face delicately tinted and perfect in outline. Webster Hoxie looked at it carelessly.

"It isn't much of a face," he said, indifferently. "But it suggests life and color, and is better than the bare walls."

"By-the-way," he added, after a little pause, and as if he was inquiring for the merest acquaintance, "what has become of Rose Murray?"

Mrs. Hoxie's face was full of trouble, and she hesitated for a reply.

Webster Hoxie looked from one to the other.

"If she is dead," he said, "don't hesitate to tell me. It is the common fate of mortals."

"She is dead to you, Webster, my son," said the widow Hoxie, sadly.

"Requiescat in pace!" was the calm rejoinder. A moment after he asked, "If she is dead to me, what is she to the rest of the world?"

"Almost a bride," said the widow Hoxie, desperately, as one tells the truth on the rack.

"Ah!" exclaimed Webster Hoxie, with an unmoved face. "I am glad she is not quite a bride. It will be a rare sight to see a dead face wreathed with orange blossoms, and hear dead lips articulate words that men and recording angels write. When can the sight be seen?"

"To-night at seven," replied the widow Hoxie, reluctantly. "You will not go?"

"I would not miss it for a kingdom," was the earnest answer. "Cousins," he said, turning to Kate and Ethel Hoxie, "I imagine your omnipresent escorts will be in attendance to-night. Miss Appleton"—turning to Bessie—"have you a lover too?"

The tone was bantering. Bessie took her cue from it.

"No," she answered, "I am in a waiting posture till Providence vouchsafes me one."

"Will you change your posture, thank Providence, and take one as a godsend for to-night?" he asked.

Bessie looked at Mrs. Hoxie, perplexed and doubtful.

"Yes, my dear," said that good woman. "If Webster will go, you must go with him. Dear! dear!" she muttered, when the door had closed after her son. "I wish he would not go; but when Web makes up his mind he is immovable as a mountain."

Rose Austin Murray was a beautiful bride, at least her satin, and pearls, and the tresses of golden hair that were not covered, and the point lace veil that hid a white face were beautiful, and these are the things that go far toward making up a bride's beauty.

Bessie Appleton was a little in doubt about her escort. She watched him as a keeper might watch a half-trained elephant, uncertain and fearful as to his next movements.

When the bridal party entered Webster Hoxie had glanced up quickly and scanned the bride's face curiously. During the ceremony he stood with folded arms, and at its close gave his arm to Bessie Appleton.

"Come," he said, "congratulations are in order."

If she had been the merest acquaintance his address had not been more free from embarrassment. He took the hand all took, said the words all said, and added commonplaces as if he did not see that the woman's lips had blanched and her words were unsteady. When at length he turned away he said, as if to himself:

"Dead, and decently buried!"

Bessie Appleton, remembering the woman's blanched lips and unsteady tones, thought of the heathen burial of living hearts.

Telling Mrs. Hoxie the next day how calm and indifferent her son had been, she said:

"He made me think of David, who, when his servants dared not tell him of his child's death, astonished them all by arising from the earth, washing and anointing himself, and changing his apparel, worshipping and eating as if his grief were past."

It was a rainy day, and up in the attic Bessie Appleton, looking over books and papers, came to the port-folio of sketches she had stowed away at Mrs. Hoxie's bidding. She had her lap full, when there was a footstep on the stair, and Webster Hoxie, with two or three bounds, had cleared the stairs and stood by her side. It had been the work of a moment for her to thrust the port-folio and sketches under a pile of papers, and she sat trying to look unconscious when Webster Hoxie spoke.

There was nothing like an attic on rainy days, he said. They were full of trash and treasures. He had been nearer Heaven when, a boy, he had played in the attic than he had ever been since. He had been on the highest peak of the Sierra Nevada, watching the Chinese tunneling, not to mention the summit of Mount Washington; but his heart was full of worldly ambition, and he had lost the simple goodness he had dreamed about when, tired of play, he had fallen asleep to the sound of pattering rain-drops in the attic, and angels had come to him on a ladder as beautiful as the old patriarch's. That attic was his Bethel.

Here, turning over the papers carelessly, he came across the hidden port-folio. Suddenly his mood changed. Miss Appleton had hidden that, he said. Ever since he had been home every one had been mysterious and secretive. They had talked in whispers and stopped suddenly when he appeared. They had changed the furniture, and books, and pictures. They had made him think of corpses, and ghosts, and skeletons with rattling bones. They evidently thought because it was woman-like to be false it was man-like to be foolish. They thought because a man pursued a shadow once he must go on pursuing shadows forever. He pointed to a wax doll with which Bessie Appleton had played when a child. She worshiped it once, he said; but when she found that the cheeks were not proof against soap-suds and the eyes were soulless, she did not break her heart—she only despised it and laid it one side. It did not become a haunting memory or an embittering dream. Rose Murray was no more to him than that wax doll was to Miss Appleton.

Bessie Appleton was provoked to retort. Their conduct had at least the merit of kind intention. Henceforth Mr. Hoxie should have no reason to complain of silence in regard to his old fiancée. For present amusement she would suggest an examination of the port-folio sketches.

For the future she would plan some parties and entertainments in which the lady should not be missing.

Webster Hoxie looked at Bessie Appleton curiously. He had forgotten that three years make women of girls; and his first surprise at seeing Bessie Appleton was to find her a woman. Now he was more surprised to find her such a woman. Webster Hoxie liked spirit. In his early manhood he had admired gentle and placid women. Rose Murray had cured him of that. Now he feared natures that were not true enough to themselves and the truth for honest indignation. In his gaze at Bessie Appleton that other woman's face thrust itself in by way of contrast. The other face was rounder and fairer—judged by color and contour it was infinitely prettier; but Webster Hoxie saw in the woman before him something sweeter, truer, and purer than mere physical beauty. To the man came some new thoughts, standing there and thinking of the delicate sensitiveness of the woman before him. Three years before Bessie Appleton had been something more than a servant, something less than a friend. Henceforth she was to be his equal.

His new tone of address spoke the change. If he had been rude he begged Miss Appleton's pardon. Nothing could afford him more pleasure than to show her the pictures in the port-folio. Here was a copy of a Madonna. He had done that years ago, thinking the eyes were like Rose Murray's. He had seen truth, purity, and unchanging love in them once. Now they were only lines on the paper, and the woman's eyes were only color, nerves, and lenses. They represented nothing more to him. There was a cluster of forget-me-nots which Rose Murray had sketched for his mother. She had vowed a dozen times, while the sketch was in progress, that she would never change or forget. In less than a year she had asked for a release from the engagement with him. There was an arbor and a rustic seat, where she had declared that her love for him was the one love of her life. Such words were very precious if the future held their proof and vindication. They were vain without it. He said all this as calmly as if he were telling facts in history, and, when he had finished, replaced the port-folio on the table.

"It is an affectation to hide it away from sight," he said. "I wear no crape on my hat if there is no mourning in my heart."

Bessie Appleton listened and wondered. "She is less to him than the merest acquaintance," she thought. "She is less to him even than I. I should hate to be forgotten by a man like Webster Hoxie."

Reader, I might as well stop here. With the foreknowledge for which readers are remarkable, you have already predicated the end. You drew the mental conclusion some time ago that Webster Hoxie and Bessie Appleton should fall in love. It was a legitimate conclusion. Falling in love is the habit of unmarried men and women. It had been the mistake of Webster Hoxie's youth to fall in love with pretty tints, nerves, lenses, complexion, hair, the curl of a feather, the cut of a dress, the adjustment of a ribbon, the size of a slipper, the fit of a glove, and a hundred other things that perish with the using. It is a common error, growing out of the fallacious inference that these trifles represent qualities of heart and soul that alone command abiding love. Woe to the man who learns his error after his lips have vowed to love, honor, and protect! Webster Hoxie had escaped that woe, and gained in his escape a new estimate of woman. Bessie Appleton day by day was subject to this new estimate. She was a good woman, and in the end—well, you were right; Webster Hoxie found himself in love, not with the fading charms that had made Rose Murray lovable, but with the truth and faithfulness of a real womanly heart.

Does a question of reciprocity suggest itself? Straws indicate which way the wind blows. Bessie Appleton's remark, "I should hate to be forgotten by a man like Webster Hoxie," was a straw. It indicated that the remembrance of a man like Webster Hoxie would be sweet. So the wind set in that quarter.

Webster Hoxie, for years a married man, recently returning from a tour toward the Far West beyond the Mississippi, welcomed by a loving wife and darling children, looked around his pleasant home, pretty in its order and simple elegance; looked on his wife, and quoted, looking back into the past,

"Of all the glad words of tongue or pen, The gladdest are these, 'It might have been.'"

He was thinking of a woman he saw in his Western travels—a faded, tawdry woman, a discontented and unloving wife, a peevish and negligent mother. She might have been his discontented and unloving wife, and to his children a negligent and peevish mother, for in her youth the woman's name was Rose Austin Murray.

FEMALE DRESS.

THE manner in which the ladies of the present period wear many of their garments directly impairs their health, because they interfere with their vital functions. If a cord tightly drawn, or a belt closely buckled, were habitually worn round the body by a man, the result would be discoverable in a defective circulation, and also in the organs of digestion. A continued compression of the viscera against the spine acts directly on the largest and most essential artery of the body by obstructing a necessary current of blood vital to the abdominal region and lower extremities. Again, if close-fitting gum-elastic bands were placed on the arms of strong, muscular men, with a view to holding their shirt-sleeves at a certain point of extension, as ladies do for keeping delicate under-sleeves in place, the blood running through large veins just under the skin would be obstructed to the injury of the limb.

Its muscular strength would soon be impaired, and the arm would diminish in size.

If such injury would inevitably result to a man under the circumstances described they would also produce the same misfortune in a female. No bands, elastics, clasps, or other ligatures which prevent the free circulation of the blood, should be tolerated for a moment. Untold thousands of brilliant, beautiful, and intellectual women have been hurried to a premature grave before they had fairly begun to live by the inexorable decrees of absurd fashions in dress.

"GIVE ME A VIOLET!"

In a darkened attic room,
Where the shadows and the gloom
Seem to whisper of the tomb,
Sits a woman wondrous fair,
Sunlight in her golden hair.

"Give me a violet!" she cries.
"A violet?" the air replies;
And shadows gleam with weird surprise.
Then the tears fall softly down
On the faded, battered gown.

"None to give me a violet now;
No dear kiss on my burning brow;
Nothing but toil, and tears, and woe."
So the world goes on for aye,
And women toil, and strive, and die.

Away from the city's dust and whirl
A little brook, with loving purl,
Sings softly as the wavelets curl.
Two lovers on the glittering sands
Are standing with their clasped hands.

"Give me a violet!" she sings.
Lightly a blue-eyed one he brings,
And in her golden hair it clings.
Under her feet he throws them down.
"Always thus," he says, "my own!"

Years have parted the lovers now.
One in the attic room must bow;
One where Italia's sunbeams glow,
Where, with his genius and restless pride,
He never will know how his darling died.

'Neath a lonely grave in a pauper's ground,
Where only cloud-tears fall on the mound,
And the only sighs are the winds around,
She sleeps, this day of Spring so fair,
While violets lovingly nestle there.

Frock for Child from 1 to 2 Years old.

See illustration on double page.

This pretty little frock is of light-brown poplin, lined with muslin, and trimmed with white silk cord, brown silk braid, and small mother-of-pearl buttons. The waist is pleated in the front and the back, as shown in the illustration, and set into a straight yoke. A belt confines the dress at the waist. For the body, cut the outside and lining of the front from Fig. 21, allowing for the hem at the bottom, and from Fig. 22, two equal pieces, taking care to notice the piece turned down. Baste the outside and lining together, and cut the front of the yoke from Fig. 23; from Figs. 24 and 25, two pieces each, for the shoulders and back of the yoke, and from Fig. 26 the sleeves. On the left side of the back of the yoke allow an inch for turning down. Baste the outside and lining of the body together, sew from bottom to *, Fig. 22, and lay the top in pleats, from X to • to correspond with the letters. On the left side of the slit leave an inch of the stuff for a false hem, which is hemmed down on the right side, join the body from 38 to 39, putting on the braid, buttons, and cord as shown in the engraving. Hem the bottom, and trim with four rows of braid. Cord the yoke and shoulders, and set on the body to correspond with the figures on the pattern. Sew up the sleeves from 48 to 49, cord the bottom, trim with lace and buttons, and sew them in the arm-holes with a cord. Put two buttons and loops on the back of the yoke, and trim the yoke with four rows of braid. The belt is lined with muslin, with interlining between, and is about two inches wide; it is trimmed with four rows of braid, and is basted on the front of the frock and fastened behind with a rosette of the same material as the outside, corded. A needle-work band is basted in the neck and sleeves.

Morning Dress.

See illustration on double page.

This morning dress and jacket is made of gray flannel, embroidered in chain stitch with black crochet silk in the manner shown in the engraving. Velvet ribbon or braid may also be used. The jacket and dress are fastened in front with black crochet buttons and loops. For the jacket, cut the outside, interlining, and silk lining, from Figs. 27 and 28, each two pieces, from Fig. 29 one piece, and from Fig. 30 the sleeves, being careful to notice the slope of the under part. Baste the outside on the interlining, embroider with the silk, put in the lining, and join the whole; then bind the edge with braid, and finish with buttons and button-holes.

Morning Dress with Greek Sleeves.

See illustration on double page.

The pattern of this morning dress was given in our last Supplement. It is made of brown cashmere, trimmed with wide silk braid as shown in the illustration, and confined by a brown silk cord and tassel. The sleeves are somewhat wider at the top than the bottom, and are lined with brown silk. The close under-sleeves to match the dress.

Feather Barette.

See illustration on double page.

This tasteful hat is made wholly of curled feathers, which are sewed on a stiff foundation, gray feathers being used for the crown, and black ones for the brim. The shape is given in Supplement, Figs. 39-41. The feathers are set on one by one, and are each fastened to the foundation with a stitch, so that the bottom of one covers that of the next, the feathers having first been curled by being drawn across the back of a warm penknife. The hat is lined with silk, which is hemmed over on the right side, and forms a binding. It may be finished with an aigrette like that given in our last Number, which also shows the mode of setting on the feathers.

THE STORY OF A LONDON FOG.

My first year of married life—it is now some twenty years ago—was also my first of residence in London, and on very limited means. Having agreed to prefer a small income together to waiting for a larger one far apart, Edgar Linton and myself were also agreed that we would be satisfied with what that income would give us, and bide our time for the rest. He enjoyed society as much as any one, and was as hospitable at heart then as he is now (he is not listening, is he? deep in his new book—that is all right); but he knew that society and hospitality were luxuries to be only sparingly indulged in, and we neither accepted invitations to dinner, nor for some time did we give any. With my own free-will this time would have lasted longer; but I was not to have my own way in this matter, even during that first year of bridal supremacy.

"There are two things, my love, which you will have to make up your mind to put up with," had been Edgar's warning when we were discussing our plans before marriage; "one is London smoke, of which your country notions give you a very inadequate idea; and the other, of which you have no idea whatever, is the friendliness of my friend Mrs. Popham. If your capacity for happiness prevail over these two little obstacles, I have no fears about the rest."

I laughed as I assured him I had none on the subject; and for some months after we were settled in our small home in — Street, and I had learned how trying London "blacks" could be to senses accustomed to pure breezes and liberal cleanliness—how impossible it was to preserve muslin and chintz from darkening shadows, or to handle a book from Edgar's well-filled shelves without the preliminary ceremonial of a serious dusting—I had more than once rallied him on his second grievance, and remarked that friendliness in London was by no means so overwhelming as I had been led to suppose. A note of congratulation and a pair of gilt candlesticks, which never stood steadily enough to be of any use, had, so far, been all I had seen of the dreadful Mrs. Popham. She lived at that time at Richmond, and was, in fact, too much engaged during the season to think of us, and as she always went to the sea in August, it was not till October that her visits began; but once begun, my little jokes on the subject were effectually stopped. She was very imposing in her personal appearance, both from her size and the magnificent extent of her rustling silk dress; and when she sat down in our little drawing-room, looked so utterly disproportioned to it, that I felt as if I ought to apologize for not offering her more spacious accommodation. This, in itself, was not much of a grievance, and I soon ceased to think it so, after I had been assured several times, in the most emphatic manner, that my house was the most charming little nest in the world, and that Mrs. Popham had said to her Georgina over and over again, that, for real comfort and happiness, give her just such a sized sitting-room as dear Mrs. Linton's. The first day she came she looked at every thing in the room, and asked its history. This rather amused me, and helped off the shyness of a first visit.

The second time she sat in judgment on my house-keeping, and cross-questioned me on the amount of my weekly bills, the consumption of tea and sugar in my kitchen, the efficiency of my servants, and a variety of other points on which I was not at all disposed to stand an examination, even though it wound up with praise of my excellent management, and envy at the peacefulness of my lot. But I remembered Edgar's words, and that her husband's father had been a kind friend of Edgar's father, and that as his house of business did the business of the Pophams, it was better that we should remain the affectionate friends we were. So I kept my feelings to myself, and was as courteous to Mrs. Popham as I felt was due to us both. She tried my patience very much that autumn, certainly. She would drive in to luncheon uninvited, bringing her daughter with her, whom I knew to be exceedingly fastidious, and very much spoiled, and who did not think it necessary, as her mother did, to appear charmed with every thing upon the table. As we kept but two maid-servants, it was something very inconvenient to provide such guests with the delicacies they expected at a short notice; and Mrs. Popham would let me know on arriving that she had no time to spare—that dear Georgy was ordered hot luncheons and port-wine, and might she ask if it could be ready immediately, as they had a great deal to do, and the days were shortening so fast? She had brought me a few grapes and a little celery, both of which I could have done without, and thankfully, rather than run the risk of spoiling Edgar's dinner by putting my active but hasty cook out of temper for the rest of the day. Then, when she had a married daughter staying with her, she would send in her three little girls to spend the day with me; their nurse (also a guest hard to please) bringing written instructions what they might eat and drink, and how late they might stay to tea before the carriage fetched them home. I am really fond of children, and can make myself very happy with a little girl or two for my companions, when I am at leisure and in spirits to amuse them, and be amused by their prattle and fun; but these grandchildren of Mrs. Popham's were pets, who had learned the art of tiring out every body who came near them; and very tiring indeed I found them for the first two or three visits. Dissected puzzles, which I had been at the pains to procure as an unexceptionable diversion, were spurned as being stupid and like lessons; a doll from the Soho Bazar, whose muslin dress and blue sash would have been a dazzling vision in my early days, was despised because cousins had a Princess Royal, whose eyes opened and shut; and an offer of a popular story-book nearly led to its being torn to pieces, in the struggle as to who should look at the pictures first. A bright suggestion of mine, remembering a delight of my own childhood, proved at last successful; and the three little girls being each furnished with a piece of dough, their sleeves tucked up, and their frocks properly protected, were happier one afternoon making cakes than I believe they had ever before in their short, ill-trained lives. The worst of it was that they were wild to come again to-morrow, and tormented every body till they did come; but from that day I gained a certain amount of influence over them, as a dispenser of undreamed-of pleasures, that made it easier to insist on a proportionate amount of good behavior.

"I know who spoils my grandchildren," Mrs. Popham observed, the next time she called. "Really, my dear Mrs. Linton, you have so stolen those little hearts of theirs I am growing quite jealous, and shall be asking soon if I may not come and make cakes myself. Seriously, it is a very good thing to learn how such articles are made, even when you are raised above the necessity of making them; and I dare say you understand a vast deal more that is useful—it is natural and proper that you should—than either of my daughters with all their advantages. I always said to Edgar Linton when I spoke to him of matrimony, 'Whatever you do, my dear Edgar, choose a wife for useful qualities, not for what may be showy for a time, but will, in your position, be of no real service in the end.' I did, indeed, and I am sure he is grateful to me now. I was very much interested in his selecting well and judiciously; I assure you it was a bold measure in any one to accept him, she was sure to be so narrowly criticised. Mr. Popham and myself have always had his welfare deeply at heart, and were so afraid of his choosing, as young men will, some one toward whom we could not feel as we do to you, dear. But now, we often say, we know no house where so much comfort reigns, because there is no attempt at too much. It is just what I most admire—simple taste and no pretension."

Well, this was all very gratifying, no doubt, or might have been had I received it as it was intended I should; but I must confess it made me angry to be praised for want of pretension by Mrs. Popham, and I did not care to know that she was relieved of a great anxiety by Edgar's choice of a useful wife. I turned it off with the best grace I could, and an allusion to the "Vicar of Wakefield" and Mulready's picture of "The Wedding Gown;" both of which allusions fell rather flat, on account of Mrs. Popham's not having read the one or understood the other. However, she was good enough to pretend to see my meaning, wished she had my memory, and that her countless avocations and engagements would allow her time to read, and took leave, repeating her gracious assurance of her being quite jealous of my favor with her sweet grandchildren.

When those treasures next came they were full of quite a new topic, before which even the glories of little pigs with currant eyes, and no particular tail, grew dim and poor. They had a cousin come to stay with them, Cousin Edith Acton—quite grown up, but a nice cousin, who was not always in the drawing-room or driving out in the carriage, like mamma and Aunt Georgy, but constantly in the nursery, helping nurse to arrange all their frocks and things, and playing with them at such delightful games, you had no idea. A little questioning elicited further information. Sophy, the eldest Miss Hounslow, who sometimes startled me with her resemblance to Mrs. Popham, explained that Cousin Edith was not come only as a visitor, but to be useful, as she was dependent on the goodness of grandpapa and grandmamma for a home, instead of being thrown upon strangers; and Aunt Georgy had said it was odious to have poor relations in the house, always supposed to be martyrs, and filling up the place of pleasant people—but grandmamma had promised Cousin Edith should never be in the way, and she never was. Should I not like her to come next time, and might that be the day after to-morrow? I declined this favor with thanks, and heard no more of the new-comer till Mrs. Popham brought her to call. Before I had time to do much more than observe a kind, gentle face, rather care-worn, with clear honest eyes, and a mouth of great sweetness, Mrs. Popham, without giving me any notice, ordered her up to my bedroom to look at the pattern of the chintz. "I had an argument about it yesterday with my daughters, and we could not agree about the colors, so please, dear Edith, do study them thoroughly so as to settle the dispute. Oh, and by-the-way, I dare say you may look into the spare room at that sweet sketch of the Lake of Thun, taken by a cousin of Mrs. Linton's—quite a little gem—I have longed to steal it, and carry it away with me, ever since I saw it there."

Edith Acton hesitated, and blushed as she half turned to me for permission, her look and manner pleading her apology so well that I did my best to remove her annoyance by cordially making her welcome. I knew Mrs. Popham only wanted her out of the room, and so did she. As soon as she left us her kinswoman began:

"There, my dear Mrs. Linton, that is my last imprudence. Where my heart is concerned my head is often at fault; and it is a rash measure to undertake such a responsibility—but what can I do? She has no home, except with relations as poor as herself—family misfortunes, you know—even ours has not escaped the vicissitudes of life from which the wealthiest are not secure. I often think how much happier those are who have but little to lose or to risk, and are thus peaceful, at least, even if comparatively—only comparatively—obscure. Well, this poor girl—it was most fortunate for her I happened to go down into her neighborhood, for the grandmother and aunt she was living with were as nearly as possible allowing her to form an engagement, without a penny in the world, with a young man who had next to nothing—going into business, they said, or something of the sort. Actually they were on the point of inviting him to the house when I interfered to prevent it, and told them at once it must not be. Where duty is concerned I can be very firm; and it ended in their managing to break it off—I do not exactly know how, for I never discussed the subject with Edith myself; and to secure her from further risk I invited her to pay us a visit while my daughter, Mrs. Hounslow, was with me. She did not wish to come at first, and talked, like all silly, romantic girls, of being independent—actually wanted to be a governess, I believe; but it was not likely I should allow that, and it ended, of course, in my wishes being complied with. The dear little pets give her plenty of occupation, and, as I understand, the young man was mortally affronted by his treatment; it is not to be supposed she will ever hear of him again. I only hope we shall find her as grateful as she ought to be. She is a little shy, poor girl, and feels, of course, the difference between herself and us; but she is very happy with the children, and Mrs. Hounslow talks of borrowing her of me when they go down to the sea at Christmas."

"As governess?" suggested I.

"Oh dear, no; they will not give her any salary."

"Ah," I said, "that makes all the difference, certainly."

I looked at Miss Acton with more interest when she came back, and thought I could detect on her dark eyelashes the traces of recent tears. She answered all Mrs. Popham's questions about the chintz with tolerable cheerfulness; but when I asked her opinion of the sketch, colored and stammered as if she hardly knew how to reply. Rather piqued at this, I mentioned one or two good judges who had pronounced it very clever; but, though she did not contradict me, I could not extract a word in its praise. Yet she had examined it closely, I found on examination, for it was not hanging as straight as usual, and had recently been taken down. I pitied her want of taste, and said no more. Mrs. Popham, having said all she came to say, took leave, promising me a speedy visit from the dear children, and observing, with a smile, as she went down stairs, that she thought it very hard the little ones should be treated so often, and she never invited to dinner once!

Invited to dinner! It was a joke, of course, but I wished people would not joke on such alarming subjects. It gave me a sense of insecurity and peril until I had mentioned it to Edgar, who laughed at the notion as one of Mrs. Popham's pleasing fictions, and relieved me for the moment. But a day or two afterward, early in December, he came home with the startling announcement that "Popham" had invited himself to come and eat his mutton (meaning ours) with us one day next week; he had a great many things to talk over with Edgar, and to drop in and dine in a friendly way was just what he would like. A joint, and a bit of fish, and a glass of sherry were a dinner for a prince, and what could a man wish for more?

He might wish to be welcome while he was about it, and that he certainly was not to me, though I comforted myself with the remembrance that the little I had seen of him was incomparably more agreeable than his lady. Scarcely, however, had I a little recovered from the surprise when Edgar brought me another message. Mrs. Popham particularly wished to come with her husband, and so did Georgy—just themselves—nobody else, unless we had any pleasant friend or two we might like to ask to meet them—no fuss or ceremony—their footman should help to wait at table—they only wanted a sociable meeting. I was not to put myself to inconvenience, or have any thing out of the way, for they were the easiest people to please in the world.

If they were easily pleased, I was not; I was in despair. I knew my guests by this time, and was perfectly aware that they would expect a real dinner-party, and be highly affronted with less. And Edgar, instead of sympathizing with my consternation, seemed to think it all rather a good joke. He had seen it coming some time, he said, only he would not alarm me too soon; he had no fear whatever but that all would go right; I could manage worse difficulties than these; what money must I have? He should set it down to professional expenses, and make some innocent person pay the penalty, one way or another. In short, I saw he wished it done, and from that moment resolved to do it well.

A first dinner-party is always a nervous matter, even when you have nothing to do but to order whatever is in season; or, if you are extremely fashionable, whatever is out of season; but when you have to combine elegance with economy—hospitality with good management—and at once keep within the bounds of a judicious reserve, and leave no room for a slur in your housekeeping, it is rather a difficult problem to solve. And when you are patronized all the time by an affectionate friend like Mrs. Popham, it becomes, let me in all candor confess, a trial of temper. We did our best to forestall her imagined wishes, selecting, if not our most esteemed acquaintances to meet them, those whom we thought they would prefer to meet; and resolved, as it was to be, it should be with as good a grace as possible. But the confidence we began to feel in our resources was by no means shared by Mrs. Popham. Though she answered the note of invitation in person, and accepted for the party in such very gracious terms, and with so many expressions of anticipated amusement, that I was half inclined (my temper, as hinted above, being on trial) to tell her that if she made such a favor of it she had better stay away—she sent me, during the intervening week, three several missives, all bearing more or less on the arrangements of my table. First, it was about the dreadful draught under the dining-room door, which she had not liked to mention the last time she had luncheon with me, and only mentioned now on darling Georgy's account; then came a confidential note about some particular kind of biscuit, without which Mr. Popham never could enjoy his glass of wine, and which was only to be had at some particular shop a long way off; and—what the last was I forget. I only know that, by way of climax, as I was taking a hurried luncheon, on the very day of the proposed party—a dull, gloomy, piercing day, enough to drive all the spirit of hospitality out of the breast of any hostess in the world—a fly drove up to the door, depositing Miss Acton and Sophy after a visit to the dentist. It was the only treat that human ingenuity at Richmond could devise capable of bribing Miss Hounslow to have a tooth out; and this Edith was desired to tell me, as a compliment calculated to puff me up with pride; but she was evidently so ashamed to give the message, I was sure it was not the real reason of their coming. I could not help laughing, notwithstanding my vexation, as I set them down to their cold meat, and told them they were lucky to get any thing at all. "You must take the consequences," I said; "if you come on a busy day you must expect to be busy too. I have no time to sit and talk to you, and no room for cake-making, so if you stay you must be useful, and help as much as you can."

I could not have suggested a more popular novelty as far as Sophy was concerned; she was perfectly entranced at being set to do little offices of general utility, helping me to get out my best china, blanching the almonds, and arranging the dessert, with as much delight as if it had been all part of a big baby-house, got together purely for her individual amusement. If she was useful, Edith Acton was invaluable. We had met two or three times since that first visit, and I had seen her each time under circumstances that had convinced me her temper was far superior to her taste in drawing. I am rather observing in small matters; and little traits of unselfishness and honesty, that escaped her unconsciously, did not escape me. Therefore I felt no repugnance, after the first vexation was over, to letting her into all the mysteries of my frugal household; and was even coaxed into allowing her to undertake a complicated piece of needle-work on my personal behalf, which I had really not had time to do before. We were too busy to notice how time was going till we became aware all at once that it was very dark, and that the fog was thickening; and Edith began to wonder their fly had not come according to order. Even while she was wondering the atmosphere seemed to grow dense as a wall round the windows, the lamps faded into dimness, the rattle of wheels became muffled, and even the air of the house partook of the thickness of the exterior.

"My dears," I said, after reconnoitring the street, "if your conveyance does not come, I can not send out for another in this fog. You must stay where you are till dinner-time, and go back in Mrs. Popham's carriage."

Edith shook her head, and looked troubled and uneasy, but Sophy protested it was quite delightful, and if the stupid coachman came now she should hate him. To be allowed to drink tea out of my little bedroom tea-service, the wedding-gift of a dear friend, was only a lesser treat than being so exceedingly useful; and I never saw a child more thoroughly happy and good-humored. We had no time to devote to her amusement, and left her in contented enjoyment, while we were busy over the dress Miss Acton had been trimming; and so pleasant and winning had that young lady been in every thing she done for me that day, that, as I took the finished work from her hands, I could not help giving her a grateful kiss, as if we had been old friends. To my surprise she clung round my neck, and I felt her sobbing so violently I was quite alarmed. My alarm, perhaps, helped her to recover herself before the tears had time to burst forth; she drank a little water, walked to the window a few minutes, and then, after a quick glance at the door as if to ascertain whether Sophy's sharp little ears were listening, began an apology which, from what I knew of her history, I did not think at all required. I could well imagine, from the sadness that I had more than once detected in her gentle eyes, that that piece of good service in which her portly kinswoman gloried so complacently had cost something in the doing, a wrench of the heart-strings, a blotting out of a bright dream—no one could see how worn was the young face and not divine that such might be the cause. But I could not then ask her confidence, I was fain to turn my eyes away from the beseeching appeal of hers, for the afternoon was nearly gone, and my domestic cares were by no means ended. I had just stepped down to put a few finishing touches to the arrangement of my drawing-room, and was thinking, with some complacency, how pretty it looked for its size, and what excellent taste Edgar had in harmonizing colors and selecting material, when the door-bell rang loudly. "Poor little Sophy!" I thought, "here is your truant driver at last." I listened—a man's voice was inquiring for me—a visitor, at this time of day, and on this of all days, when I was least at leisure! Surely I knew the voice, and yet it sounded like one I had not heard for a long time, and least expected to hear. It could hardly be, and yet it was; for there he stood before me, a tall, fair-haired young man, his beard, and even his eyebrows, steeped in fog—my cousin, Frank Wallace, the play-fellow of a certain joyous period that now seemed wonderfully long ago.

The sight of him brought back such a rush of dear memories, old associations, by-gone hopes and fears, gladness and sorrow, that, after the first start of recognition, I could hardly see his face or speak his welcome. But he took it for granted, unspoken.

"I have found you out, you see," he said, as he grasped my hand in his, "and found you, dissipated little woman of the world that you are, expecting no end of company, so I will not detain you a minute. I only want to give you joy, May, and to wish you all happiness and—good-by."

"Good-by?" I repeated; "and where then are you going in such a hurry?"

"To Australia. I sail next week, that is to say, if superior, fast-sailing clippers keep to their engagements, which, considering their sex, is doubtful. Well, little May, let me look at you. How happy you must be, if all I hear is truth! You have drawn a prize, my little woman; I knew Edgar Linton before you did, and you will not meet with his equal every day, I can tell you that."

I knew that as well as he did, but I loved him for saying it. I would not hear of his going till Edgar came in; and having coaxed him out of his coat and hat, we sat talking of past times, and forgot the exigencies of the present. At first he seemed shy of speaking of his own affairs, but as he warmed into confidence, he gradually revealed to me sundry facts I was sorry to hear; one being that he had refused the offer of his uncle and godfather of a good situation in his counting-house, with the prospect of a partnership, not from any dislike to business, but simply because he was sick of England, and only wanted to get as far away from it as he could. He knew he was throwing away a competency; his uncle was kindness itself, and told him he would not consider his refusal final till he had actually sailed; but he could not settle down to a desk merely to put money into his own pocket: he longed for change, for excitement, for any thing—here his voice dropped into a faltering murmur—that would help him to forget.

Alas, poor Frank! There was a confession ready to be poured forth there too, could I have waited to receive it—and by no means the first I had received in that quarter. Dear old fellow! he had always been in the habit of confiding his attachments to my sympathizing ear, and nearly every vacation brought me a new one. But there was a real sorrow in his voice and look now, and it seemed hard that I could not listen; and yet with the clock striking a later hour than I at all expected, and Edgar not come home—what could I do? Ah! there he was at last, coughing in a manner I did not at all approve, for his throat was his weak point. I ran down to greet him with the news that Frank was here.

"What! Frank Wallace!" he said; "that is capital. We are sure of one guest, at any rate."

"One?" I repeated, glancing at my well-appointed dinner-table, with all the modest display of plate and glass; "I wish it were only one with all my heart. It is high time we were both dressed; I expected you an hour ago."

"And well you might. Luckily, I secured a link-boy at last, and so made my way home. You have no idea what the streets are now; within the last half hour the fog has grown something tremendous. How the Pophams will ever get here I can not imagine."

"They will have lamps, of course," suggested I.

"Lamps will not help them much if it goes on like this. But, however, it may clear, and we will hope it will, for their own sakes as well as ours. It would be a pity all your charming arrangements should be wasted on old Frank—and yet I will bet you a pair of gloves, May, that he is our only guest."

"You will?" I said, laughing; "then I take the bet, for I want a new pair for Sunday." I considered it all a joke, be it observed, for such an idea as a fog keeping Mrs. Popham away seemed too remote from possibility, even for a wager. Frank came down at that moment, and sad as he had been just before, the very sight of my husband seemed to brighten his spirits.

"I am just off, Linton," he said, as they were shaking hands; "I should not have got here to-day, but could not get into the City in the fog; and after blundering about, and missing my way several times, found myself in this street by accident. We will not keep May from her toilette, which I know is to be extensive to-night, but I can talk to you while you dress; and by that time these pleasant chimneys of yours must have done smoking. Dine with you as I am? No, thank you; not to disgrace Mrs. Linton in the eyes of the world as having wretched relations, without a best coat to their backs. I will try and see you again before I sail, May. How glad I am to have had this peep at your establishment—how happy you must both be!"

He gave my hand such a squeeze that I nearly cried for mercy, and then went with Edgar into his little dressing-room, which was on the parlor-floor. Just as I was hurrying up stairs he called out "May!"

"Well?" I said, looking over the balusters.

"May I have a weed among old Edgar's boots and shoes? It will be an immense improvement upon the fog."

"No, certainly not," was my almost indignant reply; "you must wait till you are in Australia before you behave like a backwoodsman." For I had been brought up to consider the smell of tobacco in the house as next to an iniquity; and the notion of its pervading my dining-room just as my guests were arriving was enough to turn me cold. He laughed merrily as he looked up at me, and I was glad he had some of his old mischievous self left. What a pity he should throw up all his prospects and go off where he had none whatever! Perhaps Edgar might bring him to reason—we would have him to breakfast, and let them talk it all over; meanwhile I must be dressed—and, oh dear, how glad I should be when to-morrow morning was come!

Little Sophy came to meet me with large frightened eyes. Cousin Edith was ill; she had turned quite faint and sick all in a minute—would I give her something to make her well? Edith ill—I flew to see, and was relieved to find her able to assure me it was nothing—only just a passing sensation—yes, a few drops of sal volatile would just do; she would not keep me from dressing, she knew I must be anxious to go down again. And yet she seemed longing to say something, if I had given her the least encouragement; but how could I, late as I was, and Mrs. Popham due any minute?

I was quickly dressed, and went down to receive my visitors. Never shall I forget that interval of waiting; how thankful I was at first to be in time; how gradually I began to fidget about my bill of fare, every dish fated to be overdone; how ludicrous at last became the position of sitting in state to receive people who did not come, and seemed to have no intention of coming; especially when Edgar looked in every now and then to hope that I was not overpowered with my exertions to be agreeable; and blandly observed that you might cut the fog with a knife.

"Please to remember, my love," he said, at last, "that I prefer Jouvin's gloves to any other, and that my favorite color is a delicate brown—like your hair. Frank declares he can not wait dinner much longer."

"And please to remember," was my reply, "that I particularly admire pale fawn color, and that my number is six and three quarters. Frank will not be our only guest, for Miss Acton is here, and little Sophy Hounslow."

"You don't mean that?" he exclaimed, much amused; "you are a woman of resources, indeed. I should never have imagined you had such a reserve." I explained how it had occurred, and he rubbed his hands with a keen satisfaction that rather surprised me. "Bring them down; bring them both down. I will go and fetch Frank, and we will have a grand dinner-party yet, in spite of the stars and the fog."

I found Edith so much recovered that I had little difficulty in prevailing with her to accept our invitation; Sophy capering with joy at the unlooked-for happiness of "dining late," even though bound by strict promises not to ask for any thing until the jelly came. The only drawback to her bliss was the fear that "her hair was not properly done," and Cousin Edith could not do it in the least, and oh, would dear, darling Mrs. Linton put it up for her as she did the other day? It was true that I had, on one occasion, made her little head tidy after my own fashion, which she had been teasing her maid ever since, in vain, to imitate; and knowing I had a few minutes still, while dinner was being served, I bade Edith go down to the drawing-room, and as quickly as I could arrange my little guest's wayward tresses. Quick as I thought myself, it took me more minutes than I calculated upon, and I hurried her down at last; before she was half-satisfied that her appearance would produce the effect she desired.

"Well, Sophy," said Edgar, coming up to meet us as we entered, "this is very kind and good of you, indeed, to come and dine with us when grandmamma has failed us so cruelly. We must keep up each other's spirits, and you must sit by me at dinner, to dry my tears if I give way unexpectedly."

I knew every cadence of my husband's voice so well that directly he spoke I was sure there was some more solid ground for his good spirits than the fact of having provided a dinner to which nobody could come; and while he went on rattling with the delighted child I glanced at my other guests. What had come over them, too, since I saw them last? They were standing on the hearth-rug together, Frank with his arm on the chimney-piece, playing with one of my most precious Dresden ornaments as heedlessly as if it had been a pewter mug; his face, so desponding and troubled a little while ago, now lighted up with a glad hope, that seemed to throw radiance on the room, in spite of the dense atmosphere we were all breathing. Edith Acton, looking shyly at the fire, while listening to what he was saying so eagerly and yet so low; the paleness gone from her cheeks, the sadness from her brow—nervous, trembling, starting when I spoke to her, and as unlike her former self as spring sunshine to December fog.

"Well, May!" said Frank, letting go my little tea-cup, but happily without breaking it, "here is glorious weather!"

"Very," said I; "you will not meet with such in Australia, I am afraid."

"I am afraid not; and now you mention it, May, I really do not think I could live without it; it seems to agree with me so well. I shall make tremendous havoc among your entremets."

"Have you been introduced to Miss Acton, Sir, or may I have the pleasure?"

"Excuse me, May, but I must explain that I have had the very great pleasure of meeting Miss Acton before, and to tell you the truth, could not have believed it possible that such a piece of good fortune could be reserved for me as that of meeting her again."

A light began to dawn on my understanding; I looked at him again, his eyes were dancing—then at Edith, hers were full of tears—but such happy tears! I could not have wished to exchange them for such a smile as she had worn in the day.

I had a dozen questions to ask, but she made me a quick expressive sign of entreaty, and I recollected that small representative of Mrs. Popham, and of that useful species of vessel known for the length of its auricular organs. Now, too, I understood why my husband was so devotedly engaged in whispering ghost stories in her ear at the farther end of the room.

Dinner was announced—my poor dinner, the fruit of so much thought, the object of so much anxiety—and we went down to the dining-room, with all its covers laid for the absent Banquos, and I must own I felt it was a pity. The less we say about it the better, the rather that the guests who partook thereof were in that state of mind in which the senses and judgment slumber alike, and had I set them down to cold shoulder of mutton, or suggested that we all should have a little gruel, they would have been as well pleased and very little the wiser. With one of them on either side of me, their eyes meeting perpetually, in spite of Edith's efforts to prevent it, and their voices and manner betraying the almost painful intensity of the happiness that had come on them so suddenly, I felt too excited myself to know much of what I was eating, or what I was talking about; only the more confused I found myself becoming the more I talked—very foolishly, I am afraid, for Edgar told me afterward he had no idea I had such a fund of anecdote and conversation.

It mattered very little; those two heard, understood nothing but themselves; and had I been wise as Socrates, and witty as Sydney Smith, wisdom and wit had been equally wasted then. In pity to both I rose early from table, and having dispatched Sophy to be undressed by the maid and put into the bed she was to share with her cousin, sat down to receive the confidence I might have had a few hours sooner. But how different was now the tone in which it was given!

"You little knew," Edith said, "when you asked me how I liked that Swiss sketch up stairs, how well I knew the touch of the artist's hand—how I longed to take it out of its frame, and carry it away with me. I had nothing of his—not a line, not a scrap of paper—and the blank, and the longing, sometimes, were almost more than I could bear. I can hardly believe now that he is in the house, and I have spoken to him, and know he is still all I thought once. How shall I be grateful enough for such a change?"

"Tell me," I said, "how such a misunderstanding was possible, if you were both so much attached?"

She had some difficulty in explaining, for she did not wish to speak bitterly of any one; but the facts, as I gathered them, spoke for themselves. Her own home had been early broken up, and the grandmother and aunt, with whom she and her sister had afterward lived, were completely under the sway of Mrs. Popham, in virtue of a small allowance she made them, subject to her pleasure. Her sister, some few years ago, had married the curate of the parish, and their poverty, though they never complained, had been so great an offense to Mrs. Popham, when she visited the neighborhood, that she had made old Mrs. Acton understand that sort of thing must not happen again. "She found Alice one day making a pie, and she never forgave it," said Edith, smiling, though her tone was a little resentful, as well it might be; "and it was no use reminding her that neither she nor John ever got into debt, and that they gave away more than many with larger means; she said that only made it worse, for it showed they had neither credit nor common-sense. And if you only knew how good they both are!"

I could quite believe it, but I wanted to hear about Frank, and on that point Edith was not so clear: she knew Mrs. Popham had spoken severely to her aunt about him, and that poor grandmamma had been ill for a week after the interview, but she never knew what really passed. As Mrs. Popham said, the affair had been managed—so managed that Frank had been driven away in resentment at what he felt to be ill-usage, while she was left under the belief that he had given her up. How they had contrived to come to an understanding in the very short time they had been together I did not too curiously inquire; but it seemed as if, directly their eyes met, a veil fell from their souls, and they knew they were beloved before a word was spoken.

How happy they were that evening, sitting together with a sketch-book of mine open before them on the table, and paying no more heed to my best productions than they had done to my dinner or my conversation! Edgar and I did our best to promote their enjoyment, by taking as little notice of them as possible: he brought out his violin, and I opened the piano, and we gave them soft movements of Mozart, and rich harmonies of Beethoven, as an accompaniment to the immortal music breathing from their hearts, as it breathed first in the garden.

By twelve o'clock—we had not the heart to disturb them sooner—my fatigue overpowered my sympathy, and I announced my intention of retiring. Frank started up, and with a dismayed apology for keeping us all up so late, wondered what sort of a night it was now. We opened the shutter, the lamps were once more visible, and the atmosphere was clearing fast under the influence of a change of wind. The fog had done its kindly work, and was gone; and never did the golden sunset of a summer evening leave sweeter memories behind.

Frank came to breakfast the next morning, and we were making very merry over the contretemps of the day before—Edith, whether she had slept or not, looking as if ten years had been taken from her age, and a threefold beauty restored to her face—when we were surprised by a visit from Mr. Popham. He was anxious, of course, to know the fate of his little grand-daughter; but still more to condole with me on the disappointment which they had been compelled to inflict—compelled, notwithstanding most heroic perseverance on the part of his amiable lady, whom nothing would for a long time persuade to relinquish the attempt to reach us, until they actually came to a collision with two other carriages, and were extricated with some difficulty, and one of the panels smashed in. "You may imagine how pleasant it was to return to a house where we were not expected," he continued, shrugging his shoulders, as we all expressed our regret and commiseration. "Hounslow and Elizabeth dining out in the neighborhood, half the servants out of the way, fires low, nothing one cared to eat—I never had so wretched an evening, Mrs. Linton—upon my honor, I never had. Poor Georgy could not get over it at all, and scolded us all round, till really I had to give her a bit of my mind, and it ended in her bursting out crying, and spending the evening in her bedroom; and this morning she has the face-ache, and Mrs. Popham has a sad cold—but I was to assure you she thought it would be nothing very serious, and she would have braved any weather sooner than disappoint you after all your pains and trouble. Poor Elizabeth was in great dismay when she came home and found no Sophy, and it was all I could do to prevent her coming off to see if she were safe—I was sure she would be in Mrs. Linton's hands, and under Edith's care. It was that which quieted her at last; she could trust Edith, she owned, as she would herself; but I believe you will see her here directly, for she said she would not be happy till she knew it was all right."

It was rather a relief to hear this; for though Mrs. Hounslow was very like her mother in face and figure, she was her opposite in easy good-nature; and as the image of Mrs. Popham's wrath loomed darkly on our horizon, it became a matter of some importance to secure a favorable hearing from one who might prove an ally. Our breakfast was soon dispatched, and I carried Edith and Sophy up stairs, leaving Mr. Popham, good, easy man, to the tender mercy of Edgar and Frank, who looked ready to fall upon him the instant they had him alone. They were still shut up together, and Edith had had time to grow very nervous, when Mrs. Hounslow arrived, positively running up stairs—an effort on her part almost unparalleled—in her eagerness to be assured her darling had not been very unhappy. Finding from the darling's own pungent remarks that she had been as happy as possible, and didn't want to go home, and liked drinking tea out of Mrs. Linton's pink cup and saucer, and dining late afterward with the gentlemen, for Mr. Linton was so kind and funny, Mrs. Hounslow's spirits revived, and she began to talk over the misfortunes of the evening with considerable zest. She had never seen mamma so put out in her life, and it was a mercy they were not all killed; as it was, they were laid up, and could not come and call, but they sent their kindest love, and a thousand regrets, and hopes that dear Mrs. Linton had not taken it too much to heart—it was such a trying thing to happen to a young house-keeper, and enough to put Mr. Linton quite out of temper; gentlemen never stood these little worries well; Mr. Hounslow would have been put out for a week. I answered her with due cordiality, and having said all that I knew was expected of regret, sympathy, and obligation, I took occasion, while Edith was dressing Sophy up stairs, to tell her what had occurred, and ask her advice and assistance. She listened with as much interest as if it had been an amusing fiction, and frankly assured me she could not conceive for her part why mamma was so fond of managing and muddling other people's affairs, and if Edith liked Mr. Wallace and Mr. Wallace liked Edith, what could it matter to mamma how much they had to live upon? She didn't suppose they would expect her to give them any thing. Oh yes, she had been told something about Edith's having an unfortunate attachment, and she knew old Mrs. Acton was afraid to say her soul was her own before mamma, for fear she should stop her pension—and, by-the-by, she might do so now if they did not mind what they were about. Poor, dear Edith! so fond as she was of the darling children, too, and they of her—she had intended asking her to spend Christmas with them at Brighton; yes, yes, she would see what could be done—she would talk to Mr. Hounslow, and hear what he said.

At this moment Sophy ran in, full of a wonderful thing she had forgotten to tell her mamma, which happened to her last night. Mr. Linton had pulled a cracker with her at dessert, and a big almond and motto fell into her plate, and the motto was in French, so she could not read it, but he had whispered to her what it meant as a great secret, and what did mamma think it could be? It was that she was soon to be a bridemaid. Did mamma think it possible it could be true?

Mamma thought it very possible if they could prevail on grandmamma; and from that moment I felt we had two new allies on our side as even Mrs. Popham might find it hard to resist.

And so it proved, for not all the arguments of Mr. Popham, whom Edgar and Frank did not allow to escape till they had fairly talked him into acquiescence—all the straightforward liberality of Frank's uncle, who immediately on the receipt of his nephew's submission came forward with arms and purse equally open to smooth down the difficulties in his path of life—all my own diplomatic appeals to her oft-expressed regard for myself, and the satisfaction with which I contemplated even a connection so remote—all that could be urged on behalf of either, separately or both combined, by any or all of us, in any possible way, would have prevailed to overcome her resentment as they did, had they not been hourly supported by Sophy's firm resolve to be a bridemaid. Sophy, as I said before, was very like her grandmamma, and that great woman might have consoled herself for yielding, like England to her American colonies, with the knowledge that it was from herself the conqueror had learned to conquer.

If any thing had been needed to make my satisfaction complete in becoming a connection of Mrs. Popham's, it was given me in the fact that from this time that excellent lady paid me much less attention than formerly, and could never be induced, under any pretense, to accept another invitation to dinner.

Frank and Edith settled as near us as they could, and every year drew us closer together in the ties of tried and valued friendship. We met at each other's houses, we joined company in our husbands' holidays, we shared each other's joys—yes, and sorrows too, such as will come, even in the most loving homes—the deeper, at times, for their being so loving; but many a time have we turned away from the loveliest scenery and the most glorious sky to recall with grateful affection our debt to our much-abused benefactor, the London fog.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XIII.

THE BADINAGE OF OLD FRIENDS.

THE town of Holby is on the coast of Pembroke. It has a small harbor, with a light-house, and the town itself contains a few thousand people, most of them belonging to the poorer class. The chief house in the town stands on a rising ground a little outside, looking toward the water. Its size and situation render it the most conspicuous object in the neighborhood.

This house, from its appearance, must have been built more than a century before. It belonged to an old family which had become extinct, and now was occupied by a new owner, who had given it another name. This new owner was William Thornton, Esq., solicitor, who had an office in Holby, and who, though very wealthy, still attended to his business with undiminished application. The house had been originally purchased by the father of the present occupant, Henry Thornton, a well-known lawyer in these parts, who had settled here originally a poor young man, but had finally grown gray and rich in his adopted home. He had bought the place when it was exposed for sale, with the intention of founding a new seat for his own family, and had given it the name of Thornton Grange.

Generations of care and tasteful culture had made Thornton Grange one of the most beautiful places in the county. All around were wide parks dotted with ponds and clumps of trees. An avenue of elms led up to the door. A well-kept lawn was in front, and behind was an extensive grove. Every thing spoke of wealth and elegance.

On an afternoon in February a gentleman in clerical dress walked up the avenue, rang at the door, and entering he gave his name to the servant as the Rev. Courtenay Despard. He was the new Rector of Holby, and had only been there one week.

He entered the drawing-room, sat down upon one of the many lounging chairs with which it was filled, and waited. He did not have to wait long. A rapid step was soon heard descending the stairs, and in a few minutes a lady entered. She came in with a bright smile of welcome on her face, and greeted him with much warmth.

Mrs. Thornton was very striking in her appearance. A clear olive complexion and large, dark hazel eyes marked Southern blood. Her hair was black, wavy, and exceedingly luxuriant. Her mouth was small, her hands and feet delicately shaped, and her figure slender and elegant. Her whole air had that indefinable grace which is the sign of high-breeding; to this there was added exceeding loveliness, with great animation of face and elegance of manner. She was a perfect lady, yet not of the English stamp; for her looks and manner had not that cold and phlegmatic air which England fosters. She looked rather like some Italian beauty—like those which enchant us as they smile from the walls of the picture-galleries of Italy.

"I am so glad you have come!" said she. "It is so stupid here, and I expected you an hour ago."

"Oh, if I had only known that!" said Despard. "For, do you know, I have been dying of ennui."

"I hope that I may be the means of dispelling it."

"As surely so as the sun disperses the clouds."

"You are never at a loss for a compliment."

"Never when I am with you."

These few words were spoken with a smile by each, and a slightly melodramatic gesture, as though each was conscious of a little extravagance.

"You must be glad to get to your old home," she resumed. "You lived here fifteen, no, sixteen years, you know."

"Eighteen."

"So it was. I was sixteen when you left."

"Never to see you again till I came back," said Despard, with some mournfulness, looking at the floor.

"And since then all has changed."

"But I have not," rejoined Despard, in the same tone.

Mrs. Thornton said nothing for a moment.

"By-the-way, I've been reading such a nice book," she resumed. "It has just come out, and is making a sensation. It would suit you, I know."

"What is it?"

She rose and lifted a book from the table, which she handed to him. He took it, and read the title out loud.

"Christian's Cross."

A strange expression passed over his face. He looked at her, holding the book out at arms-length with feigned consternation.

"And do you have the heart to recommend this book to me, Mrs. Thornton?"

"Why not?"

"Why, it's religious. Religious books are my terror. How could I possibly open a book like this?"

She laughed.

"You are mistaken," she said. "It is an ordinary novel, and for the sake of your peace of mind I assure you that there is not a particle of religion in it. But why should you look with such repugnance upon it? The expression of your face is simply horror."

"Pietistic books have been the bane of my life. The emotional, the rhapsodical, the meditative style of book, in which one garrulously addresses one's soul from beginning to end, is simply torture to me. You see religion is a different thing. The rhapsody may do for the Tabernacle people, but thoughtful men and women need something different."

"I am so delighted to hear such sentiments from a clergyman! They entirely accord with my own. Still I must own that your horror struck me as novel, to say the least of it."

"Would you like me to try to proselytize you?"

"You may try if you wish. I am open to conviction; but the Church of all the ages, the Apostolic, the Catholic, has a strong hold on me."

"You need not fear that I will ever try to loosen it. I only wish that I may see your face in Trinity Church every Sunday."

"That happiness shall be yours," answered Mrs. Thornton. "As there is no Catholic church here, I will give you the honor of my presence at Trinity."

"If that is the case it will be a place of worship to me."

He smiled away the extravagance of this last remark, and she only shook her head.

"That is a compliment, but it is awfully profane."

"Not profanity; say rather justifiable idolatry."

"Really, I feel overcome; I do not know what to say. At any rate, I hope you will like the book; I know you will find it pleasant."

"Any thing that comes from you could not be otherwise," said Despard. "At the same time it is not my habit to read novels singly."

"Singly! Why how else can one read them?"

"I always read several at a time."

Mrs. Thornton laughed at the whimsical idea.

"You see," said Despard, "one must keep up with the literature of the day. I used to read each book as it came out, but at last found satiety. The best novel palls. For my own comfort I had to invent a new plan to stimulate my interest. I will tell you about it. I take ten at a time, spread them on the table in front of me, and read each chapter in succession."

"Isn't that a little confusing?"

"Not at all," said Despard, gravely. "Practice enables one to keep all distinct."

"But what is the good of it?"

"This," replied Despard; "you see in each novel there are certain situations. Perhaps on an average there may be forty each. Interesting characters also may average ten each. Thrilling scenes twenty each. Overwhelming catastrophes fifteen each. Now by reading novels singly the effect of all this is weakened, for you only have the work of each in its divided, isolated state, but where you read according to my plan you have the aggregate of all these effects in one combined—that is to say, in ten books which I read at once I have two hundred thrilling scenes, one hundred and fifty overwhelming catastrophes, one hundred interesting characters, and four hundred situations of absorbing fascination. Do you not see what an advantage there is in my plan? By following this rule I have been able to stimulate a somewhat faded appetite, and to keep abreast of the literature of the day."

"What an admirable plan! And do you read all books in that way? Why, one could write ten novels at a time on the same principle, and if so he ought to write very much better."

"I think I will try it some day. At present I am busily engaged with a learned treatise on the Symbolical Nature of the Mosaic Economy, and—"

"The—what?" cried Mrs. Thornton, breathlessly. "What was that?"

"The Symbolical Nature of the Mosaic Economy," said Despard, placidly.

"And is the title all your own?"

"All my own."

"Then pray don't write the book. The title is enough. Publish that, and see if it does not of itself by its own extraordinary merits bring you undying fame."

"I've been thinking seriously of doing so," said Despard, "and I don't know but that I may follow your advice. It will save some trouble, and perhaps amount to just as much in the end."

"And do you often have such brilliant fancies?"

"No, frankly, not often. I consider that title the one great idea of my life."

"But do not dwell too much upon that," said Mrs. Thornton, in a warning voice. "It might make you conceited."

"Do you think so?" rejoined the other, with a shudder. "Do you really think so? I hope not. At any rate I hope you do not like conceited people?"

"No."

"Am I conceited?"

"No. I like you," replied Mrs. Thornton, with a slight bow and a wave of the hand, which she accompanied with a smile.

"And I like you," said Despard, in the same tone.

"You could not do less."

"This," said Despard, with an air of thoughtful seriousness, "is a solemn occasion. After such a tender confession from each of us what remains to be done? What is it that the novels lay down?"

"I'm sure," returned Mrs. Thornton, with the same assumed solemnity, "it is not for me to say. You must make the proposition."

"We can not do any thing less than fly together."

"I should think not."

"But where?"

"And not only where, but how? By rail, by steamboat, or by canal? A canal strikes me as the best mode of flight. It is secluded."

"Free from observation," said Despard.

"Quiet," rejoined Mrs. Thornton.

"Poetic."

"Remote."

"Unfriendly."

"Solitary."

"Slow."

"And, best of all, hitherto untried."

"Yes, its novelty is undeniable."

"So much so," said Mrs. Thornton, "that it overwhelms one. It is a bright, original idea, and in these days of commonplace is it not creditable? The idea is mine, Sir, and I will match it with your—what?—your Symbolical Nature of the Mosaic Cosmogony."

"Economy."

"But Cosmogony is better. Allow me to suggest it by way of a change."

"It must be so, since you say it; but I have a weakness for the word Economy. It is derived from the Greek—"

"Greek!" exclaimed Mrs. Thornton, raising her hands. "You surely are not going to be so ungenerous as to quote Greek! Am I not a lady? Will you be so base as to take me at a disadvantage in that way?"

"I am thoroughly ashamed of myself, and you may consider that a tacit apology is going on within my mind whenever I see you."

"You are forgiven," said Mrs. Thornton.

"I can not conceive how I could have so far forgotten myself. I do not usually speak Greek to ladies. I consider it my duty to make myself agreeable. And you have no idea how agreeable I can make myself, if I try."

"I? I have no idea? Is it you who say that, and to me?" exclaimed Mrs. Thornton, in that slight melodramatic tone which she had employed thus far, somewhat exaggerated. "After what I told you—of my feelings?"

"I see I shall have to devote all the rest of my life to making apologies."

"No. Do not make apologies. Avoid your besetting sins. Otherwise, fond as I am of you"—and she spoke with exaggerated solemnity—"I must regard you as a failure."

The conversation went on uninterruptedly in this style for some time. It appeared to suit each of them. Despard's face, naturally grave, assisted him toward maintaining the mock-serious tone which he chose to adopt; and Mrs. Thornton's peculiar style of face gave her the same advantage. It pleased each to express for the other an exaggerated sentiment of regard. They considered it banter and badinage. How far it was safe was another thing. But they had known one another years before, and were only resuming the manner of earlier times.

Yet, after all, was it safe for the grave Rector of Holby to adopt the inflated style of a troubadour in addressing the Lady of Thornton Grange? Neither of them thought of it. They simply improved the shining hour after this fashion, until at length the conversation was interrupted by the opening of folding-doors, and the entrance of a servant who announced—dinner.

On entering the dining-room Despard was greeted with respectful formality by the master of the house. He was a man of about forty, with the professional air of the lawyer about him, and an abstracted expression of face, such as usually belongs to one who is deeply engrossed in the cares of business. His tone, in spite of its friendliness, was naturally stiff, and was in marked contrast to the warmth of Mrs. Thornton's greeting.

"How do you like your new quarters?" he asked, as they sat down.

"Very well," said Despard. "It is more my home, you know, than any other place. I lived there so many years as school-boy with Mr. Carson that it seems natural to take up my station there as home."

Mr. Thornton relapsed into his abstraction while Despard was speaking, who directed the remainder of his conversation to Mrs. Thornton.

It was light, idle chat, in the same tone as that in which they had before indulged. Once or twice, at some unusually extravagant remark, Mr. Thornton looked up in perplexity, which was not lessened on seeing their perfect gravity.

They had a long discussion as to the meaning of the phrase "the day after to-morrow." Despard asserted that it meant the same as eternal duration, and insisted that it must be so, since when to-morrow came the day after it was still coming, and when that came there was still the day after. He supported his theory with so much earnestness that Thornton, after listening for a while, took the trouble to go heavily and at length into the whole question, and conclude it triumphantly against Despard.

Then the subject of politics came up, and a probable war with France was considered. Despard professed to take no interest in the subject, since, even if an invasion took place, clergymen could do nothing. They were exempt from military duty in common with gaugers. The mention of this brought on a long discussion as to the spelling of the word gauger. Despard asserted that nobody knew how it was spelled, and that, from the necessities of human nature, it was simply impossible to tell whether it was gauger or guager. This brought out Thornton again, who mentioned several law papers in which the word had been correctly written by his clerks. Despard challenged him on this, and, because Thornton had to confess that he had not examined the word, dictionary in hand, he claimed a victory over him.

Thornton, at this, looked away, with the smile of a man who is talking unintelligible things to a child.

Then followed a long conversation between Despard and Mrs. Thornton about religion, art, music, and a miscellaneous assemblage of other things, which lasted for a long time. At length he rose to go. Mrs. Thornton went to a side-table and took up a book.

"Here," said she, "is the little book you lent me; I ought to have sent it, but I thought you would come for it."

"And so I will," said he, "some day."

"Come for it to-morrow."

"Will you be at home?"

"Yes."

"Then of course I'll come. And now I must tear myself away. Good-night!"

On the following day, at about two o'clock, Despard called again. Mrs. Thornton had been writing, and the desk was strewn with papers.

"I know I am disturbing you," said he, after the usual greetings. "I see that you are writing, so I will not stay but a moment. I have come, you know, after that little book."

"Indeed, you are not disturbing me at all. I have been trying to continue a letter which I began to my brother a month ago. There is no hurry about it."

"And how is Paolo?"

"I have not heard for some time. I ought to hear soon. He went to America last summer, and I have not had a word from him since. My letter is of no importance, I assure you, and now, since you are here, you shall not go. Indeed, I only touched it a minute ago. I have been looking at some pictures till I am so begrimed and inundated with dust that I feel as though I had been resolved into my original element." And she held up her hands with a pretty gesture of horror.

Despard looked at her for a moment as she stood in her bright beauty before him. A sudden expression of pain flashed over his face, succeeded by his usual smile.

"Dust never before took so fair a form," he said, and sat down, looking on the floor.

"For unflinching power of compliment, for an unending supply of neat and pretty speeches, commend me to the Rev. Courtenay Despard."

"Yet, singularly enough, no one else ever dreamed that of me."

"You were always so."

"With you."

"In the old days."

"Now lost forever."

Their voices sank low and expressive of a deep melancholy. A silence followed. Despard at last, with a sudden effort, began talking in his usual extravagant strain about badgers till at last Mrs. Thornton began to laugh, and the radiance of their spirits was restored. "Strange," said he, taking up a prayer-book with a peculiar binding, on which there was a curiously interwisted figure in gilt. "That pattern has been in my thoughts and dreams for a week."

"How so?"

"Why, I saw it in your hands last Sunday, and my eyes were drawn to it till its whole figure seemed to stamp itself on my mind. See! I can trace it from memory." And, taking his cane, he traced the curiously involved figure on the carpet.

"And were your thoughts fixed on nothing better than that?"

"I was engaged in worship," was the reply, with marked emphasis.

"I must take another book next time."

"Do not. You will only force me to study another pattern."

Mrs. Thornton laughed lightly, and Despard looked at her with a smile.

"I'm afraid your thoughts wander," she said, lightly, "as mine do. There is no excuse for you. There is for me. For you know I'm like Naaman; I have to bow my head in the temple of Baal. After all," she continued, in a more serious voice, "I suppose I shall be able some day to worship before my own altar, for, do you know, I expect to end my days in a convent."

"And why?"

"For the purpose of perfect religious seclusion."

Despard looked at her earnestly for a moment. Then his usual smile broke out.

"Wherever you go let me know, and I'll take up my abode outside the walls and come and look at you every day through the grating."

"And would that be a help to a religious life?"

"Perhaps not; but I'll tell you what would be a help. Be a Sister of Charity. I'll be a Paulist. I'll devote myself to the sick. Then you and I can go together; and when you are tired I can assist you. I think that idea is much better than yours."

"Oh, very much, indeed!" said Mrs. Thornton, with a strange, sad look.

"I remember a boy and girl who once used to go hand in hand over yonder shore, and—" He stopped suddenly, and then hastily added, "and now it would be very sad, and therefore very absurd, in one of them to bring up old memories."

Mrs. Thornton suddenly rose, and, walking to the window, looked out. "I wonder if it will rain to day!" she said, in a sweet voice, full of a tremulous melancholy.

"There are very dark clouds about," returned Despard, mournfully.

"I hope there will not be a storm," she rejoined, with the same sadness. Her hands were held tightly together. "Some things will perish if a storm comes."

"Let us pray that there may be calm and peace," said Despard.

She turned and looked at him for a moment. Strange that these two should pass so quickly from gaiety to gloom! Their eyes met, and each read in the face of the other sadness beyond words.

CHAPTER XIV.

TWO LETTERS.

DESPARD did not go back to the Grange for some days. About a week had passed since the scenes narrated in the preceding chapter when one morning, having finished his breakfast, he went into his library and sat down at the table to write. A litter of papers lay all around. The walls were covered with shelves, filled with books. The table was piled high with ponderous tomes. Manuscripts were strewn around, and books were scattered on the floor. Yet, amidst all this disorder, some order was apparent, for many of these books lay open in certain places, and others were arranged so as to be within reach.

Several sheets of paper, covered with writing, lay before him, headed, "The Byzantine Poets." The books were all in Greek. It was the library of a hard-working student.

Very different was the Despard of the library from the Despard who had visited the Grange. A stern and thoughtful expression was read in his face, and his eyes had an abstraction which would have done credit to Mr. Thornton himself.

Taking his seat at the table, he remained for a while leaning his head on his hand in deep thought. Then he took up a pen and drew a piece of paper before him to try it. He began to draw upon it the same figure which he had marked with his cane on Mrs. Thornton's carpet. He traced this figure over and over, until at last the whole sheet was covered.

Suddenly he flung down the pen, and, taking up the paper, leaned back in his chair with a melancholy face. "What a poor, weak thing I am!" he muttered at last, and let the paper fall to the floor. He leaned his head on his hand, then resumed his pen and began to make some idle marks. At length he began to draw.

Under the fine and delicate strokes of his pen, which were as neat and as exquisite as the most subtle touches of an engraving, a picture gradually rose to view. It was a sea-side scene. The place was Holby Beach. In the distance was the light-house; and on one side a promontory, which protected the harbor. Upon the shore, looking out toward the sea, was a beautiful girl, of about sixteen years of age, whose features, as they grew beneath his tender touches, were those of Mrs. Thornton. Then beside her there gradually rose another figure, a youth of about eighteen, with smooth face and clustering locks, who looked exactly like what the Rev. Courtenay Despard might have been some seven or eight years before. His left arm was around her waist, her arm was thrown up till it touched his shoulder, and his right hand held hers. Her head leaned against him, and both of them, with a subdued expression of perfect happiness, tinged with a certain pensive sadness, were looking out upon the setting sun.

As soon as he finished he looked at the sketch, and then, with a sudden impulse, tore it into a thousand small fragments. He drew the written manuscript before him with a long and deep-drawn sigh, and began writing with great rapidity upon the subject of the Byzantine Poets. He had just written the following words:

"The Anacreontic hymns of John Damascenus form a marked contrast to—" when the sentence was interrupted by a knock at the door. "Come in!" It was the servant with letters from the post-office. Despard put down his pen gravely, and the man laid two letters on the table. He waited till the servant had departed, then seizing one of them, a small one, addressed in a lady's hand, he pressed it vehemently to his lips and tore it open.

It was as follows:

"DEAR MR. DESPARD,—I suppose I may never expect to see you again. Yet I must see you, for yesterday I received a very long letter from Paolo of so singular a character that you will have to explain it to me. I shall expect you this afternoon, and till then, I remain,

"Yours sincerely,

"TERESA THORNTON.

"THORNTON GRANGE, Friday."

Despard read this letter a score of times, and placed it reverently in an inner drawer of his desk. He then opened the other, and read as follows:

"HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA, January 12, 1847.

"MY DEAR COURTENAY,—I was very glad to hear of your appointment as Rector of Holby, your old home, and hope that by this time you are fully established in the old Rectory, where you spent so many years. I was there often enough in poor old Carson's days to know that it was a fine old place.

"You will see by this that I am in Halifax, Nova Scotia. My regiment was ordered off here last November, and I am just beginning to feel settled. It is not so cold here as it was in Quebec. There is capital moose hunting tip the country. I don't admire my accommodations much; but it is not a bad little town, considering all things. The people are pleasant, and there is some stir and gayety occasionally.

"Not long before leaving Quebec, who do you think turned up?

No less a person than Paolo Langhetti, who in the course of his wanderings came out there. He had known some extraordinary adventures on his voyage out; and these are the immediate cause of this letter.

"He took passage early in June last in the ship Tecumseh, from Liverpool for Quebec. It was an emigrant ship, and crammed with passengers. You have heard all about the horrors of that middle passage, which occurred last year, when those infernal Liverpool merchants, for the sake of putting a few additional pounds in their pockets, sent so many thousands to destruction.

"The Tecumseh was one of these. It was crammed with emigrants. You know Langhetti's extraordinary pluck, and his queer way of devoting himself for others. Well, what did he do but this: as soon as the ship-fever broke out he left the cabin and took up his abode in the steerage with the sick emigrants. He is very quiet about this, and merely says that he helped to nurse the sick. I know what that means.

"The mortality was terrific. Of all the ships that came to Quebec on that fatal summer the Tecumseh showed the largest record of deaths. On reaching the quarantine station Langhetti at once insisted on continuing his attendance on the sick. Hands were scarce, and his offer was eagerly accepted. He staid down there ever so long till the worst of the sickness was over.

"Among the passengers on the Tecumseh were three who belonged to the superior class. Their names were Brandon. He took a deep interest in them. They suffered very much from sickness both during the voyage and at quarantine. The name at once attracted him, being one well known both to him and to us. At last they all died, or were supposed to have died, at the quarantine station. Langhetti, however, found that one of them was only in a 'trance state,' and his efforts for resuscitation were successful. This one was a young girl of not more than sixteen years of age. After her restoration he left the quarantine bringing her with him, and came up to the city. Here he lived for a month or so, until at last he heard of me and came to see me.

"Of course I was delighted to see him, for I always thought him the noblest fellow that ever breathed, though most undoubtedly cranky if not crazy. I told him we were going to Halifax, and as he had no settled plan I made him come here with me.

"The girl remained for a long time in a state of mental torpor, as though her brain had been affected by disease, but the journey here had a beneficial effect on her, and during her stay she has steadily improved. About a week ago Langhetti ventured to ask her all about herself.

"What will you say when I tell you that she is the daughter of poor Ralph Brandon, of Brandon Hall, your father's friend, whose wretched fate has made us all so miserable. You know nothing of this, of course; but where was Thornton? Why did not he do something to prevent this horror, this unutterable calamity? Good God! what suffering there is in this world!

"Now, Courtenay, I come to the point. This poor Edith Brandon, still half-dead from her grief, has been able to tell us that she has still a relative living. Her eldest brother Louis went to Australia many years ago. A few weeks before her father's death he wrote to his son telling him every thing, and imploring him to come home. She thinks that her brother must be in England by this time.

"I want you to hunt up Louis Brandon. Spare no trouble. In the name of God, and by the memory of your father, whose most intimate friend was this poor old Brandon, I entreat you to search after Louis Brandon till you find him, and let him know the fate of his friends. I think if she could see him the joy of meeting one relative would restore her to health.

"My boy, I know I have said enough. Your own heart will impel you to do all that can be done for the sake of this poor young girl. You can find out the best ways of learning information. You had better go up at once to London and make arrangements for finding Brandon. Write me soon, and let me know.

"Your affectionate uncle,

"HENRY DESPARD."

Despard read this letter over and over. Then he put it in his pocket, and walked up and down the room in deep thought. Then he took out Mrs. Thornton's note and studied it for a long time. So the hours passed away, until at length two o'clock came and he set out for Thornton Grange.

On entering the drawing-room, Mrs. Thornton was there.

"So you have come at last," said she, as they shook hands.

"As if I would not come ten times a day if I could," was the answer, in an impetuous voice.

"Still there is no reason why you should persistently avoid the Grange."

"What would you say if I followed my own impulse, and came here every day?"

"I would say, Good-morning, Sir. Still, now that you are here, you must stay."

"I will stay, whether I must or not."

"Have you recovered from the effect of my prayer-book yet?"

"No, nor ever will I. You brought the same one last Sunday."

"That was in order to weaken the effect. Familiarity breeds contempt, you know."

"Then all I can say is, that contempt has very extraordinary manifestations. Among other strange things, it makes me cover my paper with that pattern when I ought to be writing on the Mosaic Economy."

"Cosmogony, you mean."

"Well, then, Cosmogony."

"Cosmogony is such a delicious word! It has been the hope of my life to be able to introduce it in a conversation. There is only one other word that compares with it."

"What is it?"

"I am afraid to pronounce it."

"Try, at any rate."

"Idiosyncrasy," said Mrs. Thornton. For five or six years I have been on the look-out for an opportunity to use that word, and thus far I have been unsuccessful. I fear that if the opportunity did occur I would call it 'idiocracy.' In fact, I know I would."

"And what would be the difference? Your motive would be right, and it is to motives that we must look, not acts."

After some further badinage, Mrs. Thornton drew a letter from her pocket.

"Here," said she, gravely, "is Paolo's letter. Read it, and tell me what you think of it."

Despard took the letter and began to read, while Mrs. Thornton, sitting opposite to him, watched his face.

The letter was in Italian, and was accompanied by a large and closely-written manuscript of many pages.

"HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA, January 2, 1847.

"MY SWEETEST LITTLE SISTER,—I send you my diary, as I promised you, my Teresella, and you will see all my adventures. Take care of yourself, be happy, and let us hope that we may see one another soon. I am well, through the mercy of the good God, and hope to continue so. There is no such thing as music in this place, but I have found an organ where I can play. My Cremona is uninjured, though it has passed through hard times—it sends a note of love to my Teresina. Remember your Paolo to the just and upright Thornton, whom you love. May God bless my little sister's husband, and fill his heart with love for the sweetest of children!

"Read this manuscript carefully, Teresola mia dolcissima, and pray for the souls of those unhappy ones who perished by the pestilence."

WANTED—A HERO.

Editor Harper's Bazar:

I AM going to send you a wonderful story which will electrify all your readers, and also the world—but not yet. My want is a common one. I want a hero. A heroine is easy enough: any thing over fifteen and under thirty that has orbs and braids (I do so love fine writing!) will make a superb heroine without the least trouble; for if the author's brains refuse to give her any character he can dress her with a dozen strokes of his pen, and no more is needed. Old and practiced writer as these few sentences show me to be, I must own that I find a hero hard to get. Hitherto I have chosen both from the boundless realms of fancy; but as every body persisted afterward in giving them the "local habitation and name" of my visiting acquaintance, I have now resolved never more to choose a character except from real life; I intend thereby to establish a reputation for rare imaginative faculty. I have now a heroine ready-made in my most intimate friend—a rather pretty girl with a rich complexion, eyes that roll easily, and a mouth that pouts without much effort. She is so straightforward, so retiring, so willing to own her own intellectual deficiencies (brains are such a bore in a pretty woman, you know, speaking from a manly point of view); so careful of the morals of her family and friends; has such a sweet, languid voice in which to give pleading advice; is so proper, and so unconscious of her charms, that I know the most unskillful writer could get her through half a volume before a suspicion would be aroused of her being the subtlest coquette and the falsest friend ever found in or out of a book.

And now I am in search of a hero. One day last week I left the pure breezes of my rural residence (is that the correct phrase?) and journeyed to New York, seeking one. On the Jersey City ferry-boat I was sure I had found my man. Tall and heavily but gracefully put together, with blue eyes and golden brown hair, he seemed to me the living image of some old Saxon knight. I watched him in unspeakable admiration, until—"This world is all a fleeting show." I might have known it. Ask me no more. I buried that hero hurriedly, and on his grave-stone I wrote, with averted eyes, Tobacco. During the day I met a pensive youth of medium height, with deep, tender eyes, darkly-bright, like the ashes thrown over burning coals; his words, spoken in rich, full tones, were precious; but—again—vanity and vexation of spirit. It was election-day, and doubtless voting all day is appetizing; this time it was Bologna Sausage. I absolutely decline a hero who is addicted to sausages of any kind. I tried a third style; he was short, and did not look like a Saxon knight; but it is useless to talk of him, for he is short, and so is—another. And though one has blue eyes, and the other dear, dark ones, and in all respects save height they are as unlike as day and night, Mrs. Grundy would surely say my hero was this other, and I should drag through a wretched existence ever after knowing myself the miserable being who had brought her most sacred feelings to the public market. I came home sore distressed that day; my sweet little heroine is slaying her thousands, and I have not found a hero even yet.

I might end here; but speaking of that day reminds me that if I did not find the touch of human nature in the men I met that I went out to seek, I found some very soothing touches of womanly nature in the stores wherein I divided my intellectual labors with the no less fatiguing ones of choosing ribbons and trimmings. I was worried about more things than the trifling want of a hero that day, and my nerves were all on the strain. It was fortunate for me that my shopping took me always into stores where women instead of men were clerks. Not that I mean to join the hue and cry against men, or the semblance of men, who live by "measuring tape." I don't in the least doubt that there are many who are born and fashioned expressly for the purpose of cutting up purple and fine linen; and that if they were to be driven from this way of earning their bread, butter, cigars, and perfumery, they would have to be dependent on their wife, aunt, or sister, or else beg: a cruelty of which the American heart is incapable, I fondly trust. Only I would like it understood that the true reason is this, and nothing else. I hardly think I differ very much from the rest of my sex in saying, that if I must flirt, I prefer to flirt in my own social sphere; and so to me it is very pleasant to be waited on by gentle, patient, pleasant girls; to see nicely-kept, womanly hands moving among the silks and laces; to look up and see a pleasant face, and hear a soft voice answering my questions; and all these things, gentle manners, pleasant faces, simple, unaffected ways, and soothing voices, seem to me universal among the shop-girls of New York. I would like to make a real, true heroine out of one of these. I wonder where they live, and how they learn to be so ladylike, and how they keep from fancying that dangles and attentions will make them more pleasing. I wonder if they look just as pleasant and womanly when they go home at night; if so, how their little brothers and sisters must love them, and regard them as a sort of goddess. I wonder if they try to be cheerful and good to their big brothers, to entertain them as if they were beaux (hard work as it is to please big brothers), keeping them out of mischief for the time being, and giving them pure, sweet remembrances to keep them from evil in the time to come? It looks to me as if they did all this, as well as please many a wearied eye by their bright faces, and soothe many an aching nerve by their gentle answers, as they show off silks and ribbons, or name the color and the price.

"BOTH WERE LOOKING UPON THE SETTING SUN."

They almost console one for the lack of a hero.

Very sincerely,

ELIZABETH MARJORYBANKS.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Tuesday Morn.—Glancing through the advertising columns of the newspapers, it is curious to notice how many gilded traps are set to catch the unwary. Nothing more would seem necessary to the acquiring of a fortune than to send from three cents to one dollar, as the case may be, to a given address, when the applicant will be shown the way to wealth. Generally the first inclosure of money is followed by a demand for a few shillings more to allow the candidate admission into the penetralia of mysteries. This being paid, sometimes no further reply comes—or perhaps a recipe is sent for something utterly useless or impracticable. Such advertisements almost invariably bring disappointment to those who answer them. Saw an instance in a London journal this morning, which is a fair sample of results in general. A certain John Green advertised that he wanted "persons of either sex to do fancy work at their own homes," for which they would receive from "one to eight guineas per week." A lady who answered the advertisement was informed that the art was "Tinting by Reflection," that it would be in great demand at Christmas, and that full instructions and materials would be sent on receipt of five shillings. The money was sent, and the "instructions and materials" returned in the following form: "MADAM,—Herewith I inclose you materials and instructions. The materials will be renewed whenever you ask for them.—JOHN GREEN. Draw twenty-four little and very ludicrous Chinese figures (making them form a scene) on each sheet of prepared paper. Cut them each three parts out with a knife." The inclosure called the "materials" was five half-sheets of small note-paper perfectly plain.

Women incline to entire freedom in athletic sports and occupations. Parlor croquet, and even skating on ice-bound ponds does not satisfy. A young lady out West, probably envying Weston's fame, challenges some one of her own sex to compete with her in walking. A club of young ladies has been formed in Hyannis, Massachusetts, for the purpose of engaging in the popular game of base-ball. And, far away, on the Mediterranean Sea, there sails a Dutch yacht, called the Verney, which is commanded by a Miss Tinne—suppose I should say Captain Tinne. She is about twenty-seven years of age, and attracts great attention. Her suite is composed of four persons dressed in rich and picturesque costume after the fashion of the East. These things do not belong to the "progress of the age." Oh no! Women of olden times were far ahead of us—only necessity, more than pleasure and ambition, was their motive power. In Ohio there lives a woman one hundred and two years old. In 1799 she moved from Virginia to Ohio with her family, and walked the whole distance, carrying an infant in her arms. And as to horseback riding—it was the only mode of locomotion sometimes—my grandmother rode some eighty miles on horseback through unbroken forests to her wilderness home in New England, guiding her horse with one hand, and holding her infant child with the other. Years ago there lived in Wales the greatest hunter, shooter, and fisher of her time—Margaret Uch Evan. She kept a dozen or two of dogs—terriers, greyhounds, and spaniels. She hunted foxes, roved excellently, was a famous fiddler of old Welsh music, a very good joiner, and the best wrestler of her time, few young men daring to try a fall with her. Enough accomplishments, surely, for one woman!

Evening.—Is it any use to be indignant? any use to plead for the little children whose red knees, for fashion's sake, are exposed to the piercing air? Mr. T. quite laughed at me when I returned from shopping to-day—and terribly cold it was out—because I was so "eloquent," as he said, regarding velvet-robed and fur-enveloped mothers who wouldn't put warm, long stockings upon their shivering children. "Why, it's the fashion," said he, "to show the pretty leg, I suppose—must follow the fashion, of course!" "Well," I retorted with unnecessary warmth, considering Mr. T. is not a fashionable mother, "the next fashion they will follow will be croup, or lung fever, or scarlatina!" "I am afraid so," said he, seriously; "if the records of mortality went back to the first cause it would be said of many little ones, 'Died of bare knees.'"

Wednesday Eve.—Our household medical books give special antidotes for various kinds of poison—white of eggs for this, mustard for that, and so on. But if a sudden accident occurs one can scarcely remember which remedy is the efficacious one. The following, clipped from an English paper, is easily remembered, and seems reasonable:

"Sweet-oil is an antidote for poison. A poison of any conceivable description and degree of potency, which has been swallowed, may be rendered instantly harmless by taking two gills of sweet-oil. An individual with a very strong constitution should take twice the quantity. This oil will neutralize every form of vegetable or mineral poison with which physicians and chemists are acquainted."

Mr. Typeset had been intently occupied with Blackwood's Magazine this evening, when he looked up, saying:

"I don't mean any thing personal—not at all—but wouldn't this be good for your Diary?" And he read, without giving me the slightest clew to the connection: "I've nothin' to say agin' her piety, my dear; but I know very well I shouldn't like her to cook my victuals. When a man comes in hungry an' tired, piety won't feed him, I reckon. Hard carrots will lie heavy on his stomach, piety or no piety. I called in one day when she was dishin' up Mr. Tryan's dinner, an' I could see the potatoes was as watery as water. It's right enough to be speretial—I'm no enemy to that; but I like my potatoes mealy. I don't see as any body'll go to heaven the sooner for not digestin' their dinner."

An amusing collection of errors has appeared in a little volume published in France, which promises to teach the Portuguese—perhaps not in six easy lessons, but in a very brief time—how to converse in English. A quotation from the preface is comical enough, and a sample of many portions of the book itself:

"We expect then, who the little book (for the care what we wrote him, and for her typographical correction) that may be worth the acceptance of the studious persons, and especially of the youth, at which we dedicate him particularly."

A writer about old-time customs gives a curious account of the food spread before the students at Harvard College in 1769. The standing dish was fresh beef baked—now and then a hard, Indian meal pudding—and a baked plain pudding once a quarter. For supper they had their choice of meat or pies, or bread and milk. No mention of vegetables. "Every scholar carried to the dining-table his own knife and fork, and, when he had dined, wiped them on the table-cloth!"

Thursday Eve.—An English lady of uncertain mind on many points considered it essential to her comfort to have them established by some standard authority. So she appealed recently to an English magazine of fashion, and received the following answers to one or two of her numerous important queries: "It is impossible to say what is the 'correct' height for a lady; tastes vary. Five feet nothing will excite the admiration of some as a graceful little thing, while five feet six inches would, by others, be considered a fine, elegant creature. Five feet four inches is rather above the middle height, but not 'tall.' We do not know if brunettes are to be 'all the rage when winter comes.' No amount of intimacy justifies a gentleman in kissing a lady without her permission; this does not mean that it shall be accorded in so many words; ladies are quite capable, without language, of expressing a gentle encouragement or the reverse. Without this encouragement few gentlemen will presume."

A London paper says that a vegetable gas has been discovered, giving good light and being free from smell, which can be manufactured by any family at their kitchen fire. But what is the vegetable which yields such a valuable product? And can it be bought at Washington Market, or must one cultivate it himself? Really it would be pleasant to be free from extortionate gas bills!

A man thinks himself justified in learning all he can about a lady to whom he is thinking of "popping the question." He studies her character, tests her temper, and calls early in the morning to see if he can catch her in deshabille. A woman has not half the opportunity to find out whether it is wise for her to say "Yes" when the question is asked. Somebody sums up the needful test as follows: "If a man waits patiently while a woman is 'putting her things on,' or 'shopping,' he will make a good husband."

Friday.—"To remain at rest in any position until a feeling of chilliness is induced is sufficient to bring on an attack of inflammation of the lungs, however vigorous and robust the person may feel." So says a physician.

Have much enjoyed Schiller's "Song of the Bell," translated by Alfred Baskerville. There are many choice bits, as this picture of home and the mother:

"Within it reigns
The prudent mother;
In wisdom's ways
Her house she sways;
Instructeth the girls,
Controlleth the boys;
With diligent hands
She works and commands;
Increases the gains,
And order maintains.

With treasures the sweet-smelling wardrobe she stores,
And busily over the spinning-wheel pores;
She hoards in the bright polished presses, till full,
The snowy-white linen, the sparkling wool;
The bright and the showy to good she disposes,
And never reposes."

The duties of the husband are more briefly set forth:

"The husband must fight
The battle of life;
Must plant and create,
Watch, snare, and debate;
Must venture and stake,
His fortune to make."

Saturday Eve.—Nothing makes our parlors so bright and pleasant, next to cheerful, loving faces, as to have green, growing plants, and fresh blossoms in the windows. But in order to derive much satisfaction from plants, one must have time to tend them, a sunny window, some practical knowledge of horticulture, and not a little skill and patience. And I often find that my geraniums and roses flourish finely when out of doors in the summer, but when I bring them into the house the leaves drop, the plant droops, and sometimes I have scarcely a blossom. Wish I could be as successful as some are. Think I will try something simple this winter. The sweet-potato really sends forth a beautiful vine, and so little trouble as it gives. Place a sweet-potato in a glass of water, passing a pin through the tuber so as to keep the lower end an inch from the bottom of the vessel. Keep on the mantle-shelf, in a warm room, and every day give it the sun for an hour or two. Soon rootlings will appear, aiming for the bottom of the vessel; and in two or three weeks the eye will begin to shoot and rapidly grow and run upon suspended twine, or any little trellis-work prepared for it. The morning glory is easily cultivated in a sunny window, and flowers beautifully through the winter. If an acorn is suspended so as nearly to touch the water in a tumbler, and set on the mantle, it will, after a few weeks, send a root down into the water, while little green leaves will spring upward, making a miniature oak-tree. Of course the waste of water by evaporation should be supplied.

It is announced that a convention of maiden ladies is to be held at Little Rock, Arkansas, "to gain a true knowledge of the nature and attributes of men." Married ladies acquire this knowledge from day to day, without holding any formal meeting for the purpose.

THE TENANTS OF MALORY. A Novel.

By J. S. LE FANU, Author of "Uncle Silas," "Guy Deverell," "All in the Dark," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

No writer more fully fulfills the odd idiomatic expression of "carrying the reader along with him." The reader is "carried along" wherever Mr. Le Fanu pleases—by the strangest and most out-of-the-way routes, by the most simple and flowery paths, by the most doleful, difficult, and mysterious tunnelings, swiftly, certainly, and willingly, to the end. So swiftly and so eagerly, indeed, that sometimes when he has finished it he indurges himself, after a breathing halt, with a slower examination of his favorite chapters, and begins reading the novel a second time, musing over it, smiling at it, wondering he did not foresee this and comprehend that, conscious of meanings missed and prophetic hints overlooked in his great hurry, and finding the second perusal even more pleasant than the first.—London Times.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents;

best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize

in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound

by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo,

and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about

10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea

Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail

Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for

ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooper-

ages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents

in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or

Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package

to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and

small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of

Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos.

31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

II.

ANNO 1720.—One of the chief ornaments of the court of London in 1720 was the sparkling, black-eyed Lady Kingston. Lady Kingston (née Chudleigh) was the wife of a colonel in the British army. The husband and wife, however, as was by no means uncommon in those days, were perfectly indifferent to each other. But as the latter had talent, wit, and spirit enough for ten women, was the first lady of fashion in London, and was surrounded by the most exclusive admirers, chief among whom was Captain Hervey, afterward Earl of Bristol, who married her daughter Elizabeth (famous for her celebrated trial), no wonder, then, that our heroine, in spite of her dubious position, acquired an importance among the gentry which the most circumspect sought in vain. If she spoke, she was witty; if silent, she was still more interesting. Every thing she did was proper or clever; every thing she wore, or her way of wearing it, was a model, and set the fashion.

Fashion had at that time come, as it were, to a stand-still in London. The ladies discontentedly dragged out a monotonous existence between long-trailing robes or dresses looped up on the right side; and the London dress and fashion makers were at their wit's end and in despair. They toiled through mountains of works on dress, but every thing had already been in vogue. The old English pride naturally forbade the adoption of a new fashion, or of any thing new from France; originality left the craftiest heads in the lurch; the situation was dreadful.

Under these circumstances Lady Kingston, who was most concerned, took a bold resolution. "Away with this rubbish, Mary!" said she, angrily, one morning, on inspecting her wardrobe, "and send for Mr. Taylor directly; I will put an end to this state of things." Half an hour after Mr. Taylor entered her boudoir with a cheerfulness quite in accordance with the existing circumstances. "Mr. Taylor, I am tired of these eternal trains. I have made a resolution which will overthrow all present fashions—overthrow them, I tell you."

"My lady—"

"Silence, Mr. Taylor, till I ask your advice; I don't need it now. Just listen, understand, and then do what you are told. Our great Queen Elizabeth, as I learned from Hope's Book of Costumes yesterday, wore under her dress a kind of skirt stiffened with cane or whalebone. Such a skirt gave the figure an extraordinarily majestic appearance—immeasurably superior to our trains."

"My lady—"

"Mr. Taylor, you are a chatter-box! I will wear just such a stiffened skirt—we will call it hoop-skirt—not like Queen Elizabeth's, under the dress, but over it, or rather without any dress at all."

The wretched Mr. Taylor almost fell off his chair, but it would have required the spirit of a lion to make any further objection; moreover he was very near the door. The skirt was described to the minutest detail. It was to be of sea-green silk, quilted with light-red thread, padded, or, rather, bolstered with down, stiffened with whalebone, and provided with ornamental loops in front, so that it might be held with greater comfort. A fine padded underskirt of Holland linen was devised at the same time, which should leave the feet visible to any extent.

Thus habited Lady Kingston appeared one summer afternoon in St. James's Park, with her page to clear the way; and no one dared to laugh at the Empress of Fashion. The people stared amazed; they admired; and, from mouth to mouth, through the attentive throng, passed the approving words "All right!"

FACETIE.

May a speech on board ship be called a deck oration?—Possibly. In some conditions of weather a speech well delivered would entitle any one to a decoration.

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

HALF-MINUTES WITH OUR BEST AUTHORS.

WILKIE COLLINS—Wrote "The Dead Secret." If intrusted to him, he should not have done it.

Mrs. J. H. RUSSELL—Wrote "Far Above Rubies." She must have a heavy account at her publisher's.

Rev. W. BLUNT—Wrote "Plain Sermons." We are not surprised to hear it.

HOLME LEE—Wrote "In the Silver Age." We presume this was before the period of our copper currency.

MISS BRADDON—Wrote "Lady Audley's Secret," and published it to the world: while another AUTHOR—Wrote "More Secrets than One." Shame! MATILDA BETHAM EDWARDS—Wrote "A Winter with the Swallows in Algeria." We presume her book is all about flies, and how to catch them.

J. KEAST LORD—Has written "At Home in the Wilderness." We hope his subject is not so barren as his house.

MISS YONGE—Wrote "The Book of Golden Deeds." We presume this is a very bright book.

CROWE—Wrote "A History of Painting in Italy." But we presume he took but a bird's-eye view of the subject.

CHARLES LEVER—Wrote "One of Them." We were always under the impression that he had written a great many more.

J. T. BLIGHT—Wrote "A Week at the Land's End." We presume his subject finished there.

Mrs. C. J. NEWBY—Wrote "Common Sense." Excellent woman, Mrs. Newby!

Dr. OWGAN—Wrote "Out of the World." Wonder where he wrote it!

Mr. WILKIE COLLINS—Wrote "After Dark." It must have tried his eyesight.

MOST UNDOUBTEDLY—Must not the gentleman who, a short time back, wrote to his "Dearest wife" necessarily be a polygamist?

A boy at a crossing, begging something of a gentleman, the latter told him he would give him something when he came back. "Your honor," replied the boy, "you would be surprised if you knew how much money I lose by giving credit that way."

The old lady who used to dry her clothes on the Equinoctial Line has gone to Greenland to get the North Pole to draw cistern water with.

A CONSCIENCE-STROKEN UMBRELLA STEALER.—Umbrellas have the reputation of being considered public property. Few of the family, when once "taken in mistake," ever find their way back to the rightful owner. It is a marvel to hear of restoration, and we just happen to have heard of one such case. A gentleman of Chesterfield had missed his umbrella for some time, but a day or two ago found it in a conspicuous place on his premises with the following inscription pinned upon it: "This umbrallar as prade hon my konsheins ever sin I stole him. W. R."

What ladies are best to go fishing with?—An-nette and Caroline.

TELL ME NOT, ETC.

After Longfellow.

Tell me not in mournful numbers
Life is but an empty dream,
That I've not waked from childish slumbers,
That swells are not what they seem.

Life is real, and life is earnest,
Base deception's not its end;
And those golden locks thou spurnest,
Only Nature's self can lend.

Can the beau monde's fair complexions
Furnished be by mortal art?
Bought? like votes at base elections—
Hired? the charms that win the heart.

This is not an age of wonder,
Yet me with these tales you cram,
Rending all ideas asunder,
Saying footmen's calves are sham.

Lives of great swells all remind me
I can make my dress sublime;
And, departing, leave behind me
Footprints on the sands of Time.

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sauntering down the row in vain,
Some forlorn emulé brother
Seeing, may take heart again.

Let me, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Women's beauty still pursuing,
Trusting and believing mate!

A youngster who was taken into a toy bazar the other day by his doting mamma had a number of articles exhibited by the attentive clerk, in the hope of enlisting his attention and effecting a sale, but without effect. At last one of those papier-mâché representations of a mouse was produced, and, after being wound up by a key, was set down upon the floor, where it ran about in the most mouse-like manner imaginable. The youngster's attention was enlisted at once, but the result was not as his mother or the salesman expected, for he shouted out, "Oh, mamma, I don't want that; we've got lots of those at home, and don't have to wind 'em up, either."

"Shure, which is the entrance out?" asked an Irishman at a railway station the other day.

MOVING FOR A NEW TRIAL—Courting a second wife.

THE ONLY REAL SAFETY MATCHES AFTER ALL—Rich marriages.

What is the difference between a watch-maker and a jailer? One sells watches and the other watches cells.

Why is a water-lily like a whale?—They both come to the surface to blow.

On a child being told that he must be broken of a bad habit, he replied, "Papa, hadn't I better be mended?"

Mrs. Partington has been reading the health officer's weekly reports, and thinks that "total" must be an awful disease, since as many die of it as all the rest put together.

An instance of the ruling passion strong in death is related of old Cook, the miser. On his death-bed, when his end was approaching, a tallow-candle was burning on a stand, and a flickering flame in the fireplace. Suddenly he called to his son, saying, "Woodbury, come here!" The son approached his bedside, when the old man whispered, "Woodbury, blow out that candle; tallow's most as dear as butter."

A young lady who was reading a novel was asked by a gentleman how she liked the style. "The style? the style?" was the answer; "oh, Sir, I've not come to that yet."

HOW TO FIND HAPPINESS—Look in a dictionary.

A little girl once hearing the remark that all people had once been children, artlessly inquired, "Who took care of the babies?"

What stone should have been placed at the Garden of Eden after the expulsion?—Adam aint in (Adamantine).

Ohio is blessed with highway robbers. An old man returning from market with a large sum of money saw the knights of the road approaching, dropped his money in the bottom of the wagon, and, when they roughly asked him where it was, having vainly searched him, he assumed an expression of extreme fright, and stammered out, "Haven't got paid yet; but if you'll stop me to-morrow night you'll find it."

OLD EPITAPHS.

Here lies, cut down like unripe fruit,
The wife of Deacon Amos Shute;
She died of drinking too much coffee,
Anny Doiny eighteen forty.

Owen More has gone away,
Owing more than he can pay.

Here lies the body of Thomas Smith,
And what is somewhat rareish,
He was born, bred, and hanged in this parish.

Here lies the wife of Roger Martin,
She was a good wife to Roger that's sartin;
The manner of her death was thus,
She was druv over by a buss.

A POINT ANY WOMAN CAN APPRECIATE—Point lace.

A plate of apples was being passed round a group of children. There was a fine red one at the top, which a little girl took. "How greedy you are," said her next neighbor, "to take the largest! I meant to have had that myself."

"Sir," said one of two antagonists, with great dignity, to the other, during a dispute which had not been confined to words, "you have called me a liar and a scoundrel; you have spit in my face; you have struck me twice. I hope you will not rouse the sleeping lion in my breast, for if you should, I can not tell what may be the consequences."

TO REMOVE STAINS FROM CHARACTER—Get rich.

Charley, the other day, on seeing a number of funerals, expressed a wish that he might die before heaven was full.

"My dear doctor," said an Irishman, "it's no use your giving me an emetic; I tried it twice in Dublin, and it would not stay on my stomach five minutes."

MY JEWEL.

THE pearl is a gem I dearly prize
So pure and white it gleams;
The diver dives for it where it lies
Concealed from the sun's bright beams
In the hidden hearts of the ocean's cells,
'Neath the foamy crested waves,
Deep down in the merman-haunted den,
And the myriad mystic caves.

The opal burns with a sullen fire,
But I love its lurid light;
The sapphire shines with the blue of the sea;
And the topaz glistens bright;
The emerald's hue is as softly green
As the early buds of spring,
When the violet by old roots is seen,
And the blue-bird lifts his wing.

The amethyst, like a purple mist,
With shadowy splendor glooms;
The ruby's red is ruddier far
Than the reddest rose that blooms—
Ruddier far than the reddest rose
That ever on earth was seen,
As red as the royal blood that flows
In the heart of an Eastern Queen.

Hidden far down from the glory of day
The scintillant diamond shines,
Where the miners delve 'neath the vaulted glooms
In the depths of Golconda's mines;
The golden light of the sunbeam lives
In the fair gem's scintillant cells,
Imprisoned there, like a flame, and gives
The splendor that in them dwells.

But a fairer jewel by far have I
Than diamond or pearl,
For sapphire-hued are the love-lit eyes
Of this rare and radiant girl;
She has topaz lights in her wavy hair;
And her ruby tinted lips
Are sweeter far than the honeyed lair
Where the roving king-bee sips.

No glittering gems on her hand she wears,
No jewels in her ear;
But to me though clad in the wide world's wealth
She could not be more dear—
For queen of my heart and its boundless love
Is this rare and radiant girl,
And her lightest value is far above
The price of the costliest pearl.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1867.

THE BEST READING CHEAP.

MRS. MULOCK CRAIK'S new Love Story, "The Woman's Kingdom," will be commenced in HARPER'S MAGAZINE for January, and will be continued through the year. It will occupy about one-eighth of each Number, and so will cost subscribers fifty cents. When completed, the English edition will cost 16s. sterling; about equivalent to $7.

Mr. JAMES DE MILLE'S Novel, "Cord and Creese," now appearing in HARPER'S BAZAR, will run through several months. When published in book form the probable price will be $4. In the BAZAR its cost is about twenty-five cents.

Mr. WILKIE COLLINS'S new Novel, "The Moonstone," will be commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for January 4, 1868. If it runs to the usual length of his stories it will occupy about one year; and when published in London the cost will be a guinea and a half; equal to about $11. The cost to those who obtain it in the WEEKLY will be about one dollar.

Our first large COLORED FASHION PLATE will shortly appear, to be followed at brief intervals by others, prepared expressly for HARPER'S BAZAR, and unequalled for taste and beauty.

Single Subscribers to HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied from the beginning to the end of the year 1868, which will complete the first Volume, for the yearly price of four dollars.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied together for ten dollars, or any two at seven dollars.

WASTE OF APPETITE.

THE appetite for food has been conferred upon man, as upon other animals, not only to delight his taste, but to nourish his body. With the usual tendency, however, of human beings to seek a temporary and immediate pleasure, we too often neglect a permanent and remote good. This is especially observable in our eating and drinking. The tempting morsel or seductive draught, offered whether it may be, is taken with avidity, without any regard to its possible effect upon the future health. There is, however, no more frequent cause of serious disease than this irregular eating and drinking.

The human, as well as other animal bodies, to be properly nourished, must be fed in accordance with those laws which Nature herself having established, can not be disobeyed without suffering the usual penalty of ill-health.

Physiology teaches us that most articles of food require from three to four hours to digest, and that any interference with this function will seriously derange its operation. Now when it has once commenced nothing is more fatal to its action than the introduction into the stomach of fresh food. This gives the organ a new and difficult labor to perform, and thus doubles at once its work. "The stomach," as Sir Astley Cooper candidly acknowledged, "is not a Wedgewood mortar," but a living organism, which can indeed withstand a great deal of use, but not abuse.

To escape dyspepsia and the thousand other ailments which arise from the disobedience of the laws of digestion it is absolutely necessary to eat and drink only at regular periods. It is always unsafe to take any food whatsoever between meals. The ordinary arrangement of these in well-regulated households is the best—say three repasts a day, separated from each other by intervals of five hours. This gives time not only for the full completion of the process of digestion, but for that repose essential to the recovery by the stomach of its strength, which is necessary for the renewal of its duties.

The habit so prevalent among American women of frequenting the confectioner and pastry-cook is one which is telling seriously upon their health. It is not that a bonbon, an ice-cream, or a tart, is directly injurious, for these, when taken at the proper time, are not necessarily unwholesome articles of food. They are, however, seldom taken at the proper time, but eaten too soon after or before the daily meals. They thus either interfere with digestion or exhaust the appetite, and prevent it from satisfying itself with more solid food, essential to the nutrition and health of the body.

Some young dames think it doubtless more delicate to feed like nightingales on a flimsy diet of sweets. They can thus pleasantly gratify their appetites at the counter of the confectioner, and at the table refuse, with an elegant disdain, the solidities of roast beef and pudding. Their young admirers, with an aversion, like Lord Byron, to seeing a woman eat, may be charmed at their languid use of knife and fork. If they will listen, however, to the old family doctor he will tell them that every dame, delicate as she may be, has a stomach which is carnivorous, and not bonbonivorous. If our pretty young women desire to preserve their health and beauty we recommend them to make their regular appearance at each family meal, and take their fair share of unsentimental but wholesome grub, and not disturb their digestion or waste their appetites at the confectioner's or pastry-cook's.

CHILD HARDENING.

THERE is a prevalent notion that children can be hardened, as it is called, or rendered insensible, by exposure to the effects of weather. This is a vulgar error and a dangerous one. Those who hold to it will point triumphantly, in proof of their opinion, to those rugged offspring of poverty, occasionally seen, who, in spite of their nakedness, seem to defy the cold and the storm. These, however, are the few of the many that disease has left untouched; they are the hardy plants which remain in the wastes of misery unwithered and undestroyed by the neglect and pestilence which have decayed and killed most of those of kindred growth.

It is a well-established fact that a much larger number of the children of the poor and miserable suffer from disease and die than of those of the rich and luxurious. The offspring of misery who survive are mostly the fortunate few endowed with an inherent vigor of constitution which is proof against the severest trials. None but the strongest children of poverty are left. The weakest scion of wealth is often nurtured by care to health and long life. Luxury may not always make the most rational use of its opportunities in the bringing up of its fortunate offspring, but it has nothing to learn from misery in the forced neglect of its unhappy progeny, except that the health and life of the young are only to be preserved by the most careful tending.

The surface of the body can not, as is often supposed, be hardened by continued exposure to cold or intemperate weather of any kind. The skin, when in a wholesome condition, is soft and moist, and, moreover, is being constantly renewed, so that, whatever may be the age of the animal, its integument is always fresh and young. It thus constantly preserves its tenderness and its sensibility to changes of temperature and other impressions. It is true that certain parts of the skin, as that in the palm of the hand of the manual worker, does thicken and become hard. This, however, is not a natural state; and if by any process the whole surface of the body were covered with a similar shell of callousness its vitality would probably be destroyed. It is necessary for the skin to retain its porousness and moist pliability, in order to perform the function of transpiration which is essential to life. On some festive occasion or other, in Paris, the skin of a child was covered with gold-leaf, and died, in consequence, a few hours after, within its stiff and impervious shroud of gilt.

The inherent delicacy of the skin renders it particularly sensitive to cold and drafts of air. It therefore requires protection. The low-necked, short, and sleeveless dress, by which fond mothers delight to show off the swelling busts and rounded limbs of their darlings, is, accordingly, a vanity which can not be indulged in with safety in all latitudes and all seasons. During our severe winters there should be no part of the surface of the body of a child, with the exception of its face, exposed to the external air. With, however, the fiery furnaces, and the more than tropical heat of most of our prosperous interiors, the indoor clothing may be very light, or almost nothing, provided the temperature be uniform, and all drafts and changes of air be avoided. With the prevalent practice of overheating our houses there is always, on going out, a danger in facing the winter's breath. To escape this the greatest possible difference should be made between the indoor and outdoor clothing. This is obviously to be done by relying for warmth chiefly upon the cloaks and coats, pelisses, fur capes, and the exterior garments which are easily put on and off. If the under-clothing, or that ordinarily worn inside of the house, be too heavy, that put on on going out is apt to be too light to protect the body against the difference of temperature, which is the chief danger to be guarded against.

Of course, as air and exercise are essential to the health of the young, they must face the stern winter of their native land; but it is a fatal mistake to suppose that either nature or habit can render them insensible to its withering breath. The only security is in warm clothing, which must not be neglected with any absurd idea of child hardening.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Rich Young Man.

MY DEAR JOHN,—As I was traveling slowly up Broadway a few days since, watching all my fellow-passengers, I saw you coming down in company with your uncle, and you soon passed me twirling your mustache. At the same moment I heard a youth close by me say to his companion, "that's John Johns!" and both of them turned and followed you with their eyes. The two youth and I were walking at about the same rate, and in a few minutes a very famous poet passed us, and I observed that they did not know him. I turned and watched for a little while, and saw that he went on quite unnoticed. When I resumed my walk my young fellow-travelers were out of sight.

Do I blame them for knowing the rich man and following him with eager and admiring eyes, while they did not know the poet? Far from it. A man walking on his elbows down Broadway would have excited more attention from all of us travelers there than the rich man or the poet. Neither, certainly, do I mean to make any offensive comparison between the peculiar interest the youth had in you, and that which those who knew him had in the poet. No, no, my dear Mr. Johns, I am not one of the rather numerous company who are of the opinion, very freely and loudly expressed, that "any nincompoop can make a fortune." I am not of that faith, and yet it must be consolatory as showing how few nincompoops there really are. If I stand at the corner of Wall Street any morning—and if you watch closely you can see me there at least once a week—and look at the throng pouring into the offices of the bankers and traders down the street and in its neighborhood, I see a great many players in the great game, but not a great many who have won high stakes. There is an eager crowd to buy the tickets, but very few bear off the prizes.

And those who do are by no means necessarily nincompoops. They are not necessarily mean or narrow-minded. It is the habit of some of my friends who write in the magazines and who make novels to represent the rich man as of course a vulgar, hard, selfish, ignorant, and repulsive character. But I know too many who are not so; who are sweet, simple, generous, noble men, full of humanity and sympathy, not to feel that the story-writers are unjust. I know, perhaps—I will not be held too strictly to it—as many men spoiled by poverty as by riches. Good men, pinched by poverty, grow sour, and bitter, and cynical, and they even sink gradually into meanness, jealousy, and worse. There are others who, as we all feel, only want a little more money to be true models of manly character and influence. A rich man, dear Mr. Johns, who fully understands his position, uses his riches as Shakespeare did his genius—for the benefit of mankind. He is the steward and almoner of the Divine bounty. It radiates from him like light from the sun. There is no greater blessing to any community than a rich man who regards his riches as a trust for others, not as a hoard for himself.

Now, my dear Mr. Johns, you think that I am a visionary old fool, who is imagining a phoenix, a bird of whose kind there is never but one specimen at any one time, and the kind itself wholly fabulous. Well, certainly, I frankly confess that if you were to look into a mirror, you would not behold the phoenix whom you smile at me for describing. No; if I must describe you, I shall paint a very different kind of bird.

As I said, you were twirling your mustache when you passed me. Your coat was short in the waist and tight in the arms. It was an English shooting-coat. Your trowsers were of a positive checked pattern, tight, and coarse: English trowsers. Your shoes were Balmorals of a tremendous sole: English shoes. You looked like an English merchant going to his office, and you were satisfied, for that was precisely what you most ardently wished to resemble. Yes, my dear Mr. Johns, you looked like a young Podsnap; you were a specimen of the burgeoning British merchant. You have I know not how many thousands and thousands of dollars income every year, and by great pains you had succeeded in imitating the appearance of any of the excellent British youth who come to this country to make their fortunes, and who are conspicuous as they travel with us along Broadway, on their way to earn their small and deserved salaries, for the clumsiness and bad taste of their costume. Yet it is natural to them. In you it is an affectation.

As your dress is, so is your manner. It constantly says that you have a great many more thousands of dollars income than the person you are talking with. You disdain, you condescend, you patronize. Your conduct implies that you are in some indescribable way superior to those with whom you are compelled to mingle. Indeed, instead of associating with a good, jolly company of young men like yourself, forgetting the fact about the income, you take especial care to be seen only with the richest men, as if your responsibilities were too vast and weighty to be tolerable except in the society of the equally responsible. And yet, dear Mr. Johns, you who take these fine superior airs are literally the jackdaw in the peacock's plumage. The money, after all, is not yours in the truest sense—that is, you did not make it. It was left to you.

Do you suppose that nobody thinks of the fact? Why, my young friend, when I see some men who shall be nameless, although they are perfectly familiar to all of us, I remember that they were once poor boys who started from home like Whittington for the great city. And to them as to him, when they doubted and faltered, the bells rang "Turn again! turn again!" And they grappled with the city and all its chances, bringing their wit, their skill, their industry, their patience, their tenacity to the conflict. And now up, now down; victorious here, defeated there; they manfully strove and conquered. They have lost much, for no victory is without price. They meant success, and success to them meant money honestly earned, and they have honestly earned it. They have paid for it many things that some of us may value more. But that is a matter of taste often, and of temperament. And as I read in the revenue lists that the smooth-faced boy of forty and fifty years ago, who did not very well know how to get a dinner, now pays a tax upon fifty or a hundred thousand dollars of income, or even more, I say to him, "Well done, Whittington! you have fought the battle, and you deserve the honors."

His fortune is the monument of his industry and fidelity, of his skill and genius. It is the power applied to money-making which another man devotes to writing history or to painting pictures. For my part I had rather write such a book as Goldwin Smith's "Three English Statesmen" than make fifty thousand dollars by a sagacious commercial adventure to China or South America. But I do not underrate the genius necessary to the latter. I honor the conquering hero wherever I see him. Some of the men of whom I speak have honestly struggled up to five hundred thousand a year, and can not spell correctly nor speak grammatically. No matter. Had I been a Briton I should have hurraed for Nelson when he returned from the Nile, although he had probably never heard of Andromache, and did not know whether Boston were in Massachusetts or Massachusetts in Boston.

But you, my dear young Sir, are no conquering hero. I should have saluted Nelson coming from the Nile, but not his grandson feebly dawdling in a club, although he wore Nelson's coronet. So I respect your grandfather, but not you. It is your grandfather whose skill and industry are commemorated by your money, not yours. When I read in the revenue list that you pay an enormous income-tax, I say merely—if you will pardon the familiarity with the name of your respectable ancestor—"What a long-headed old chap Jonathan Johns was!" Those fine figures are no monument of your capacity. They praise a dead man, and that is what I mean by saying that you are a jackdaw in peacock's feathers. Ah me! how the apprehensive shade of Jonathan Johns must wince as it contemplates Master John Johns in the substantial flesh! Money may not have wings, but it has tandems, and dog-carts, and racers, and yachts, and silver dinner-services, and all the rest, and so makes off. Peace, perturbed Jonathan! The gold dust is scattered upon the river whence you carefully gathered and sifted it, but only for another gatherer and sifter.

You seem to forget, my young Sir, that the only way in which you can justify your existence at all is to use your great trust as not abusing it. Begin, I beg you, by reforming your manners. It might be forgiven to John Jacob Astor, or Napoleon Bonaparte, if their manners had chanced to be haughty and vulgar. They, at last, had in their different ways something beside haughty and vulgar manners. But upon what ground do you propose to defend your insolent behavior? Is it that you have your grandfather's money? Yes, but the honor of Wallace's posterity, had he left any, would have been not that they bore his name and inherited his claymore, but that they could swing it. If they could not, Mr. Johns, the less they said about it the better. Reform your manners. Remember that if the money which you did not make were taken from you you could make no more. The peacock may renew the splendor of his plumage; but the jackdaw—alas! alas! Mr. Johns, it could never put out a solitary little red feather! The only way in which you can justify yourself to the rest of the world for being rich is by using your riches modestly, honorably, and nobly. Then the world will say, and say truly, "Old Jonathan Johns knew how to make money, but he could never have spent it so well as his grandson." To have money, if you have a rich grandfather, is easy and of no credit to yourself. To spend it generously and wisely is evidence of your own character and capacity.

You would think of this, my dear Mr. Johns, if you knew how profound is the contempt which you excite in many minds besides that of

Your true well-wisher and friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CHILDREN'S DRESSES.

THE picturesque costumes worn by the little folks now a days are but miniature copies of those made for children of a larger growth. Gored dresses are cut in the "Princesse" style for little girls just out of the nurse's arms. Rounded jackets, paletots, redingotes, fourreaux, sashes, and tunics, are aped for them by their mammas. Dresses for ordinary wear are made with square yokes, very high in the neck, and quite short on the shoulders. The fullness of the bodice is arranged in melon pleats, or fluting, formed by sewing the goods together, on the wrong side, at intervals of an inch.

GARIBALDI WAISTS.

Garibaldi waists are made for both boys and girls. These waists are objected to as untidy, loose, and careless-looking; but if neatly fitted into the belt and on the shoulders, they need not have this appearance, even on the most active child. Scarcely any other style admits of that freedom of movement which should be the most important consideration in making children's clothes.

BISMARCK SUITS.

A pretty jacket for boys, called the Bismarck—the name refers to the shape, and not to the color—obviates the objection to the Garibaldi, by a belt set on outside the body instead of being inserted. The body is pleated into a round, plain jacket skirt cut to spring over the hips nicely. A strap, bound with velvet and lined with buckram, is sewn over the seam which unites the waist and skirt, concealing the seam, and answering the purpose of a belt. Slanting pockets are simulated on the breast. Zouave trousers, gathered in by elastic at the knee, are worn with the Bismarck jacket.

TRIMMINGS.

Raised full trimmings are always prettier for children's dresses than those sewn on plain and flat. Narrow pinked ruffles, full pleated ruffles, and puffings are more youthful and dressy than folds and velvet ribbons, and when securely stitched on are not liable to be torn off. Sou-tache braid, gilt cord, Persian ribbon, and bias plaid folds—all pretty, but too gay for ladies' use—find their proper sphere on children's dresses. Rich, warm, bright colors, comfortable shape, and a proper attention to the requisitions of the season, are to be considered first, after which the widest range for fancy is admissible.

SCOTCH PLAID, TWEED, SERGE, ETC.

There is in England a mania at present for plaids of all the different Scotch clans for ladies' dresses and wrappings. A revival of these gay styles was predicted here early in the fall, and our merchants imported an unusually large supply of tartan poplins, tweeds, etc., but thus far they have only gained a foothold in children's costumes. There is no more serviceable material for everyday wear than the Scotch all wool plaid. When soiled it is easily washed and looks as well as ever. This is true of the gayest combinations of color. It wears so well that children often outgrow it before a thread of the fabric has started or a hue faded. It is prettily made into gored dresses for little girls, and into jackets and box-pleated skirts for boys not yet out of petticoats. For larger boys there are full Highland costumes with Stuart scarfs, Glengarry caps, and plaid stockings. Two different plaids are sometimes used in the same costume. For instance, an under-dress of shepherd's plaid (black and white barred) is worn under a fourreau of plaid in high colors. The stockings match the under-dress.

Another serviceable material is the Inverness tweed, a durable article, the higher qualities of which rival the English cassimeres in appearance and are only half the price. It may also be washed without injury.

The old-fashioned merinoes, once a staple article, are entirely superseded by the English serge and Valencia. Serge is a twilled fabric, all wool and water-proof. It is not so soft as merino, but is pliable and hangs gracefully. Brown, dark-blue, and scarlet are the favorite colors. It is trimmed with a coarse, wide, worsted galloon, a kind of military braid, or with bias folds of the same. No other woollen material sets so nicely when made into folds. Valencia is a soft woollen goods of merino width, in gay plaids and in solid colors. Winseys of dark grounds, gold and black, or two shades of brown, are suitable for school suits.

LAMB'S WOOL AND BEADED CLOTH.

Loose sacque cloaks of white lamb's wool cloth, thick enough to dispense with lining, yet soft and pliable, are merely bound with bias, colored velvet. Collar, cuffs, and pockets of velvet. Large velvet buttons all the way up the front.

Scarlet cloth with amber, jet, blue, and white beads, woven in the goods, makes a gay wrapping for little girls. It should be cut paletot shape, double breasted, lapped on the left, and rounding. Row of gilt buttons on the curved side, and none in the centre.

WALKING DRESSES.

Walking dresses, with sleeves and large cape, are made of plush or of velveteen, simply notched at the edge and bound or corded. When made of cashmere they are lined and wadded, and trimmed with silk quilted in diamonds. Others are braided or embroidered in bright colors, or ornamented with a satin or velvet appliqué of leaves edged with narrow serpentine gimp. Velveteen and silk velvet are bordered with ermine, astrakhan, or chinchilla. Satin crosscut bands corded with white or very narrow folds stitched in the centre, and pleated rouleaux are used for trimming poplin walking dresses; but all satin trimmings fray and soil easily, lose their gloss, and look shabby, and are consequently not serviceable for children's use.

Sacques of mixed tweed or of beaver cloth with pockets large enough for use, trimmed with flat braid, are suitable for school. Amozine embroidery, a new trimming that we described in a former Number, looks exceedingly well on cloth sacques, and, indeed, on every garment worn by children. Boulevard felt skirts are made in all sizes and handsomely trimmed with braid or Amozine embroidery.

Gay scarlet circulars, used for extra wrapping for girls, are reminders of little Red Riding Hood. They are made of French opera-flannel. Large hood at the back, gathered with cord and tassel to fit the head.

Fancy aprons of silk, of alpaca, or of white linen, or diaper, are gored with bretelles over the shoulders, and embroidered or braided.

Velvet leggings, or gaiters, cut to fit the leg, are comfortable for this season. They are buttoned with gilt buttons. The velvet should match the color of the dress.

SUITS FOR BOYS.

Short round jackets, and trousers reaching to the knee, are made of velveteen or of silk velvet. These are suitable for boys over three years of age. Brown and black are the favorite colors. With a brown suit the hat should be of the same shade. Gray felt hats look well with suits of any color. Black velvet caps without visors have tassels or bows behind.

Over-coats for boys are stylishly cut with capes; the sacque-coat underneath is close-fitting. Long water-proof sacque-coats are worn for protection in rainy weather.

For boys under three years, who have not yet attained the dignity of wearing trousers, there are little frocks with plain waists, or habit-shirts and skirts cut bias and pleated on the belt with six box-pleats touching each other.

Cashmere and spun-silk stockings are prettily brought out in gay plaids. They are very long and are gartered above the knee. Elastics worn below the knee disfigure the limb. High Polish boots, with colored lacings and tassels, are worn by small children of both sexes. Larger boys rejoice in top-boots like their fathers.

INFANTS' WARDROBES.

The new cloaks for infants are not so heavily laden with trimming as those of past seasons. They are large square capes, without hoods, worn over gored circulars. White cashmere and French opera-cloth are the materials. Satin pipings, embroidery, braid with beads intermingled, and fringe are used for trimming them. Blue and scarlet cloaks are bordered with swan's-down.

Little hoods with short curtains made of quilted satin edged with down or of merino braided are selected for baby girls. They are lined with rose color or blue. For boys there are round hats, turban-shaped, with rosettes at the side or ear-tufts of down.

Valenciennes and embroidery are lavished upon infants' robes. No other lace is so suitable. Cluny is too coarse, Maltese too stately, and thread does not look so well after washing. Narrow puffings and bunches of tucks placed vertically or diamond-shape with insertions of Valenciennes or cambric embroidery cover the front of long nansook robes. Imported robes of linen cambric are daintily embroidered and bordered with lace. A beautiful christening robe has three long tabs in the front composed of a graduated puff edged with a band of cambric insertion and Valenciennes fluted ruffle. The skirt is cut in vandykes filled out with an embroidered ruffle. The body and sleeves are alternate puffs and insertion, with lace border at the neck, and barbes of lace tied in shoulder-knots with streamers.

Little sacques of zephyr wool overcast with silk floss are bordered with down, or crystal beads are introduced into the shell-fluted borders. Zephyr hoods, prettily shaped, are made in the same way.

GABRIELLE AND PRINCESSE DRESSES.

A dress for a girl eight years of age is of scarlet serge. It is cut Gabrielle, that is, gored with body and skirt in one, and buttoned in front.

The garment is lined throughout with white muslin. Coat-sleeves closed at the wrist, with a pointed, puffed cap over the seam that joins the sleeves and waist. Bias folds of the serge simulate an apron on the front of the dress extending in bretelles over the shoulders. Scarlet velvet buttons with long pendants ornament the corners of the apron and the straps placed on the sleeve-puff. Belt with sash trimmed with folds. Flat velvet buttons on the waist.

Blue serge made in the same style is trimmed with jet buttons and plaid velvet. A gray poplin Gabrielle for a smaller child is fastened at the side underneath a fold. Close-fitting coat-sleeves. On the skirt are two bias bands of the poplin with pipings of blue satin on each side. Alternate points of blue and gray are sewn around the edge of the garment.

A white merino dress, gored in the Princesse style, has an over-dress or fourreau of Scotch plaid poplin. Thick white dresses of poplin, empress cloth, cashmere, and merino are very popular for girls of all ages. Plaid fourreaux, sashes, sleeveless jackets, and scarfs accompany them. Black alpaca and Norwegian poplin skirts are braided with gilt, or embroidered with gilt beads. Sleeveless jackets, fringed with gilt or with beads, are worn over the tight waists. Another fashion is to cord the seams of black Gabrielles with crimson or blue. Gay little Breton jackets, embroidered in colors, are pretty with black dresses.

A dress and paletot for a girl of twelve is of blue poplin. Straps of blue velvet two inches wide, bordered with black guipure, extend from the waist down two-thirds the length of the skirt. Sleeves, belt, and sash trimmed in the same way. Deep velvet collar on the paletot with two points behind. A grebe muff and collar with a gray felt toque completed the costume.

Long loose sacques of blue or scarlet plush with hoods lined with white satin are chosen for very small girls. Half-fitting basquines and tight redingotes double-breasted and buttoning slantways from the throat to the knee are made of black velvet or of blue chinchilla cloth and bordered with fur. Muffs to correspond.

FANCY DRESSES.

Evening dresses for girls are of white tarletane or organly muslin gored, with puffs from the shoulder to the hem, or insertions of lace over colored ribbons. Over-dresses of silk are worn with these, cut very low in the neck, with shoulder-straps. Slips of glacé silk full gored have over-dresses of lace or of muslin with lace barbes and sashes.

A party dress for a girl ten years old is an under-dress of white tarletane. The skirt is gored, the waist high and puffed. Three ruches of tarletane bound with pink ribbon encircle the skirt. A girle and tunic of pink silk is bordered with white field daisies. Pink sash and streamers from shoulders. White silk stockings. Pink silk boots with rosettes of blonde, pearl buckle in the centre. Roman pearl buttons on the outside of the boot.

A Gabrielle of Marie Louise blue silk is trimmed on every seam with white silk ruches pinked at the edge. Another of scarlet glacé has straps of white satin in the centre of each width pendant from the waist, with deep crystal fringe on the edge. Either of these is more economically made in poplin and alpaca.

PERSONAL.

For the bishopric of the new diocese of Northern New York, to be filled next year, the prominent candidates are the Rev. Dr. TUCKER, of Troy, and the Rev. W. CROSWELL DOANE, of Albany (son of the late Bishop DOANE, of New Jersey). The Rev. G. H. DOANE, another son of Bishop D., is a Roman Catholic priest at Newark, and Secretary to Bishop BAILEY. He is a very industrious man, and an untiring advocate of temperance. For the bishopric of the new diocese of Long Island it is understood that the Rev. Dr. LITTLEJOHN, of Brooklyn, is the only prominent candidate.

The new British minister to this country, Mr. THORNTON, will bring Mrs. T. with him. She is said to be a very attractive, charming person, and will add much to the agreeableness of the diplomatic circle, which has been sadly deficient in that respect since the days of Lady NAPIER.

The EMPEROR OF RUSSIA has shown what he thinks of our principal tar by giving $20,000 for PAGE's picture of FARRAGUT lashed to the rigging of the flagship Hartford, directing the movements of the fleet under the fire of the forts in the harbor of Mobile. FARRAGUT has a very Mobile countenance, the spirit of which has been happily seized by the artist.

Professor HENRY, of the Smithsonian Institute, has put his foot down on the lecturing system in that institution, for the simple reason that he has found it impossible to procure lecturers who will avoid talking politics.

The Rev. Mr. WALK, of Bourbon county, Kentucky, has preached a sermon on the great sinfulness of agricultural fairs. In that county, whose name is a synonym for high alcoholic excellence, people ought to be known as well by their Walk as by their conversation. But why are fairs sinful? (Not a conundrum.)

Of the very great pecuniary matrimonial sacrifices soon to be offered up, the most noteworthy abroad is that of the young MARQUIS OF BUTE, who, when only six months old, succeeded to one of the finest properties in the United Kingdom. This has been so carefully managed, and the income so securely and advantageously invested, that the young peer is now in possession of about $3000 a day, and will be compelled to "rough it" on that, unless he marries some lady with a little property of her own.

It will be gratifying to the friends of the late General MEAGHER (whose last literary production was published in Harper's Magazine) to know that Mrs. MEAGHER is in possession of some $400,000, the result of fortunate investments made by General MEAGHER in Montana mining interests. Would it were thrice as much!

Miss BRADDOCK, the novelist, is a stout, jovial woman, with short hair (generally arranged in curls), and a brilliant set of teeth. When she "seizes her pen in hand to write a few lines," she stands before an elevated desk (as Lord PALMERSTON did), with a quill pen in one hand and an ink bottle in the other.

Once in a while she quits her manuscript to pace the room and evoke fresh ideas. Occasionally she sits down, tailor-wise, and writes on a desk extemporized out of some large book. She is brusque, a little eccentric, sometimes even rude, and her anomalous social position debars her from what is known in England as "select circles."

—Mr. HUGH HASTINGS, editor of the Albany Knickerbocker, is roaming about among "the effete monarchies of Europe" as bearer of dispatches from our State Department; and since the 1st of September has visited nearly all the capitals, principal cities, and picture-galleries on that side of the world. He naively says: "I have traveled with about the same dispatch that REMENS must have painted. What 'a big stroke of business' he would have done as a house-painter! There must be at least ten miles of his paintings in Europe, not to speak of our own country and Fifth Avenue. One gets a surfeit of old paintings in the Old World, just as we become tired of roast turkey and mince-pies between Thanksgiving and New-Year."

—On dit among circles, railroad and financial, that the "coming man"—the second VANDERBILT—is JOHN S. ELDRIDGE, of Boston, the new President of the Erie Railway, and distinguished for the boldness, energy, and magnitude of his operations. He is a gentleman of culture, as well as great wealth; is universally liked socially, having a personal magnetism which draws to him hosts of friends. His plans embrace the prosperity of the leading roads of the country, and to him is mainly due the recent arrangement, whereby the rivalry between the Erie, New York Central, and Pennsylvania will cease. He is now seizing hold of things with a hand of might, and it will not be long ere the name of JOHN S. ELDRIDGE will be as familiar as that of Commodore VANDERBILT. The latter delights in his younger compeer, and joins with him in working out the problems of railroad interest which are now coming up so prominently.

—ROBERT SHEPPARD, the ruling elder among the Shakers at Canterbury, New Hampshire, finding after long experience that they were no great shakes, has come out and joined the world's people. As a shepherd he has surrendered his (black) crook, and left the shaking sheep and lambs of the flock to be fleeced by his successor.

—That wonderful walker, WESTON, has a competitor hereabouts in Mr. EDWIN BOOTH, who a few days since walked from Worth Street to Harlem Bridge in one hour and twenty-seven minutes. He "stood not upon the order of his walking, but walked very fast."

—A gentleman of Presbyterian turn of mind, describes in one of our religious contemporaries the general look and style of the Rev. NEWMAN HALL, from which we learn that he is about thirty-five, of medium height, with a Roman cast of features, rather thin face, light complexion, and moves with a quick, nervous action. He affects no dignity. He enters the desk with a rapid gait, and assumes, while speaking, postures not the most graceful. His voice, in the lower key, is mellow and melodious, and his utterances clear and distinct. Every one in the immense audience can hear him. He reads the Scriptures well, distributing his emphasis with the utmost correctness. The same may be said of the hymns. You are impressed with the perfect naturalness and simplicity of the man. You discover also an air of spirituality, giving the impression that he is a man of God. His mode of applying the subject to the impenitent is peculiar. He leans forward on the desk, pausing and looking down on his clasped hands, as if in profound thought, almost suggestive of the idea of silent prayer, when, in a low, persuasive tone, he commences talking with the sinner as a loving friend would, in a touching and familiar way. This is admirable. Still as death is the vast assembly. Every word, though uttered in a subdued voice, is distinctly heard. How much better this than the loud, even thunderous tones with which some preachers assail the unconverted?

—The history of the peccunious family of COOKE has been collated by an annalist of Sandusky, and is recorded thus: There were six children in the family, two of whom died; the rest live and are married and affluent. PITT COOKE, the eldest, has partial charge of the New York house of JAY COOKE & CO.; HENRY D. COOKE, the youngest, has entire control of one in Washington; and JAY himself operates in Philadelphia. SARAH E. COOKE, the only daughter, is married to a wealthy speculator, WILLIAM G. MOORHEAD, who lives right royally in the City of Brotherly Love. ELETHERUS COOKE, the father of this happy family, died about three years ago at the green old age of seventy-six, retaining his wonted energy to the last. Mrs. COOKE, who is a little over seventy, still lives in the old family mansion in the enjoyment of all her facilities, and an ample participant in the filial bounty of her sons.

—BULWER was arrayed in the most "stunning" style at the DICKENS farewell dinner. Although over sixty he does not look fifty; eyebrows, hair, and beard painted: his speaking ingeniously bad, something of the style of the hard-shell Baptist—a hard, convulsive word or two, a long drawl, terminated by a jerk at which the forehead is thrown down until the audience sees the back of the head—this is the history of one of BULWER's rasping, unpleasant sentences. He throws his hand (with faultless cuffs) straight out; clasps his fingers tightly to the palm; then draws it under his arm, as a man would pulling in a gudgeon—and that is his gesture.

—PRENTICE—he of the Louisville Journal—is bright and trenchant as ever in the two and three-line paragraphs that sparkle through his columns. His last shot was aimed at a rival and somewhat bitter journal named The Globe, which he casually alludes to as The Globule.

—A gossipy New York correspondent of the Hartford Press uses that great moral engine to make a brief statement in reference to Mr. DICKENS, in the following words, "twitnamely:" "In a pleasant interview with Mr. DOLBY, his agent, I learn that Mr. DICKENS is disposed to prolong his stay for some time in this country, in case he meets with a cordial welcome. He will in that event be inclined to deliver his readings in several of the American cities besides New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, and perhaps not return home until the latter part of summer or autumn."

—It will gratify the many friends of the late PARK BENJAMIN to know that a biography of him is in course of preparation by his kinsman, CHARLES LAMMAN. YOUNG PARK BENJAMIN is a midshipman in the navy, a promising officer, and a capital sketcher.

—That charming writer, Rev. A. K. H. BOYD (the "Country Parson"), has a new volume in press entitled "Lessons of Middle Age, with some account of various Cities and Men."

—Literary people, and for that matter political people and intellectual people every where, will be rejoiced if the rumor prove true, that Mr. DISRAELI talks of writing a new novel, partly political, somewhat after the style of "Coningsby." Why not? BULWER's later novels, "What Will He Do With It?" and "The Caxtons," are among his very best productions. Has DISRAELI's hand lost its cunning of fiction? We throw not! The genius that has held spell-bound the Commons of England, in the recent great debates on the Reform Bill, can not have lost its imaginative power nor its felicity of narration.

Coiffures and Chignons.

CHIGNONS are again worn higher and more voluminous, spreading nearly over the entire back of the head. This style of dressing the hair is certainly far more graceful than the small bunch on the crown, formerly worn. We give several accompanying illustrations of coiffures and chignons as arranged by some of the most celebrated hair-dressers of Paris, together with descriptions whereby any lady can dress her own hair, or instruct others how to do so.

Fig. 1. Front and Back.—Except a large, curly loop behind and at the side, this coiffure is entirely composed of torsades, well crisped in order to give them suppleness. As for the parting of the hair, that is left to the taste of the hair-dresser, who, however, should be careful always to comb up the hair on the temples straight from the roots, and to well conceal the beginning and end of the torsades. The ornament consists of a cluster of volubilis.

silk ribbon and springs, without hooks, it being fastened with pins just like a chignon. It may be dressed at the artist's residence and placed on the lady's head in an instant. The ornaments may also be changed as preferred.

Fig. 3.—After parting the hair, make two small raised bandeaux; the upper one must be tightly crisped. The chignon, of which only one side is seen, is quadrilled with large loops very slightly crisped. A loose torsade is put round the chignon; add some light curls, an aigrette of wheat-ears, and some daisies.

Fig. 4.—Separate a lock on the temples, comb it up well after having crisped it to make it look voluminous. Make the parting very far backward, and then tress a loose plat to be placed on the top of the forehead, taking care to spread the branches. Behind, a chignon raised from below, accompanied by three or four curls. Place the ribbons as in the engraving.

Fig. 5.—For Fig. 5 prepare a round shape made of wire or thin steel springs, and cover it with coarse net. Take a little more than two ounces of frizzed hair, twenty-two inches long, make it into quadrilled tresses, and arrange them as in the engraving; that is, by turning the hair from the point to the end, and making a cluster of irregular loops, completing the whole by a few very light curls.

Fig. 6 is mounted on a shape made of wire, tulle, and ribbon, and is rather elongated in form. It requires an ounce and a half of smooth hair and an ounce of crisped. The execution consists in rolling the branches on themselves and interlacing them.

Fig. 7 takes only an ounce and a half of hair half a yard long, which must be formed into a large roll, and a bow that can be easily completed with the lady's own hair, so as to imitate nature to perfection. The shape on which this chignon is mounted is triangular.

Fig. 8.—This chignon is mounted on a square shape. Make two torsades, one above the other, with hair twenty-four inches long, slightly crisped, and finish with a bow with two loops.

Fig. 9 is mounted on a round shape of ribbon wire; it requires two ounces of hair about three-quarters of a yard in length, in tresses. The coiffure consists of five interlaced loops, and a torsade going round them.

Fig. 10. Front and Back.—Part the hair from one ear to the other about four inches from the forehead. Divide it into five portions on each side by one horizontal and two vertical partings. With the front lock, touching the forehead, make a Mary Stuart bandeau, and a rolled bandeau over it. Form three bandeaux rolled under, the last of them meeting the loops of the chignon. These loops are rolled on the fingers from the end to the roots. Make a large bow resting on the nape, but not covering it; also a few irregular loops on the top of the head, and then place the ornaments as seen in the engraving.

Fig. 11.—This illustration represents an ingenious method of lengthening the braids of one's own hair by fastening tresses to the end of crêpes a little shorter than the former, and then braiding them in the hair. The hair thus covers the crêpes to the end, when the added hair is plaited in turn, thus forming a continuous braid, which exhibits no break to the eye.

Fig. 12.—These curls are designed to be worn behind the ears, and are confined with ribbons, as seen in the engraving, and which are concealed by short curls fastened on in like manner, or by the lady's own hair, suitably arranged.

COIFFURES AND CHIGNONS.

Specimens of Lace from the Paris Exposition.

WE give illustrations of two exquisitely beautiful specimens of lace, lately displayed in the Paris Exposition, and which were unsurpassed by any productions of the kind in that great hive of human industry. The first is a black Bayeux lace, the second, Point d'Alençon. They were exhibited by the Compagnie des Indes, represented by Messrs. Delisle, Frères, who had already received the decoration of the Legion of Honor, and numerous medals for their exquisite lace manufacture.

Gentleman's Cap in Crochet.

MATERIALS: Blue, red, black, white, and yellow crochet silk; blue taffeta and leather for lining; a tassel of twisted silk in the above-mentioned colors.

The cap is to be worked round with the different colored silks in single crochet stitch.

Commence the centre of the top with 6 chain stitches in blue silk; form into a round with a slip stitch. Then work 5 rows; in the 1st row make 2 single crochet stitches in every chain, and in the other rows increase enough to keep the work flat. The 6th row is done in yellow silk, and must contain 50 stitches. The 7th is to be worked in black. The 8th again in yellow; the 9th and 10th in red silk. From the 7th to the 10th rows widen gradually, so that the last row will contain 80 stitches. From this it must be worked in different colors. The different colored threads must be left on the wrong side till they are again needed; the stitch must be half finished with one color before commencing with another color.

11th row. * 2 black stitches on the 2 stitches of the preceding row, 9 red on the 8 stitches of the preceding row. Repeat 8 times from the *.

12th row. * 2 black on the 2 stitches before the 2 black ones of the preceding row, 3 white on the 2 black ones of the preceding row, 2 black on the 2 next stitches, 6 red on the 5 next of the preceding row. Repeat from the * to the end of the row.

13th row. 2 black stitches on the 2 stitches before the 2 black ones of the preceding row. * 8 white on the 7 next stitches, 2 black, 2 red, and 2 black on the next 6 red stitches of the preceding row. Repeat from * to the end of the row.

14th row. * 2 black stitches on the 2 stitches before the 2 black stitches of the preceding row, 14 white stitches on the following 12. Repeat from * to the end of row.

15th row. 10 white stitches on the 2 black and 7 white stitches of the last row. * 1 black stitch on the next stitch, 17 white on the next 15 of the preceding row. Repeat from the * to the end of the row.

LILAC SILK CRAVAT.

SANTA CLAUS.

DIRECTIONS FOR MAKING SANTA CLAUS.—Take five large pine cones, two for the arms, two for the legs, and one for the body; glue them together, and wind them round with wire. Cut the boots out of wood, set them on a block, sharpen the upper ends, and insert them in holes bored in the legs. Glue the head and hands of an ordinary jointed doll on the body and arms: make the beard and hair of flax, and fit a fur cap on the head. Put a girdle of dried moss round the waist, to conceal the wire, and a knit tippet on the neck. Fasten a paste-board basket, filled with candies and toys, on the back; throw a netted bag, with nuts and lady-apples, over one shoulder; and put a miniature Christmas-tree in one hand, and a nut-cracker and switch in the other.

16th row (without widening, consequently 1 stitch on every stitch of the preceding row). 1 white, 1 black, 7 white on the 9 white stitches of the preceding row. * 1 black on the stitch before the next black one of the preceding row; 1 blue, 1 black, 7 white, 1 black, 7 white. Repeat from the * to the end of the row.

17th row. * 3 black stitches on the 3 next stitches of the preceding row (consequently the middle one of these 3 stitches comes on the 1 black one of the preceding row), 6 white on the 5 following stitches, 1 black, 3 blue, and 1 black on the 5 following stitches, 6 white on the 5 next white stitches of the preceding row. Repeat from the * to the end of the row.

18th row (without widening). 1 white and 1 black on the 2 first black stitches of the preceding row. * 8 white, 1 black, 1 blue, 1 black, 8 white, 1 black. Repeat from * to the end of the row.

19th row. 10 white stitches on the 9 next stitches of the preceding row. * 1 black, 1 white, 1 black, 1 white, and 1 black on the following 5 stitches of the preceding row. Be particular that the 2 single white stitches come on the 2 single black stitches that are separated by 1 blue one in the preceding row. 16 white on the next 15 stitches. Repeat from the * to the end of the row.

20th row (without widening). * 3 black on the next 3 stitches of the preceding row; 9 white, 1 black (the latter must be over the middle 1 of the 3 black stitches of the preceding row), 8 white. Repeat from the * to the end of the row.

21st row. * 2 black on the 2 stitches before the next 3 black stitches of the preceding row, 3 red and 2 black on the next 5 stitches, 15 white on the following 14 of the preceding row. Repeat from the *.

22d row (without widening). * 2 black stitches on the 2 stitches before the next 2 black ones of the former row; 7 red, 2 black, 11 white. Repeat from the * to the end of the row.

23d row. 3 black stitches on the 3 stitches before the next 2 black ones of the preceding row; 12 red on the following 11; 3 black, 5 white, and 3 black stitches on the next 11 white stitches of the preceding row. Repeat from the * to the end of the row.

24th row. * 20 red on the next 3 black, 12 red, and 3 black of the preceding row; 5 black on the 5 white of the preceding row. Repeat from the *.

With the 24th row the design for the top is finished. In the following rows the work must be widened as much as is necessary, and it must be crocheted as follows: 25th and 26th rows with red, 27th with yellow, 28th black, 29th yellow; from the 30th to the 42d with blue.

Now the top of the cap is entirely finished, and measures about $\frac{1}{2}$ or 7 inches in diameter. The border of the cap must now be worked according to the pattern, in each square 1 stitch in the color belonging to it. However, the last rows of the border must by degrees become a little looser, so that the cap may gradually widen a little.

The 2 lower rows of the border are to be worked in blue silk. In the original the border is about 2 inches in depth, and the lower edge of the border 21 inches in circumference.

After having finished crocheting, the cap must be lined with leather covered with blue taffeta, and a blue silk cord must be sewed around the edge of the cap. The tassel before mentioned is to be placed in the centre of the top.

Instead of silk, split zephyr may be used in making this cap.

Lilac Ribbon Cravat.

This cravat is made of lilac ribbon, terminating at each end in a three-strand braid of bias folds of lilac silk. These folds widen gradually toward the bottom, and are made of double stuff, sewed together, care being taken to keep the seam at the bottom in making the braid. The ends are finished with knotted silk fringe, as shown in the illustration.

Cravat of Tatting and Velvet Ribbon.

This cravat, one end of which is shown in the design, is worked with tatting cotton No. 60.

Begin one end of the cravat with a large loop; first, 2 double stitches (one to the right, one to the left). 1 picot or purl stitch, 4 double stitches, 1 picot, 5 double stitches, 1 picot, 2 double stitches, 1 picot, 2 double stitches, 1 picot, 9 double stitches, 1 picot, 2 double stitches; * leave about $\frac{1}{4}$ th of an inch thread between the loops, which must stand opposite each other. 2 double stitches, 1 picot, 3 double stitches, 1 picot. Make 2 double stitches and 1 picot 4 times, 3 double stitches, 1 picot, 2 double stitches. After finishing the 2d loop, again leave $\frac{1}{4}$ th of an inch of thread. Turn the work so that the large ring that is finished will be turned upward. Work 2 double stitches, fasten to the first picot of the first loop 9 double stitches, and attach to the picot in the 1st loop that follows the 9 double stitches, 2 double stitches, 1 picot, 2 double stitches, 1 picot, 9 double stitches, 1 picot, 2 double stitches. Form into a loop; turn the little loop upward, and repeat from * till the work is as long as you wish the cravat to be. However, in the little loops, instead of working the 2 picots, attach to the last and the one before the last picot of the preceding loop. The last large loop on the other end of the cravat must be like the loop described first on the outside, between the 2 picots, instead of making 9 stitches work 4 double, 1 picot, 5 double. After finishing this last large loop work for the border of the cravat, leaving again $\frac{1}{4}$ th of an inch space, a smaller loop which is to be attached to the picot of the former little loop in the corresponding place. Fasten the thread to the next picot of the large loop. Make a little loop like the former, only instead of 2 double, 1 picot repeated 4 times; make 2 double, 1 picot, and repeat 5 times. Attach to the next picot of the large loop 1 loop like the former, only make 2 double and 1 picot 8 times instead of 5 times. Attach to the last picot of the last large loop. Then after having worked the end of the border, work the long side of the border all in little loops, as described in the beginning, and after finishing each of these loops, attach the working thread to the free picot in the middle of each large loop. After finishing this row, work the other end like the first. Finally, run through the middle row of loops a narrow velvet ribbon of any color that may be desired, and finish the ends of the cravat with a loop and ends of the ribbon.

CHECKMATED.

A LETTER for Marcia Payne. I guess there did something come up in the New York mail this mornin'. Jest wait a spell, till these ere papers is out of the way, and I'll look it!

The crippled little village postmaster readjusted his iron spectacles, and plunged into the depths of a travel-soiled mail-bag, while Marcia Payne leaned against the glass partition with a throbbing breast, and sparkling, eager eyes.

She was exceedingly pretty, with delicate flushes of bloom on either cheek, and short auburn curls shot with fleeting gleams of gold, that glanced round her oval face, like the tendrils of a wild grape-vine, while her eyes were of the melting vivid blue you sometimes see in old heirloom china. To be sure her nose might have been a little retroussé, and her forehead a trifle too low, but then what a mouth she had—ripe, ruddy, and scarlet, like a wild strawberry, or a coral-tinted cherry!

And, as she stood there, her forehead shaded by the little straw flat, with its wide brown ribbons, the crippled postmaster reached out the wished-for letter, wondering within himself that he had never before happened to notice how very lovely Squire Payne's daughter was!

A quick shadow of keen disappointment flitted over her face as she glanced at the superscription—evidently it was not what she had hoped and longed to behold.

"From Aunt Ruth!" she murmured, listlessly running her eye over the contents. "Only from Aunt Ruth! Oh, why does he not write? He promised me a letter every week—surely he can not so soon have forgotten all those loving words, and vows of eternal constancy. A month—a whole month—and no single message. Oh! if he knew the weary pain that gnaws always at my heart, he would write, if it were but one tender line!"

She did not see the blue September light swimming in the valleys like a sapphire sea, as she passed slowly and spiritlessly along the mountain path—the scarlet maples, waving their fiery banners from the wooded precipices above, might have been blotted from the fair landscape for all she knew of their autumn splendors. Marcia Payne's life-bark had floated out upon the great ocean of unrest where Nature's gentle voice has no longer any spell to soothe!

The rocks, whose gray cliffs seemed to hang like sentinels over the little lead-colored farmhouse, were bathed in afternoon sunshine, as Marcia passed under the moving shadows of a stalwart old hickory-tree, and entered the wide, cool kitchen—the name has a homespun sound, and yet many a parlor lacks the airy comfort of that room, with its white-curtained windows, and masses of green asparagus around the quaint-looking glass, and daintily-scoured board floor. And there were old-fashioned Scripture prints hanging on the walls in stained-wood frames, and a vase of brilliant china-asters on the table, and books carelessly piled in the window-seats, and altogether it was a very home-like room; while from the open windows you could see the valley lying below, a lovely picture, framed in blue sky, and belted with dark ridges of pine and hemlock!

Mrs. Payne, a blooming matron of forty summers, was trimming a very juvenile lace cap with crimson ribbons, and the Squire was dipping his pen resolutely into an ink-bottle preparatory to "adding up" his farm accounts; both looked up as Marcia came into the room.

"Well, darter! where's the paper?" questioned the Squire, with a hearty welcoming smile.

Marcia turned scarlet.

"The paper! I forgot it, Sir!"

"Forgot the paper! Well, that's a good 'un!" laughed the Squire. "Who ever heard of a body's goin' to the post-office and forgettin' the weekly paper! Never mind, little clover-blossom; don't be worried—'tain't worth while. I'll send Zebedee round arter it in the evenin'."

"Did you get the two yards of bobbinet lace, Marcia?" said her mother, holding up the cap to obtain a bird's-eye view of the crimson ribbon bows.

"I never thought of it, mother," faltered the girl.

"Never thought of it! Goodness me! when I charged you to remember, the last thing. Why, how forgetful the child is gettin'!"

"Oh well, wife, two yards o' what's-its-name lace don't make no difference," interposed the good-natured Squire, as Marcia hid her burning face in the pink blossoms of the giant hydrangea by the door-stone. "Zeb can get it for you this evenin'."

"Zeb don't know bobbinet lace from an ox-yoke," fretted Mrs. Payne; "and my cap won't be finished to wear to meetin' to-morrow. What's that stickin' out o' your apron-pocket, Marcia?"

"A letter from Aunt Ruth, mother. She wants me to go to New York to visit the girls; and—and—I should like to go, if you have no objections. Somehow I don't exactly feel well, and I fancy a little change would do me good."

"I don't know as I've any thing to say against it," sighed Mrs. Payne—she was one of those worthy dames who are ostentatiously resigned in the merest trifles of existence. "I don't know how I'm ever goin' to preserve the peaches and dew up the tomatoes with you gone."

"Blast the tomatoes!" roared the Squire. "Marcia shall go if she's a mind to—and here's ten dollars to buy a smart shawl with! My little clover-blossom sha'n't be outshone by her city cousins!"

(You see Squire Payne had never been shopping in the marble arcades of our Broadway palaces, and his idea of a "smart shawl" would not probably coincide with Miss Flora M'Flimsey's.)

"I may meet him—I may hear something of him," was the thought that burned through Marcia's brain as she stood at her chamber window the night before her departure for the city, gazing out at the moonlight valley below, while the delicious mountain wind tossed her curls to and fro, and the stars quivered silently athwart the purple splendor of the sky. "He will not answer my letters, nor reply to my appeals—yet surely if I were to see him face to face he could not refuse to explain this strange mystery."

Marcia Payne went to New York with this secret mission hidden in the depths of her aching, bleeding heart, while the Squire rubbed his hands and rejoiced to think that his "little gal" was going to enjoy herself, and Mrs. Payne hoped, plaintively, that "Marcia wouldn't get too much wrapped up in the pomps and vanities of this wicked world!"

"Oh pshaw, wife," remonstrated the Squire; "we liked pomps and vanities ourselves when we were young! It's Marcia's turn now, and I hope she'll be as happy as a little bird! Only its powerful lonesome without her, and that's a fact!"

The Squire blew his nose with suspicious resonance—perhaps it was to hide a little choking sound in his throat.

The noon brilliance lay full on the gleaming pavements of Broadway, crusted with the brief, rare snow that comes to the metropolis like a white vision, and disappears about as rapidly. How it sparkled—how the icicles glittered and glimmered from eaves and awnings—and how merrily the sleigh-bells tinkled through the dazzling blue of the December atmosphere! Above, the sky was brilliantly clear and cloudless; in short, it was just the sort of day to tempt the most indolently-disposed out into the bracing air. It was scarcely to be wondered at, therefore, that Mr. Nicholas Venner was driving his fine horses leisurely down the crowded thoroughfare, with a choicely-flavored cigar delicately poised under his black mustache, and lemon-colored kid gloves daintily fitted to his aristocratically-small hands.

For Mr. Venner was exceeding proud of his small hands and feet. "Blood will show," he was wont to commune with himself; "and I'm hanged if No. 7 gloves don't help a fellow on in society better than an extra hundred a year!"

Suddenly he drew up his spirited steeds with a scientific jerk in front of a block of marble-fronted stores, and, tossing the reins lightly to his attendant groom, sprang to the pavement.

"I beg pardon for jostling your shoulder, Sir," he blandly apologized, at the same time lifting his hat to a passer-by, against whom he had unwittingly brushed. "I did not intend—why, hallo! it's Joe Emerson!"

"Well!" ejaculated the individual apostrophized, bursting into a genial laugh; "if you're not the coolest chap! to run over a fellow without so much as seeing him! Where are you bound at such a lightning-express rate, I should like to know?"

"Only in here to select half a dozen pairs of gloves. Come with me, can't you, Joe? and we'll take a turn in the Park afterward. My horses are in fine condition this afternoon; at least so my fellow tells me!"

"Well, I don't really know that I've any thing better to do," yawned the languid Mr. Emerson, throwing himself on a seat in front of the counter. "Oh, by-the-way, I've forgotten to proffer my congratulations!"

"On what?"

"Now play the unconscious innocent, do! It's so becoming to your Corsair style of beauty, Nick Venner! Why, on your engagement to Miss Edith Weld, to be sure. A man who is bound to marry the match of the season needn't be surprised if he receives now and then a stray congratulation from his friends."

"I'm very much obliged to you, I am sure," said Mr. Venner, critically comparing the relative merits of Napoleon blue and royal purple kid gloves, as if his life depended on the choice.

"When is it to come off?" pursued his friend.

"My marriage, do you mean? Oh, some time in January, I believe—just as soon as Miss Weld can settle affairs with that arch-tyrant, her dress-maker."

"Happy man!" sighed Emerson. "'Veni, vidi, vici,' should be your coat of arms, if ever you set up one. But hold on; it seems to me you were engaged to a little country divinity up in the Black River wildernesses a while ago—what was the name of the place? And what was her name? Martha—Maria—oh, Marcia Something-or-other! What have you done with the little blue-eyed Marcia that you used to rave about, eh, Don Giovanni?"

"Hold your tongue!" ejaculated Mr. Venner, rather sharply. "What the deuce is the use of raking up old dead-and-gone affairs in that sort of way?"

"It's all up, is it?"

"Of course, long ago; and I don't particularly care about Miss Weld's hearing the whole story of all the flirtations I've ever gone through with in the course of my natural life."

"Exactly so; then I'm silent as the grave. Are you ready? then let's go."

And the two gentlemen sauntered leisurely out of the store, all unconscious that their sotto voce dialogue had been quite distinctly heard by a slender young lady, quietly dressed and closely veiled, who was sitting at the counter just beyond, patiently waiting for the party she had accompanied to complete their purchases. Silent and motionless as a statue she had sat there, never lifting her eyes from the brass yard-notch in the counter, nor moving the gloved hand that lay in her lap.

"My dear Marcia, we must have worn your patience to a thread," said a bright-faced girl, reappearing from some distant arcade. But Marcia only smiled and shook her head.

"Why, how pale you are, Marcia!" exclaimed one of the fair shoppers as they issued once more into the glorious, frigid sunshine of the outer air. "Surely, you are not ill!"

"No, it is nothing—nothing more than the close atmosphere of that store," said Marcia Payne, drawing her veil still closer over her face.

"You mustn't lose the sylvan roses you brought to New York with you, Marcia," laughed her cousin, Miss Durand, "or your father will think we have not taken good care of you!"

Marcia did not answer. She could not. It was only by summoning the whole self-control of her nature to her aid that she could refrain from sinking, sick and faint, on the pavement, literally whelmed to the earth by the sudden discovery of Nicholas Venner's treachery.

All the afternoon she sat silently in her own room, looking this new discovery in the face with a dogged, fierce resolution that was altogether a novel feature of her character, and at evening she came down, pale and quiet.

"Laura, do you know a Miss Weld?"

"Weld—Edith Weld? Of course I do!"

"Where does she live?"

"In St. Olave's Square. She is a great heiress, and is just about to be married to that bewitching Apollo, Nick Venner—at least, so people say."

"Can you give me her address?" How indifferently Marcia spoke!

"Certainly. I don't visit there myself; she is one of the double-refined exclusives in her circle, but I know the number of the house. Are you acquainted with her?"

"No, but I have a message for her."

"Very well; you can take the carriage to-morrow morning any time you please."

Edith Weld's morning-room was one of the prettiest little works you could conceive of. There was a deep bay-window, filled with creamy roses and blood-red japonicas, and English violets, whose perfume carried you back to the purple twilights of long-forgotten Mays; there were draperies of rose-colored silk, and birds twittering untranslatable madrigals to themselves; there was a carpet of white velvet, with trails of sea-green moss strewn over it, and a clear-glowing grate fire, with a little sofa drawn up in front of it, whereon the heiress nestled like a bird of a larger growth.

Edith Weld was just eighteen—a plump, perfectly-formed little creature, with that creamy whiteness of skin one sees in creoles, and hair black and silky, full of odd little crimps and waves, with large hazel eyes, mouth like a crimson rose-bud, and a deep dimple in her round little chin, she looked more like a pretty child than a grown woman; and you couldn't help loving her, in spite of a very large proportion of faults where-with she was weighted.

Edith Wild was dreaming away the golden hours of the morning-tide in the curtailed silence of that piquant morning-room—aided and abetted, it is true, by a volume of lotus-eating poems—when Marcia Payne's penciled card was brought up to her.

"Payne—Payne—I don't know any such person," said the heiress, examining the card carelessly. "I can not be disturbed by any strangers this morning."

But the next instant her eye rested on a line written on the lower corner of the card.

"On business relating particularly to Mr. Nicholas Venner."

The rosy carmine mantled Edith's brow and cheek; her lips quivered into a strangely-soft smile—for she was beginning to love Nicholas Venner with all the force of her willful, yet noble nature.

"Show Miss Payne up," she said to the servant.

And the two girls confronted each other—one fair as a rose-leaf, with blue eyes and curls like spun gold; the other dark and brilliant as the blossom of an Eastern pomegranate.

"Miss Weld," said Marcia, coldly and calmly, "they tell me you are engaged to Nicholas Venner. Is this so?"

"It is. But why do you ask me the question?"

"You fancy him good and noble—a fitting guardian for the precious jewel of your happiness?"

"Who dares deny it?" flashed Edith Weld, her velvet cheek glowing with sudden fire.

"I do!" wailed Marcia. "Edith Weld, I have been deemed the gentlest and softest of creatures, but it seems to me now as if my nature had been changed to that of a demon by the treachery—the base deceit—that has been practiced on me."

"What do you mean?" asked Edith, beginning to doubt the sanity of her visitor.

"Miss Weld, listen to me. All the tender vows, the caressing words by which Nicholas Venner wooed and won you have been breathed into my ears. Until a richer, fairer bride presented herself, he was my accepted lover. Then, without a word of explanation or pity, he deserted me—left my heart to break in agonizing doubt and bitter despair! This is your noble lover—your chevalier sans peur, et sans reproche!"

"I do not believe you!" said Edith, defiantly.

"No, you do not believe me, yet you can not but believe his own testimony. Look at these!"

She drew a packet of letters from her bosom, and laid them in Edith's hands.

"Now do you credit my tale?" she asked, as Edith's eyes greedily devoured the honeyed phrases.

The heiress dropped the letters, with a low, bitter cry.

"The deceiver! the heartless villain! I will tear him from my heart, if the life and soul are rent away with him!"

She drooped her flushed forehead on Marcia's shoulder—their common agony had linked the two rivals together.

"You can pity me—you know what I endure," murmured Marcia, whiter than any marble statue, as she clasped her arms about the other's waist.

"Poor child! poor wounded fawn!" said Edith, putting back the auburn rings of hair, and looking into Marcia's haggard eyes. "Don't weep any longer—you shall be avenged!"

"Now, what the deuce does Edith mean by a surprise?" pondered Nicholas Venner, as he bent his footsteps sauntering toward the house in St. Olave's Square. "Let me see—what does she say?"

He unfolded a little sky-blue note of perfumed paper, and consulted the fairy-like caligraphy.

"You have often sportively upbraided me for my reticence in giving you no token or signet of my love, Nicholas Venner," ran the note. "Now I am going to surprise you with something far more significant than any tress of hair, rose-bud, or bit of ribbon could ever be. Come punctually at three, and, as I said before, prepare for a surprise!"

"Well, I am prepared," remarked Mr. Venner, pocketing the note once more. "She's a spicy creature, my Edith—never does any thing like other girls. But I do love her with a love no more like the sensation I felt for that insignificant little Marcia Payne than Champagne is like skim milk! I used to fancy I wasn't the kind of man to fall over head and ears in love like a school-boy, but Edith's glorious black eyes have fairly conquered me!"

Possibly Mr. Venner might have fancied that Edith's cheek was colder than usual as he caressingly pressed his lips to it, but he saw no change in her manner. No, Edith intended to give him no preparation for the blow that was to fall on his devoted head!

"Well, m'amie, and what is that surprise I am to have?" he asked, coaxingly.

"You are anxious for it?"

"Beyond expression."

"You shall have it, then," she said, throwing open the door of her boudoir.

White as death, with her blue eyes full of passionate, reproachful light, Marcia Payne stood there confronting him. Nicholas Venner recoiled a step or two in breathless horror.

"Edith! what does this mean?"

"What does it mean?" scornfully repeated Edith, her slight frame thrilling with the angry vehemence of her passion. "You should know best, Nicholas Venner. Does it surprise you that your treachery is known and exposed? Ay, you hardly expected this tableau! Will it surprise you still more when I tell you that from this moment henceforward I cast you off like a broken toy, even as you cast off the devoted, trusting love of this stricken girl? The man whom Edith Weld marries shall be no such gay Lothario as Mr. Nicholas Venner seems to be! Do you hear me, Sir? there is the door! Go, and ponder at your leisure over the very unexpected result of your two courtships!"

And she motioned the discomfited male coquette from the apartment, with all the imperious haughtiness that a crowned queen could have worn.

Marcia Payne had been avenged—but it was all too late. Edith Weld was upheld by the strong pride and unbroken spirit of her elastic young nature. A few weeks and she was as smiling and brilliant as if Nicholas Venner's dark eyes had never looked into hers with the unspoken tale of love. But Marcia was cast in a far different mould.

She went home to the mountains, pale and drooping, like the sickly monthly rose that Mrs. Payne was trying to coax into bloom in the sunniest corner of the kitchen window. The rose and Marcia both knew that summer was gone—gone! The doctors shook their sage old heads, and talked about "consumption," and "decline," and "failing of the vital powers;" but Marcia knew that her heart was dust and ashes within her. She did not die—people do not die of broken hearts nowadays; but if it is possible to be a ghost without first having passed the gates of death, Marcia Payne was the ghost of her former self. Soft-voiced, light-footed, ever ready to do any little household service; the Squire says, "We couldn't keep house without Marcia;" and Mrs. Payne owns that it is a "real blessing" to have the girl about the house.

So she lives on—and yet the real Marcia is as dead as the crushed wild-flower on the mountain side, when the scarlet maples used to wave their pennons of flame. Requiescat in pace! Would to God that this world were not full of just such tragedies, unwritten and unknown!

SHOP-WINDOWS.

THE "art of putting things" is nowhere better displayed than in the felicitous arrangement of goods in a shop-window. A dingy window, containing a confused medley, or a stiff, ungraceful combination, signifies indifference behind the counter, and repels purchasers; while the same, or even inferior goods, daintily arranged, with harmony of colors and varied symmetry of form, tempt the passer-by to enter, predisposed to purchase where taste and grace preside. The faculty of making such a tempting display of goods, therefore, becomes a valuable qualification in a shop-man, and well entitles the possessor of it to some special consideration and emolument.

In the competition of business in the great cities the art of dressing a window becomes almost a fine art. The arrangement of many of the windows is wholly renewed every day. You have not thought, perhaps, as you have walked down Broadway, or along Chestnut or Washington street, that there is a panorama of forms and colors, one, two, or even three miles long, wrought in silks, satins, gold, silver, and precious stones, morocco, India rubber, wax, mahogany and rosewood, water-colors and oil-colors, carving, gilding, and silvered glass, bronze, porcelain, and crystal, laces and many-colored ribbons, feathers and furs, Brussels and tapestries, beads and Berlin wools, and a hundred other fabrics—a panorama of useful and beautiful things, which a thousand clerks have been employed from one to three hours this morning in constructing, and which must be taken to pieces to-night, to be recomposed again, in varying and, if possible, more attractive forms to-morrow, for your delectation.

That elegant window, crowded with specimens of the goldsmith's handiwork—watches, ear-rings, brooches, bracelets, necklaces, finger-rings, seals, and chains—will be emptied to-night before the day's work is done. The shutters will go up against the lighted window, and if you come there a few minutes afterward you will infer that the store is shut. But several hands are busy within, and each article is to be removed, until gradually the whole window is dismantled and cleared, and its contents packed away. And before the store is ready for customers in the morning the window must be dressed anew.

In the next window those sweeping trains of silk and satin, displayed amidst festoons of lace or ribbons, were this morning selected for the day's display; and no lady who enters the store will probably have spent more time or attention upon her toilette than the salesmen have spent upon this window.

When the amount of effort thus expended in a single shop is multiplied by the number of such shops in the street we have an imposing total of taste, tact, and time, employed daily in what we may call one of the forms of the Art of Decoration.

On the success with which this work is done depends much of the attractiveness of the street; and it affords, in fact, a fair indication of the taste of the population who throng its pavement to enjoy the display and to purchase where they are attracted.

In our great cities, it is true, etiquette does not permit ladies in some circles of society to enjoy this pleasure, it being regarded as vulgar to be seen looking in at shop-windows.

Without doubting that there may be very good reasons for such a rule in the cases to which it properly applies, let us be thankful for that happy obscurity of person which allows us to ramble as we will along the sidewalk, and that happy moderation of desires which enables us to admire the pretty things we see without feeling compelled to buy them. And so let us walk together down Regent Street in London, and along the Boulevards in Paris, see whose window is made up most tastefully, and ask ourselves what constitutes the charm.

Whoever has been in London knows Regent Street as a broad and handsome street of fashionable shops. Perhaps the first shop which attracts our notice is that of a draper and haberdasher, or, as it would be called in this country, a dry-goods store. Here are six large windows, and each presents a distinct department. In the first there is nothing but hosiery. Now, in itself considered, a stocking is not a particularly graceful article, especially when empty and flat. When we have seen its flat, misshapen figure painted for a sign, invariably of a monstrous size and in fearfully vivid colors, we have always commiserated the taste of the artist and of his instigator. But a window full of stockings may be pretty after all. In the window before us the only hose conspicuously displayed, pair by pair, are some of the beautiful fabric known as the Balbriggan hose, made in Scotland, and bringing the highest price on account of their superior quality. Two double festoons of these are hung across the upper part of this window—the colored in the upper line, and the pure, fleecy white in the lower. Some of them are distended to their proper roundness, as if the foot had just been withdrawn. Beneath these the window is clear; and we only see around the sides, on the bottom, and in the back-ground, bundles and packages of other varieties of hose, down to the commoner and low-priced kinds—a parcel here and there half opened just to show the completeness of the assortment; while in the centre lies a little pile of "sleeping stockings"—large socks long enough to rise half-way to the knee, and lined with the most downy fleece, which stands out, filling the capacious interior of the sock as if it were a bag of the finest and lightest carded wool.

The next window of the same shop is given to ribbons. Those displayed this season are plain and in heavy qualities, some very broad. They are shown in their boxes, so arranged, in assorted colors, as to enhance the effect of each by the contrast afforded by its neighbors; and as the boxes rise aslant from the window-sash, a very brilliant display is made. It is only with a very sparing hand, here and there in a corner, that a piece has been partly unrolled and hung from above, so as to show, without creating a confusion of colors, "what a love of a bonnet-string it would make."

In the remaining windows, other articles more interesting in themselves—cloaks, robes, shawls, and laces—are displayed, with equal taste and much more striking results.

Here is a shop of umbrellas and canes. What that is pretty can be done with these sticks? One window is filled with an immense ivory star, composed of the white heads of walking-sticks, which lie end to the glass, sustained in their horizontal position by a light wire frame which is concealed from view. At the corners of the other window of the same shop four open parasols thrust their round faces against the glass, and the intermediate space is filled with ranks of umbrellas set aslant. The sober colors permissible in umbrellas—black, and the now more popular dark-brown, with here and there a deep green venturing to show itself—form a rich back-ground to set off the bright gay colors of the parasols with silken fringes, and the glistening tips of silver, gold, jet, and cornelian that are daintily inserted here and there. At the door stands an open case of jaunty canes and serviceable umbrellas, with ticketed prices, to attract the passer-by, or to tempt one who is leaving the store empty-handed to enter again.

Next door is a grocer who has undertaken to adorn his window with much less artistic materials. He has selected nothing more than cases of wine-bottles packed in straw, and boxes of sardines; but he makes a striking and attractive window. Upon a broad shelf, sloping toward the window, at about the height of a counter, is a perfectly symmetrical row of wine cases. Every bottle is neatly wrapped in straw which is large and strait-stemmed and perfectly clean; and nothing interrupts the uniformity, except that in the case at either end of the row the bottles are wrapped also in thin pink paper, indicating that in the very best there is a refined degree of a little better still. Upon a shelf above boxes of sardines are piled up in perpendicular and horizontal lines in such a way as to present the letters of the shopkeeper's name in colors of silver and gold.

But the art of dressing windows is nowhere carried to such perfection as in Paris. Modern Paris may almost be described as a city of shop-windows; and every window is interesting. Here is the little shop of the wood and coal merchant, which you meet on every block in the side-streets, and where fuel is sold by the pound. The lintels and door-posts are painted to imitate the end of a trim wood-pile. Within its unglazed windows and open doorway are neat piles of short sticks and of fagots of kindling, and equally neat piles of moulded shapes of coal-dust, looking like loaves of charcoal; beyond which are piles of little bags of coal; while this dingy recess is illuminated by the bright face of the shop-woman, who looks both pretty and tidy, albeit her cheek is a little smouched for the time.

The butcher's shop displays meat and game not after the manner of butchers, with gore and cast-down fragments, but after the manner of fresco painters, who decorate dining-room walls with the trophies of the chase. Its front is curtained with daintily-trimmed sides of meat, and its little marble-topped and brass-trimmed tables, at each side of the space left open for entrance, seem rather adorned than disfigured by the rosy and white slices cut ready for the purchaser.

The shop where cooked meals are sold is positively charming to look upon. Its window, brilliantly lighted, attracts attention and awakens a new appetite even when we have just risen from dinner. In the centre, perhaps, is a long strip of the most beautiful moss-like green, imparting a meadow-like sweetness to the surrounding display. It is nothing but a shallow zinc tray in which grass-seed has been sprinkled in water. The meats are various, chiefly compounds, or elaborately dressed, all cold, and many unrecognizable by our American eyes. Even the sausages have a decorated and ethereal look. And it seems quite appropriate that these nice-looking things should be dealt out by a tastefully-dressed young woman, who sits within the window, and who lays down her work to wait upon the customers who enter the place.

We might describe in detail also more familiar because more elegant windows on the Boulevards. There is the shawl window, where in a vast space we see only three shawls displayed, but each displayed to perfection; the cheap plated-ware window, where the eye is dazzled with sixty square feet of spoon bowls, the bright buttons all turned to the spectator; the upholsterer's windows, in one of which a single chair stands forth as the sample of his workmanship, while the other is a complete little boudoir with one side unveiled to the street to exhibit his taste; the doll window, where in various compartments of appropriate size the scenes of fashionable life are imitated; in one a soirée with dolls in evening dress, in another a church wedding, the bride and bridegroom before the altar receiving the blessing of the bishop, while the first groomsmen appears in the act of leading the first bridemaid down the aisle through a congregation of dolls all elaborately dressed, as she collects the contribution according to the custom here upon such occasions; the glove-dealer's window, within which his journeyman stands, stretching and shaving the kid skin, and cutting out with his scissors the gloves which some lady has just ordered to be made by measure.

Any of these, or a hundred other equally attractive scenes, would illustrate some of the first requisites to success in adorning a window. The first is perfect cleanliness. Nothing will conceal dust, and dust will eclipse any charms. Akin to this is the importance of clear glass. The perfection of the glass commonly used in the Parisian shop-windows is wonderful. The second requisite seems to be not to display too many articles. In a confusion the beauty of each article is spoiled by the presence of the others. It is not necessary to display all; but it is better to display a part and suggest more. A purchaser is attracted not only by seeing what she wants, but just as well by seeing what she does not want, if it is charming, and awakens the desire and expectation of something else. Thirdly, harmony of colors must be secured. The preceding requisite is one of tact and judgment; this is one of artistic taste. Some symmetry in form of arrangement is easy for any one to effect, but harmony of colors is the result of rarer gifts. Any body can put the tallest bonnet-stands in the middle of the row, but not every body knows whether the maroon hat ought to go next to the blue, the crimson, the green, or the black.

COLERIDGE AND LAMB.

IN many respects there could not be a greater contrast than that which existed between these two men. Yet they mutually attracted each other. Coleridge had taste; he could speculate in the region of letters as well as that of metaphysics (for which latter Lamb seems to have had no liking). He loved Shakspeare even as Lamb did, and Marlowe, and Jonson, and Burton, and Fuller.

In 1818, when dedicating his works to him, he acknowledges that Coleridge "first kindled" in him, "if not the power, yet the love of poetry and beauty and kindness."

"What words have I heard Spoke at the Mermaid!"

It was a friendship which dated from the days when they both strolled together in the cloisters of Christ's Hospital, and it lasted unbroken until death snapped the tie, and Lamb broke out into the sad soliloquy, "Coleridge is dead! Coleridge is dead!" "He was my fifty years' old friend," he said, "without a dissension; I can not think without an ineffectual reference to him."

Lamb was the centre of an extensive literary circle during his lifetime. The suppers of "the Lambs" at the Temple, Great Russell Street, and Islington are now historical. Thither flocked many well-known writers, the authors who form the connecting link between our day and the age of the Spectator, Tatler, and Guardian. Hazlitt was there, and De Quincey, and Charles Lloyd, and Leigh Hunt; Charles Kemble and Liston came there from the boards of the theatre; and Wordsworth and Coleridge sometimes put in an appearance from the cloudy north. "When the latter came," says Talfourd, "argument, wit, humor, criticism, were hushed; the periest, smartest, and the cleverest felt that all were assembled to listen; and if a card-table had been filled, or a dispute begun, before he was excited to continuous speech, his gentle voice, undulating in music, soon—

"Suspended whilst, and took with rapture
The thronging audience."

At these gatherings every one was at home; no one (unless it was Coleridge) was allowed to monopolize attention. Even the latter was sometimes pulled up for seeking to have it all his own way. We are told how he had consumed the evening on one occasion, talking of some "regenerated orthodoxy." Leigh Hunt, who was one of the listeners, on leaving the house expressed his surprise at the prodigality and intensity of Coleridge's religious expressions. Lamb tranquilized him by "Ne-ne-never mind what Coleridge says; he's full of fun."

It was of the same Coleridge Lamb wrote on one occasion, "He is an archangel a little damaged."

"The supper of cold meat on these occasions," says Barry Cornwall, "was always on the side-table; not very formal, as may be imagined; and every one might rise when it suited him and cut a slice, or take a glass of porter, without reflecting on the abstinence of the rest of the company. Lamb would perhaps call out and bid the hungry guest help himself without ceremony."

Bridal and Evening Toilettes.

Fig. 1. Evening Toilette.—Dress of pearl-colored silk, with trained skirt and half high waist, open to the belt; sleeves of lace of the same shade, forming six puffs, separated by a rich embroidered galloon of gold color, which forms the trimming of the shoulder and the waist. Each seam of the skirt, which is entirely flat at the top, is trimmed with the same galloon, richly embroidered. The belt is made of the same galloon, fastened with a rosette. A cluster of flowers of the same shade as the galloon forms the coiffure. White kid gloves.

Fig. 2. Evening Toilette.—Dress of white embroidered muslin, over a skirt of rose-colored taffetas, trimmed round the bottom with two ruches of the same taffetas, pinked. The muslin skirt is scalloped round the bottom, and is longer behind and shorter in front than the rose-colored skirt. The low-necked waist is made with rounded lappets, with no fullness at the waist, the lappet at the back reaching half-way to the bottom of the skirt. The lappets are edged with a narrow ruche of taffetas which forms a ruche behind, and falls in little ends in front. The low-necked waist is trimmed in the same manner, the short sleeves being formed of a puffing surmounted with the ruche. Coiffure: half wreath of flowers of the same shade as the dress.

Fig. 3. Evening Bridal Costume.—Under-skirt of satin, with a deep flounce of lace, surmounted by three bias folds of faye. Over-skirt of tulle, likewise trimmed with a flounce of lace and bias folds. Waist very low, trimmed in front and back with a drapery of tulle, with a cluster of orange flowers in the middle. Short sleeves of puffed tulle, caught up with a cluster of orange flowers. Wreath of orange flowers in the hair.

Fig. 4. Evening Toilette.—Under-skirt of pink satin, veiled with an overskirt of India muslin, scalloped on the bottom. Marie Antoinette tchu, scalloped to match the skirt. Sash of pink satin, tied behind at the middle of the waist, and again half-way to the end. Satin bow on the short sleeves. Marie Antoinette coiffure, interspersed with sweet-brier.

Fig. 5. Church Bridal Dress.—Dress of faye, trimmed all the way up the front with coquilles of lace, surmounted with a four-loop knot of satin. Sleeves with lace jockey. Coiffure interspersed with orange blossoms. Long flowing veil, confined behind by a bandeau of diamonds.

Fig. 6. Evening Toilette.—Empire dress of emerald satin, cut in sharp points at the bottom, over which is a second row of points, formed by frills of blonde an inch and a quarter wide. Over-skirt of puffed tulle, trimmed at the bottom with clusters of leaves. Satin bodice, trimmed at the top to match the skirt, with the addition of a string of pearls. Underwaist of pleated tulle. Coiffure of leaves.

Dinner and Walking Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—High-necked dress of green satin, trimmed with a flounce edged at the top and bottom with a crosscut band of green velvet. Over-skirt of silver-gray moire, cut in large scallops at the bottom, and bordered with a flat puffing, edged on each side with a narrow green velvet ribbon. A gray passementerie fringe trims the bottom of this skirt. The gray moire corsage is very low, and is trimmed to match the over-skirt, with shoulder straps and long, flowing sleeves, lined with green satin. The close under-sleeves are also of green satin.

Fig. 2.—Suit of dark-blue English velvet, with the skirt just clearing the ground, and the adjusted paletot forming the over-skirt. The skirt is bordered with a fold of satin, of a little lighter shade than the dress, and embroidered in chenille with a wreath of oak leaves of the same shade as the latter. A similar, narrower fold trims the edge of the long flowing sleeves of the paletot, and the wrist of the close-fitting under-

Fig. 2.—Bonnet of green velvet, with diadem of green velvet leaves. Green velvet strings, dotted with green satin leaves. A veil of tulle, lace, and jet grelots falls over the back, and is prolonged in front as strings.

Fig. 3.—Bonnet of white velvet, bound with white satin. Veil and strings of white tulle and lace, with white satin piping. Crystallized green leaves, green grapes, and a bow of white ribbon complete the trimming.

Home Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—Dress of black silk, trimmed with bias folds of black velvet, black velvet buttons, and black silk fringe.

Fig. 2.—Dress of gray Irish poplin, trimmed with gray satin rouleaux and silk tassels of same color; with simulated button-holes of gray braid.

Fig. 3.—Dress of brown empress cloth, trimmed with bias folds and lappets of dark-brown silk, and brown buttons.

Fig. 4.—Dress of purple silk, trimmed with bias folds of black velvet, narrow black lace, and black and purple fringe, in the manner shown in the illustration.

HOME TOILETTES.

JENKIN.

THERE was a chimney elf in Jenkin's house, a wee old woman, who was always dressed in smoke color, and who was always knitting spider's silk stockings; and one day when the kitchen was still and sunny, and the fire was clear and bright, she slipped out of the chimney, knitting in hand, for a sly talk with the Kettle.

Just as she was seating herself on the poker she heard something like this: "Aieah! Don't! Oh! Stop! Eee! Moth-er!"

"Mercy! what is that?" cried the Chimney Elf.

"Only Jenkin teasing his sister again," answered the Kettle.

"Oh! that is it!" and the Chimney Elf put on her spectacles. Now these were fairy spectacles, and with them on her nose the Elf could look straight through the ceiling into the nursery, where Jenkin was teasing his sister. How was he teasing her? He was twitching her, nudging her elbow and making her drop her needle, pulling three little hairs of a curl at a time till she screamed; dancing about her, and laughing, and at every jerk and squeal saying, "Oh, how funny you are! If you only could see how droll you do look!"

"I see," said the Elf, "he needs me in his pocket."

"What do you mean by that?" asked the Kettle; but this queer little old woman had already folded up her knitting, and slipped through the keyhole.

Where was she going? To the drawing-room, where were some ladies, whom Jenkin had just been called to see. Jenkin sat on a chair, with his hair fresh brushed, his cheeks like rosy apples, and holding himself very straight; and he looked so sweet and behaved so well that you could never have believed that such a boy would tease a girl, and that girl his sister! The ladies were talking, and Jenkin, having nothing better to do, was looking at the door. So he saw the Chimney Elf coming through the keyhole.

"What is coming now?" thought Jenkin, for the Chimney Elf never made her appearance except on business. The little old woman smoothed down her smoke-colored dress and walked up to Jenkin, who began to feel nervous, and looked at his mother. But his mother was talking, and saw nothing. The Chimney Elf looked Jenkin straight in the eye for a moment, and—Dived Into His Pocket.

Jenkin gave a light squeal.

"Jenkin!" said his mother, reprovingly.

"If you say a word I will turn you into a pair of tongs," whispered the Elf, giving Jenkin a great pinch on the leg.

Jenkin jerked.

"Creep mouse! creep mouse!" whispered the Elf, tickling him, and running up and down his leg, in a way that filled him with little chills and shudders.

Jenkin wriggled.

"Oh, what fun!" said the Elf, running up his back and pulling two small hairs in his neck.

Jenkin gave a great bounce.

"Jenkin, leave the room," said his mother, much ashamed of all this twisting and bouncing.

"It ain't my—"

"Fault," Jenkin was going to say; but

"would you like a brass knob when you are a pair of tongs?" whispered the Elf, and Jenkin tried instead.

"He! he! he!" tittered the Elf; and as soon as the drawing-room door was shut she got out of his pocket and danced around him, making little darts and snatches at him.

"If you could only see yourself! The corners of your mouth turn down, and your eyes are shut up tight, and your nose is all in wrinkles, and you do look so funny!" declared this terrible, little old woman, laughing and clapping her hands.

But just then a door opened, and whish! she vanished.

Jenkin rubbed his eyes, and then he sat down and began to think how odd it was that the Chimney Elf should serve him just as he had served his sister; and then he thought that perhaps it would be better not to tease so much; and after that he was a good boy for a week.

But one day he was coming down hill, and May was afraid of the ice; and Jenkin thought what fools girls were to be always afraid, and to mince so!

And then he thought she should be made to do better; and then he ran her down hill, and she screamed, and he laughed, till they had quite reached their own door. But in the door Jenkin's heart went down like lead. For there stood the Chimney Elf.

"I see," she said, briskly, "we must have a little more fun to-day!" and with that Jenkin found himself on the ceiling—walking there, head downward, like the flies!

"Murder!" roared Jenkin, throwing out his hands, and trying to catch hold of something, while his feet went on walking! walking! all over the ceiling. "Oh! ah! yow!" and he shook his knees and tried to stop himself, and even to tumble down.

"What fools boys are to scream and mince so! They should be made to do better," said the Elf, seizing Jenkin by the arm, and running him along the ceiling.

Oh, what a dreadful position! Jenkin belabored so loudly that his father came running. But when he reached the door Jenkin was on his feet and quite alone.

"What are you crying about?" asked the father.

Jenkin looked toward the chimney, and saw the Chimney Elf shaking her head at him.

"Nothing," whimpered Jenkin.

"It would be a pity to make a noise like that for nothing," cried the father, who thought that Jenkin had played him a trick; and Jenkin got a whipping.

Jenkin began to think that really he must not tease May again, and he was very good for a prodigiously long time—say a month. But one day as she was trying to draw a house Jenkin came and looked at her.

"Please don't look just now," said May.

"I don't see what harm there is in looking," answered Jenkin.

"Oh, Jenkin, I can't draw!" cried May.

"Please wait till it is done."

By this time Jenkin had discovered that it was fine fun to look, and he put his head down so close that his nose touched his sister's; and when she moved he followed her, and when she ran he ran too, laughing and looking in her face all the way.

Suddenly, with a hop-skip-and-jump, a little old woman in a smoke-colored gown lighted on his shoulder; and stepping on the edge of his collar, and holding on by his ear and nose, looked straight into his eyes.

"Get out!" cried Jenkin, scared out of his wits.

"I am only looking," answered the Elf.

"But I don't like it," said Jenkin.

"What harm is there?" insisted the old woman.

"Jenkin, come to dinner!" called his mother.

Jenkin went at once, for he hoped that somebody would take the Elf away; but nobody seemed to see her; and she held on by his ear, and looked at him! and she swung herself from his hair, and looked at him! and stood on his plate, and looked and looked at him! and when he got a book she sat on the top of that, and looked at him, laughing all the time; and when he went to play, she stood in his ear, and stretched around, and peeped at him; and when he began to undress himself, what do you think she did? why, she perched herself on his pillow, and prepared to look at him all night!

But here Jenkin began to cry.

"And I won't tease May ever again," said Jenkin.

"I didn't know it plagued you so just to look! and oh! dear, good Mrs. Chimney Elf, do please go away, and try me just this once, and you will see I will be good!"

"See that you are!" answered the Elf, sternly; but on her way up chimney she wiped her eyes more than once, for she was sorry for Jenkin after all; and meeting the Dream-man she sent Jenkin, oh, such a beautiful dream! that he forgot all his troubles.

But he never teased May again.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Thanksgiving Eve.—After the religious services and festive family gatherings so fitting to the day, nothing could be more pleasant and appropriate than Haydn's beautiful oratorio, "The Seasons," which so many of us enjoyed to-night. Steinway Hall was crowded with an audience who listened with rapt attention. Madame Parepa-Rosa's rich, pure voice was delightful to listen to. The famous song, "A Wealthy Lord who Long had Loved," was a special favorite, but every thing she sang was executed finely. The entire performance was a success, and the audience gave abundant indication that they appreciate this kind of sacred music.

Haydn devoted nearly two years to the composition of this oratorio, completing it when about sixty-five years old. Indeed, he devoted himself too exclusively to it, and his health soon after failed. Haydn's music is peculiarly cheerful and joyous—he must have had a happy spirit within himself, for he found little home joy. When quite a young man he loved a lady whom he had instructed in music. He asked her to marry him, but she had already decided to enter a convent. Her father had given some pecuniary assistance to Haydn, and, impelled by gratitude and his persuasions, the gifted composer transferred his proposal to another daughter and married her. It proved a joyless marriage, and he seldom spoke of his wife—she seemed good for nothing but to squander her husband's earnings. "It is nothing to her," he once sadly remarked, "whether her husband be a cobbler or an artist."

Received a letter from Cousin A. this morning. They seem to be enjoying Paris life. He writes: "We are studying French in a desultory sort of way and have some amusing times, though no difficulty in getting along. For all the French one learns in books at home he is as much nonplused when he tries at first to understand conversation in Paris as if he had never seen a word of the language. Any conversation begins with a question, carefully studied beforehand, if the subject is new, and of course uttered with all the glibness I can acquire by previous practice. Then comes an answer rattling off, which sounds like the gurgling of a little brook. Then I say—in the best of French of course—'Pardon, Monsieur, but I am a stranger, and you speak too quickly for me.' Then there is a mutual laugh. Then the brook gurgles again. If necessary I then say, 'Once more, if you please,' and with another laugh, not at us, but with us; the French comes out, drop by drop, and thus we get to a tolerable understanding."

Friday.—Noticed in a morning paper some directions for selecting "Thanksgiving Poultry." 'Tis too late for that; but Christmas and New-Year's are coming, when geese and turkeys will be in special demand; and as Mr. Typeset leaned back from the breakfast-table yesterday morning he remarked that he "would appoint every other day as a Thanksgiving, if I would always get such tender chickens." So I think I may as well study up the subject a little, for I do remember that a tough fowl has occasionally been palmed off upon me. These are the directions:

"A young turkey has a smooth leg and a soft bill, and if fresh the eyes will be bright and the feet moist. Old turkeys have scaly, stiff feet. Young fowls have a tender skin, smooth legs, and the breast-bone yields readily to the pressure of the finger. The best are those that have yellow legs. The feet and legs of the old fowl look as if they had seen hard service in the world. Young ducks feel tender under the wing, and the web is transparent. The best are thick and hard on the breast. Young geese have yellow bills, and the feet are yellow and supple; the skin may be easily broken by the head of a pin; the breast is plump and the fat white. An old goose is unfit for the human stomach."

A comical instance is related of some runaway lovers, living in Kentucky, who a couple of weeks ago resolved to become one. They reached the banks of the Ohio before they felt secure enough from pursuing parents to stop for the ceremony. They tried to get a license, but failed; then they crossed over to Cincinnati and tried again, but it was too late at night, and again they failed. Fearing to risk being overtaken by their pursuers, they hastily drove to a clergyman's house, and requested his company. The driver had his orders, and drove rapidly to the Cincinnati Suspension Bridge. Toll paid, the vehicle slowly rolled along the bridge to a point which the driver judged to be the middle, and there it halted just as the bells sounded midnight. And there, in a hack, on the suspension bridge, at the hour of midnight, the nuptial ceremony took place, and the anxious lovers were made husband and wife without the permission of either Ohio or Kentucky.

There are many little peculiarities of pronunciation or forms of speech which reveal to an acute observer the section of country from which a person comes. Heard a gentleman say to a young lady the other evening: "I knew you were from New England because you give 'a' the broad sound." Very curious idioms are used in different parts of the country. In some of the Western States the word "at" has a peculiar use. For example, "Where do you live at?" "Where did you get cold at?" The word "go" is used for "intend," as "I did not go to do it;" "I didn't go to go." The word "like" is used in the sense "as though;" "he talks like he was crazy." "Just" is a pet word: "it is just too bad;" "I am just glad." "I don't guess I shall go," is the common way of saying "I guess I shall not go." "Awful fine," "powerful weak," "right wrong," "a heap sight," "a right smart chance," and a "good bit," are common expressions. Other sections have quite as singular idioms.

Met Mr. and Mrs. W. last evening, and, to tell the truth, am sorry it happened. I know it's very wrong, but how could I help it? I'm sure I expected to like them, and tried hard to, but couldn't. Mr. T. says its only a prejudice, and will wear away, but what made the prejudice come? I had none until I saw them.

"Tell me by what hidden magic
Our impressions first are led Into liking or disliking
Oft before a word is said?
Why should smiles sometimes repel us?
Bright eyes turn our feelings cold?
What is that which comes to tell us
All that glitters is not gold?"

Evening.—"Well, Mr. Typeset," said I, as he took his seat at the dinner-table to-night—rather late he was, too, and I began to suspect he had dined down town—"did you secure good seats for Dickens's readings?"

Mr. T. had rushed out of the house directly after breakfast this morning with that end in view, and, of course, I naturally wanted to know the location of the seats. But when he did not answer immediately, and I looked up again to see if he heard me, I perceived he was uncommonly occupied with his oyster soup.

"Mr. Typeset?" I repeated—and a certain twinkle in his eye convinced me that he had heard me well enough the first time.

"Now, my dear," he began, in a deprecatory tone.

"You don't mean to say that you didn't get any tickets?" I interrupted, excitedly.

"My dear," said he, calmly, "now do be reasonable. Just imagine Fourteenth Street blocked up with a dense crowd something less than a mile long each way from Steinway Hall—and people boiling over in the adjacent streets. And didn't I plan to get there a quarter of an hour before the box-office was open? Why, if I had taken my place in the lines and waited, I should be still waiting this very moment, I do verily believe. I thought I had better go down town and attend to my own business. You will see, my dear," continued Mr. T., without giving me a chance to speak, "that the evening papers confirm my statements." And taking one from his pocket he began to read: "At nine o'clock the doors were opened and the grand rush commenced. A squad of policemen was found necessary to preserve order, and long lines of men were formed, which stretched down Fourteenth Street to the Academy of Music, and up Irving Place to Irving Hall. A long line of carriages filled with fashionably-dressed ladies was stationed in front of Steinway Hall, their occupants patiently waiting for their footmen to purchase tickets. The crowd was composed of all sorts of people, young, old, white-headed, dapper-dressed, German, French, English, and American. Some had taken their lunch-baskets with them, others were propped up against the iron fence of a brown-stone front at least a quarter of a mile from Steinway Hall, quietly puffing their cigars."

Saturday Morn.—"Now, Mr. Typeset," I exclaimed, as he came down to breakfast, "do you know that every ticket for the whole course of Dickens's readings was sold yesterday, and there's to be no sale of single tickets to-day?"

"Of course, I supposed it would be so," he replied.

"But," said I, somewhat annoyed at his want of interest in the matter, "won't you make some plan so that we can get tickets for the next course?"

"Hadden't you better see how you like him first?" inquired Mr. T., without raising his eyes from his paper.

"What did you say?" I asked, puzzled.

"Perhaps you had better wait, and see how you like Mr. Dickens's readings."

"Mr. Typeset!" I paused—"What do you mean?"

"Why I got tickets for the first—"

"Now, Mr. Typeset, you told me—"

"No, I did not tell you, that was all. I did not want to disturb the peace of the family, and as I really could not get a ticket for 'Dot,' I thought she might cry, and spoil our dinner!"

A general laugh followed, in which "Dot," without understanding any thing about the matter, heartily joined.

"I told you," Mr. T. continued, "that it was of no use to wait my turn in Fourteenth Street, and that I went down town."

"And how did you get the tickets?"

"From—well—a friend of—Dickens, I suppose."

"And," continued I, calling to Mr. T., after he had left the breakfast-room, "what did you pay for them?"

But Mr. T. never answered a word.

Saturday Eve.—These dull, damp, murky, gloomy November days! They are a trial to health and patience! Every body has a cold in some form. Mr. Typeset and Johnny are deaf, and Aunt Anne is almost dumb! Such fearful colds as they have! And my turn is coming—throat sore, head hot, and brains in a middle. Suppose something has happened to-day, but really don't remember.

"My trusty gold pen in my bottle of ink
I have dipped and dipped while endeavoring to think."

But it is no use. I can't think. So I will go to bed. Wonder whether I shall be too hoarse to speak or too deaf to hear to-morrow! In either case, it will be expedient to commence learning the sign-language for convenience in the family—that is, if I retain ability to learn any thing. Just now nothing is clear to my mind but Hood's lines:

"No warmth, no cheerfulness, no healthful ease,
No comfortable feel in any member—
No shade, no shine, no butterflies, no bees,
No fruits, no flowers, no leaves, no birds,
November!"

But now, farewell to November. December, ushering Winter in, has come!

THE MAN-DRESSMAKER OF PARIS.

ONE morning some years ago, as I was having my hair dressed by one of those admirable coiffeurs who may be had in Paris by the month at most reasonable rates, ranging, according to their reputations, from three dollars a month to twelve—I never heard of any higher—and coming every day with the utmost regularity, my maid opened the door, and, in a delighted voice, exclaimed,

"Oh! please, ma'am, her ladyship arrived in Paris yesterday, and has sent her footman to know if you will not stop at Meurice's and take her about this morning in your carriage; she wants to do some shopping."

"Her ladyship" was the friend who had recommended to me the excellent servant now speaking.

I went out and saw the man myself; told him that I would go to fetch his mistress in about an hour's time, and gave him a glass of wine to cheer him in advance for the hours of weary waiting which, in common with my coachman, he would be forced to endure while in attendance on two young ladies with money in their pockets, pursuing "shopping" in that paradise of shoppers, Paris.

I arrived at Meurice's a little behind time, and found her ladyship waiting for me in the gloom of the porte cochère. She whispered enthusiastically in my ear, "My dear, I've come over expressly to see you, and to buy a cloak."

The first object of her visit was accomplished, she had seen me; and now for the second, to buy a cloak.

"Where shall we go?" I asked, as the footman stood holding the carriage door open with one hand and elevating his hat about a foot above his head with the other.

"Let's go to Gagelin's," said her ladyship.

After an appropriate nod from me the footman sprang on the box and off we rolled.

"Gagelin is awfully dear," said I.

"Oh, you little American!" said her ladyship, laughing. "Awfully dear indeed! You're awfully dear yourself."

"To gratify your prejudices then," said I, "I will change the phraseology. If you buy a cloak at Gagelin's it will make a hole in your pocket."

"I know it," said her ladyship, with a sigh, "but I like Gagelin's styles. Besides, there is a civil young Englishman there who always serves me, a pretty fellow, and, as I said, civil."

"What's his name?" I asked.

"Worth," replied her ladyship.

"Is he a partner in the house?"

"No, only one of the clerks, I think," returned her ladyship.

At Gagelin's we found a large cloak-buying community, and, scanning the faces of the clerks, her ladyship said she could not discover Mr. Worth.

"Where is Monsieur Worth?" inquired her ladyship of one of the head clerks.

"Ah, Madame!" replied he, with a shrug. "Connais pas."

"Not know Worth, who was here so long?"

"How did Madame call him?"

"Worth."

"Non connais pas."

"Not a young Englishman, who spoke very broken French?"

"Oh, lui! Oui, certainement—a quite young one—Madame means Monsieur Vorss," said the clerk, triumphantly.

"Does Madame?" said her ladyship, amused.

"That's evidently the way they pronounce his name here," said I.

"How stupid of them!"

"Well, I don't know. No doubt we make just such mistakes in our French. You see the w and the th of Worth's name form a conjunction of different English sounds impossible for a French tongue to master. So they compromise the matter by calling him 'Vorss.'"

"Well, where has he gone?" asked her ladyship, again addressing the clerk.

The clerk seemed not altogether willing to give his address—said he believed Mr. Vorss had set up in business somewhere for himself—and would these ladies not like to look at their last novelties in cloaks?

No. Madame was perhaps rather obstinate. She said she would be glad if the clerk would give her Mr. Worth's exact address.

Thus questioned, the clerk gave it—No. 7 Rue de la Paix.

Arrived at the Rue de la Paix, and turning down the broad street from the Boulevards, we were struck by the number of elegant carriages which were moving up and down, landing fashionably-dressed ladies, picking them up, and then either retreating to the opposite curb to wait, or rattling away with their fair freight.

"I wonder if all those carriages are for the house of John Munroe & Company," said I.

"Who are they?"

"The great American bankers—No. 9 Rue de la Paix."

Arriving at the door, we found they were all for Mr. Worth's, at No. 7. The carriages of a Russian grand duchess, half a dozen English peeresses, several Spanish families, and many others.

A simple silver or metal plate attached to the right-hand side of the porte cochère informed us that Mr. Worth's rooms were on the first-floor.

A short flight of elegantly-carpeted steps brought us to Mr. Worth's ante-chamber. Pushing open the door we entered a room hung with rich brown velvet, and highly ornamented with steel decorations; but the crowning glory of the room was the wealth of real camellias (or "japonicas") which were growing on all sides, imbedded in jardinières.

The second room was equally luxurious in point of upholstery, but here was presented such a scene of fashionable excitement that it was impossible to pay much attention to any thing else. On all the sofas, chairs, tables, and pianos of this room, and several beyond, were heaped piles of cloaks, shawls, and jackets, and even dresses, laces, and lingerie.

The room we entered was crowded with the aristocratic occupants of the carriages we had seen below; but what most attracted our attention was the curious spectacle of Mr. Worth's saleswomen. The young Englishman had evidently racked his brain to get up a sensation, and here it was.

These shop-girls were dressed up in clothing, jewels, and laces fit for the gala wear of so many empresses, queens, and princesses of the blood. To complete the picture they were superbly coiffed, and one of them, in addition, wore a splendid diamond ornament resting on her forehead. This proved to be the wife of Worth—a Frenchwoman who had also formerly been attached to Gagelin's establishment. I shall never forget her dress. It was a superb black silk heavily wrought with flowers of gold, evidently embroidered by hand; the skirt cut with a fine sweeping train such as is indispensable to every elegant dress nowadays, but which at that time was quite an innovation. The fit of the corsage was perfect; and the remainder of the toilette was of equal costliness and taste.

At this moment Mr. Worth appeared, and, respectfully greeting his old friend and patroness, her ladyship, thanked us both for our kindness in finding him out.

"You have found your venture successful?" said her ladyship, inquiringly.

"Oh, your ladyship, successful beyond all my wildest hopes. I am perfectly besieged, and by the plus grand monde of Paris, and of London, and of all countries."

"Why do you dress your saleswomen so extravagantly?"

"Merely to show off the dresses they are wearing as models of my work, my fit, and my style of trimming. A lady comes here and wants a dress. She names about the price she wishes to pay. I then call up Number One of my girls, or Number Two, or Three (as the case may be), who is wearing just such a dress as the lady wishes to purchase. Then the lady is enabled to see exactly how her dress will look when completed. Perhaps," he added, with a smile, "perhaps Number One, or Number Two, or Number Three, being a pretty and well-formed person, the general effect of the dress is enhanced by her wearing it; at any rate, it is not diminished. And, altogether, I find my system has an immense advantage over the old style of wire-frame dummies, which often make the richest and most graceful cloak, mantelet, or shawl, look little short of hideous."

Whatever may have been the advantage of Mr. Worth's system in regard to facilitating sales, it struck me as being rather conducive to vanity and idleness on the part of the shop-girls; for I observed that every time one of them was in the vicinity of a looking-glass (which was about every other minute) she eyed herself complacently in it, straightened herself up, viewed her back and her sides, flung out her train haughtily, rearranged her elaborate hair, coughed and smirked, and betrayed signs of general self-satisfaction. In more than one instance, too, beginning with Madame Worth herself, the desire to be pretty, and to do justice to these unusual "store" clothes, had led the wearers to resort to the rouge-pot, and the liquid enamel skin-whitener, and the solid india-ink eye-brow darkener, than which, to my taste, nothing can be more repulsive and hideous—utterly nullifying, in my opinion, the "good effect" of Mr. Worth's expensive "system."

While we were talking to this king of stitchcraft, he was frequently importuned by messengers to come away, as the Princess This, and the Duchess That, and the Marchioness of the Other, wanted to see him, "only for a minute" of his valuable time. He waved them haughtily away, for he was used to these, and like a true Englishman was more obsequious to this English lady, with her simple title, than to all these foreign "coats of arms" feminine.

In appearance he was a well-looking young fellow enough, and from his constant contact with all that is refined and all that is feminine, he had himself become somewhat refined and altogether effeminate. He was dressed in a light-gray suit, with a fine and spotless linen collar, turned quite far back, rather exposing his neck (in utter defiance of the mode, which was then strictly for the "dog-collar," or "all-rounder"), and knotted loosely under the collar he wore a large, soft, silk neck-tie, of a brilliant scarlet. He had brown eyes, a dark mustache, and a thin and delicate face—in its general contour, though less manly, not altogether unlike the face of Mr. William Castle, the English opera-singer.

Wearied by our long stay, some of the Duchesses and Princesses approached and began talking to him in a coaxing, pleading way, which struck me as being in strange contrast to the imperious manner in which women of their rank are wont to address tradespeople. But this man had made himself a wonderful reputation as master of that art which is dearest of all others to the feminine heart; and as he rattled off to them in the worst but most voluble French I ever heard his intentions in regard to future dresses and their trimmings, these noble women gazed at him in speechless admiration, bating their breaths that not a word of his wretched jargon might be lost or misunderstood.

Her ladyship was measured for a cloak, and I bought one which struck my fancy on the spot. Its cost was sixty dollars.

Since that early period of his career the former clerk at Gagelin's has become world-renowned; and the man-dress-maker of Paris has had many imitators, even here in New York.

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XV.

JOURNAL OF PAOLO LANGHETTI.

Liverpool, June 2, 1846.—I promised you, my Teresina, to keep a diary of all my wanderings, and now I begin, not knowing whether it will be worth reading or not, but knowing this: that my corellina will read it all with equal interest, whether it be trivial or important.

I have taken passage in the ship Tecumseh from Liverpool to Quebec. I have embarked in her for no better reason than this, that she is the first that will sail, and I am impatient. The first New York ship does not leave for a fortnight. A fortnight in Liverpool! Horror!

I have been on board to secure my room. I am told that there is a large number of emigrants. It is a pity, but it can not be helped. All ships have emigrants now: Ireland is being evacuated. There will soon be no peasants to till the soil. What enormous misery must be in that most wretched of countries! Is Italy worse? Yes, far worse; for Italy has a past to contrast with the present, whereas Ireland has no past.

At Sea, June 4.—We are many miles out in the Irish Channel. There are six hundred emigrants on board—men, women, and children. I am told that most of these are from Ireland, unhappy Ireland! Some are from England, and are going to seek their fortune in America. As I look on them I think, My God! what misery there is in this world! And yet what can I do to alleviate it? I am helpless. Let the world suffer. All will be right hereafter.

June 10.—Six hundred passengers! They are all crowded together in a manner that is frightful to me. Comfort is out of the question; the direst distress is every where present; the poor wretches only try to escape suffering. During storms they are shut in; there is little ventilation; and the horror that reigns in that hold will not let me either eat or sleep. I have remonstrated with the captain, but without effect. He told me that he could do nothing. The owners of the ship put them on board, and he was employed to take them to their proper destination. My God! what will become of them?

June 15.—There have been a few days of fine weather. The wretched emigrants have all been on deck. Among them I noticed three who, from their appearance, belonged to a different class. There was a lady with a young man and a young girl, who were evidently her children. The lady has once been beautiful, and still bears the traces of that beauty, though her face indicates the extreme of sadness. The son is a man of magnificent appearance, though as yet not full-grown. The daughter is more lovely than any being whom I have ever seen. She is different from my Bicetta. Bice is Grecian, with a face like that of a marble statue, and a soul of purely classic mould. Bice is serene. She reminds me of Artemis. Bice is an artist to her inmost heart. Bice I love as I love you, my Teresina, and I never expect to meet with one who can so interpret my ideas with so divine a voice. But this girl is more spiritual. Bice is classic, this one is medieval. Bice is a goddess, this one a saint. Bice is Artemis, or one of the Muses; this one is Holy Agnes or Saint Cecilia. There is in that sweet and holy face the same depth of devotion which our painters portray on the face of the Madonna. This little family group stand amidst all the other passengers, separated by the wide gulf of superior rank, for they are manifestly from among the upper classes, but still more so by the solemn isolation of grief. It is touching to see the love of the mother for her children, and the love of the children for their mother. How can I satisfy the longings which I feel to express to them my sympathy?

June 21.—I have at length gained my desire. I have become acquainted with that little group. I went up to them this morning in obedience to a resistless impulse, and with the most tender sympathy that I could express; and, with many apologies, offered the young man a bottle of wine for his mother. He took it gratefully and frankly. He met me half-way in my advances. The poor lady looked at me with speechless gratitude, as though kindness and sympathy were unknown to her. "God will reward you, Sir," she said, in a tremulous voice, "for your sympathy with the miserable."

"Dear Madame," said I, "I wish no other reward than the consciousness that I may have alleviated your distress."

My heart bled for these poor creatures. Cast down from a life which must have once been one of luxury, they were now in the foulest of places, the hold of an emigrant ship. I went back to the captain to see if I could not do something in their behalf. I wished to give up my room to them. He said I could do so if I wished, but that there was no room left in the cabin. Had there been I would have hired one and insisted on their going there.

I went to see the lady, and made this proposal as delicately as I could. There were two berths in my room. I urged her and her daughter to take them. At first they both refused most positively, with tears of gratitude. But I would not be so put off. To the mother I portrayed the situation of the daughter in that den of horror; to the daughter I pointed out the condition of the mother; to the son I showed the position of his mother and sister, and thus I worked upon the holiest feelings of their hearts. For myself I assured them that I could get a place among the sailors in the fore-cabin, and that I preferred doing so. By such means as these I moved them to consent. They did so with an expression of thankfulness that brought tears to my eyes.

"Dear Madame," said I, "you will break my heart if you talk so. Take the room and say nothing. I have been a wanderer for years, and can live anywhere."

It was not till then that I found out their names. I told them mine. They looked at one another in astonishment. "Langhetti?" said the mother. "Yes."

"Did you ever live in Holby?"

"Yes. My father was organist in Trinity Church, and I and my sister lived there some years. She lives there still."

"My God!" was her ejaculation.

"Why?" I asked, with eager curiosity. "What do you know about Holby, and about Langhetti?"

She looked at me with solemn earnestness. "I," said she, "am the wife, and these are the children of one who was your father's friend. He who was my husband, and the father of these children, was Ralph Brandon, of Brandon Hall."

I stood for a moment stupefied. Then I burst into tears. Then I embraced them all, and said I know not what of pity and sympathy and affection. My God! to think of such a fate as this awaiting the family of Ralph Brandon. Did you know this, oh, Teresina? If so, why did you keep it secret? But no—you could not have known it. If you had this would not have happened.

They took my room in the cabin—the dear ones—Mrs. Brandon and the sweet Edith. The son Frank and I stay together among the emigrants. Here I am now, and I write this as the sun is getting low, and the uproar of all these hundreds is sounding in my ears.

June 30.—There is a panic in the ship. The dread pestilence known as "ship-fever" has appeared. This disease is the terror of emigrant ships. Surely there was never any vessel so well adapted to be the prey of the pestilence as this of ours! I have lived for ten days among the steerage passengers, and have witnessed their misery. Is God just? Can he look down unmoved upon scenes like these? Now that the disease has come, where will it stop?

July 3.—The disease is spreading. Fifteen are prostrate. Three have died.

July 10.—Thirty deaths have occurred, and fifty are sick. I am assisting to nurse them.

July 15.—Thirty-four deaths since my last. One hundred and thirty are sick. I will labor here if I have to die for it.

July 18.—If this is my last entry let this diary be sent to Mrs. Thornton, care of William Thornton, Holby, Pembroke, England—(the above entry was written in English, the remainder was all in Italian, as before). More than two hundred are sick. Frank Brandon is down. I am afraid to let his mother know it. I am working night and day. In three days there have been forty-seven deaths. The crew are demoralized and panic-stricken.

July 23.—Shall I survive these horrors? More than fifty new deaths have occurred. The disease has spread among the sailors. Two are dead, and seven are sick. Horror prevails. Frank Brandon is recovering slowly. Mrs. Brandon does not know that he has been sick. We send word that we are afraid to come for fear of communicating the disease to her and to Edith.

July 27.—More than half of the sailors are sick. Eleven dead. Sixty-seven passengers dead since last report. Frank Brandon almost well, and helping me in my work.

July 30.—Nearly all the sailors more or less sick—five new deaths among them. Ship almost unmanageable. In the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Talk of putting into some port. Seventy passengers dead.

August 2.—Worse yet. Disease has spread into the cabin. Three cabin passengers dead. God have mercy upon poor Mrs. Brandon and sweet Edith! All the steerage passengers, with a few exceptions, prostrate. Frank Brandon is weak but helps me. I work night and day. The ship is like a floating pest-house. Forty new deaths since last report.

August 7.—Drifting along, I know not how, up the St. Lawrence. The weather calm, and two or three sailors able to manage the ship. Captain and mate both dead. Ten cabin passengers dead. Three more sailors dead. Only thirty-two steerage passengers dead since last report, but nearly all are sick. Hardly any one to attend to them.

August 10.—Mrs. Brandon and Edith both sick. Frank prostrate again. God in heaven, have mercy!

August 15.—Mrs. Brandon and Edith very low. Frank better.

August 16.—Quarantine Station, Gosse Island. I feel the fever in my veins. If I die, farewell, sweetest sister.

December 28, Halifax, Nova Scotia.—More than four months have elapsed since my last entry, and during the interval marvelous things have occurred. These I will now try to recall as I best can.

My last entry was made on the day of the arrival of the Tecumseh at the Quarantine Station, Gosse Island, Quebec. We were delayed there for two days. Every thing was in confusion. A large number of ships had arrived, and all were filled with sick. The authorities were taken by surprise; and as no arrangements had ever been made for such a state of things the suffering was extreme. The arrival of the Tecumseh with her frightful record of deaths, and with several hundred sick still on board, completed the confusion. At last the passengers were removed somehow. I know not how or when, for I myself on the evening of our arrival was struck down by the fever. I suppose that Frank Brandon may have nursed me at first; but of that I am not sure. There was fearful disorder. There were few nurses and fewer doctors; and as fast as the sick died they were hurried hastily into shallow graves in the sand. I was sick for two or three weeks, and knew nothing of what was going on. The first thing that I saw on coming to my senses was Edith Brandon.

She was fearfully changed. Unutterable grief dwelt upon her sweet young face, which also was pale and wan from the sickness through which she had passed. An awful feeling shot through me. My first question was, "Is your mother on shore?"

She looked at me for a moment in solemn silence, and, slowly raising her hand, pointed upward.

"Your brother?" I gasped.

She turned her head away. I was silent. They were dead, then. O God! and this child—what had she not been suffering? My mind, at once, in its agony of sympathy with her, burst through the clouds which sickness had thrown around it. "Poor child!" I said. "And why are you here?"

"Where else can I go?" she answered, mournfully.

"At least, you should not wear yourself out by my bedside."

"You are the only one left whom I know. I owe you far more than the small attendance which I have given you."

"But will you not take some rest?"

"Hush! Wait till you are stronger. You are too weak now to think of these things."

She laid her thin hand on my forehead gently. I turned my head away, and burst into a flood of tears. Why was it that this child was called upon to endure such agony? Why, in the midst of that agony, did she come to me to save my life?

I did not resist her any longer on that day; but the next day I was stronger, and made her go and repose herself.

For two successive days she came back. On the third day she did not appear. The fourth day also she was absent. Rude nurses attended to me. They knew nothing of her. My anxiety inspired me with such energy that on the fourth day I rose from my bed and staggered about to find her if possible.

All was still confusion. Thousands of sick were on the island. The mistake of the first week had not yet been repaired. No one knew any thing of Edith. I sought her through all the wards. I went to the superintendent, and forced him to make inquiries about her. No one could tell any thing.

My despair was terrible. I forced the superintendent to call up all the nurses and doctors, and question them all, one by one. At last an old Irish woman, with an awful look at me, hinted that she could tell something about her, and whispered a word or two in the superintendent's ear. He started back, with a fearful glance.

"What is it? Tell, in God's name!"

"The dead-house," he murmured.

"Where is it? Take me there!" I cried to the woman. I clutched her arm and staggered after her.

It was a long, low shed, open on all sides. Twelve bodies lay there. In the middle of the row was Edith. She was more beautiful than an angel. A smile wreathed her lips; her eyes looked as though she slumbered. I rushed up to her and caught her in my arms. The next moment I fell senseless.

When I revived I was lying in one of the sick-sheds, with a crowd of sufferers around me. I had only one thought, and that was Edith. I rose at once, weak and trembling, but the resolve of my soul gave strength to my body. An awful fear had taken possession of me, which was accompanied by a certain wild hope. I hurried, with staggering feet, to the dead-house.

All the bodies were gone. New ones had come in.

"Where is she?" I cried to the old woman who had charge there. She knew to whom I referred.

"Buried," said she.

I burst out into a torrent of imprecations. "Where have they buried her? Take me to the place!" I cried, as I flung a piece of gold to the woman. She grasped it eagerly. "Bring a spade, and come quick, for God's sake! She is not dead!"

How did I have such a mad fancy? I will tell you. This ship-fever often terminates in a sort of stupor, in which death generally takes place. Sometimes, however, the patient who has fallen into this stupor revives again. It is known to the physicians as the "trance state." I had seen cases of this at sea. Several times people were thrown overboard when I thought that they did not have all the signs of death, and at last, in two cases of which I had charge, I detained the corpses three days, in spite of the remonstrances of the other passengers. These two revived. By this I knew that some of those who were thrown overboard were not dead. Did I feel horror at this, my Teresina? No. "Pass away," I said, "unhappy ones. You are not dead. You live in a better life than this. What matters it whether you died by the fever or by the sea?"

But when I saw Edith as she lay there my soul felt assured that she was not dead, and an unutterable convulsion of sorrow overwhelmed me. Therefore I fainted. The horror of that situation was too much for me. To think of that angelic girl about to be covered up alive in the ground; to think of that sweet young life, which had begun so brightly, terminating amidst such black darkness!

"Now God help me!" I cried, as I hurried on after the woman; "and bring me there in time." There! Where? To the place of the dead. It was there that I had to seek her.

"How long had she been in that house before I fainted?" I asked, fearfully.

"Twenty-four hours."

"And when did I faint?"

"Yesterday."

A pang shot through me. "Tell me," I cried, hoarsely, "when she was buried."

"Last night."

"O God!" I groaned, and I could say no more; but with new strength given to me in that hour of agony I rushed on.

It was by the eastern shore of the island. A wide flat was there, washed on one side by the river. Here more than a thousand mounds arose. Alas! could I ever hope to find her!

"Do you know where they have laid her?" I asked, tremblingly.

"Yes," said the woman, confidently.

Hope returned faintly. She led the way.

The moon beamed out brightly from behind a cloud, illumining the waste of mounds: The river murmured solemnly along the shore. All my senses were overwhelmed in the madness of that hour. The moon seemed enlarged to the dimensions of a sky; the murmur of the river sounded like a cataract, and in the vast murmur I heard voices which seemed then like the voices of the dead. But the lustre of that exaggerated glow, and the booming concord of fancied spirit-voices were all condemned as trifles. I cared for nothing either natural or supernatural. Only one thought was present—the place where she was laid.

We reached it at last. At the end of a row of graves we stopped. "Here," said the woman, "are twelve graves. These were made last night. These are those twelve which you saw."

"And where—where, O God, is she?"

"There," replied the woman, pointing to one which was the third from the end.

"Do not deceive me!" I cried, imploringly. "Are you sure? For I will tear up all these till I find her."

"I am sure, for I was the one who buried her. I and a man—"

I seized the spade and turned up the soil. I labored incessantly for what seemed an endless period. I had thrown out much earth but had not yet reached her. I felt my fitful strength failing me. My mind, too, seemed entering into a state of delirium. At last my knees gave way, and I sank down just as my spade touched something which gave back a hollow sound.

My knees gave way, and I sank down. But I would not give up. I tore up handfuls of earth and threw them into the air.

"Oh, Edith!" I cried, "I am here! I am coming! I am coming!"

"Come, Sir," said the woman, suddenly, in her strong voice, yet pityingly. "You can do nothing. I will dig her out in a minute."

"God forever bless you!" I cried, leaping out and giving place to her. I watched her as she threw out the earth. Hungrily I gazed, devouring that dark aperture with my eyes till at last the rough boards appeared.

Then I leaped down. I put my fingers at the edge and tore at it till it gave way. The lid was only fastened with a few nails. My bleeding fingers clutched it. It yielded to my frantic exertions.

O my God! was there ever a sight on earth like that which now met my eyes as I raised the lid and looked below? The moon, which was high in the sky, streamed down directly into the narrow cell. It showed me the one whom I sought. Its bright beams threw a lustre round that face which was upturned toward me. Ah me! how white was that face; like the face of some sleeping maiden carved in alabaster. Bathed in the moonbeams it lay before me, all softened and refined and made pure; a face of unearthly beauty. The dark hair caught the moon's rays, and encircled the head like a crown of immortality. Still the eyes were closed as though in slumber; still the lips were fixed into a smile. She lay as one who had fallen into a deep, sweet sleep—as one who in that sleep has dreams, in which are visions of more than earthly beauty, and scenes of more than mortal happiness.

Now it was with me as though at that unequalled vision I had drawn into my inmost being some sudden stimulus—a certain rapture of newborn strength; strength no longer fitful and spasmodic, but firm, well fortified and well sustained.

I took her in my arms and brought her forth from the grave into the life of earth.

Ah me! how light a thing was that frail and slender figure which had been worn down by the unparalleled suffering through which she had passed. This thought transfixed me with a pang of anguish—even as the rapture that I felt at clasping her in my arms.

But now that I had her, where was I to seek for a place of shelter? I turned to the woman and asked: "Is there any secluded place where she may sleep undisturbed till she wakes?"

"No: there is none but what is crowded with the sick and dying in all this island."

"I must have some place."

"There is only one spot that is quiet."

"What one?"

"The dead-house."

I shuddered. "No, not there. See," said I, and I handed her a piece of gold. "Find me some place and you shall have still more."

"Well," she said, hesitatingly, "I have the room where me and my man live. I suppose we could give up that."

"Take me there, then."

"Shall I help you carry her?"

"No," I answered, drawing back my pure Edith from her outstretched hands. "No, I will carry her."

The woman went on without a word. She led the way back to the low and dismal sheds which lay there like a vast charnel-house, and thence to a low hut some distance away from all, where she opened a door. She spoke a few words to a man, who finally withdrew. A light was burning. A rude cot was there. Here I laid the one whom I carried.

"Come here," said I, "three times a day. I will pay you well for this."

The woman left. All night long I watched. She lay unmoved and unchanged. Where was her spirit wandering? Soared it among the splendors of some far-off world? Lingered it amidst the sunshine of heavenly glory? Did her seraphic soul move amidst her peers in the assemblage of the holy? Was she straying amidst the trackless paths of ether with those whom she had loved in life, and who had gone before?

All night long I watched her as she lay with her marble face and her changeless smile. There seemed to be communicated to me an influence from her which opened the eyes of my spiritual sense; and my spirit sought to force itself upon her far-off perceptions, that so it might catch her notice and bring her back to earth.

The morning dawned. There was no change. Mid-day came, and still there was no change. I know not how it was, but the superintendent had heard about the grave being opened, and found me in the hut. He tried to induce me to give back to the grave the one whom I had rescued. The horror of that request was so tremendous that it forced me into passionless calm. When "I heard all while my spirit was away. I know where you found me."

"I am weary," she said, after a silence. Her eyes closed again. But this time the trance was broken. She slept with long, deep breathing, interrupted by frequent sighs. I watched her through the long night. At first fever came. Then it passed. Her sleep became calm, and she slumbered like a weary child.

Early in the morning the superintendent came, followed by a dozen armed men. He entered with a frown. I met him with my hand upraised to hush him, and led him gently to the bedside.

"See," I whispered—"but for me she would have been buried alive!"

The man seemed frozen into dumbness. He stood ghastly white with horror, thick drops started from his forehead, his teeth chattered, he staggered away. He looked at me with a haunted face, such as belongs to one who thinks he has seen a spirit.

"Spare me," he faltered; "do not ruin me. God knows I have tried to do my best!"

I waved him off. "Leave me. You have nothing to fear." He turned away with his white face, and departed in silence with his men.

After a long sleep Edith waked again. She said nothing. I did not wish her to speak. She lay awake, yet with closed eyes, thinking such thoughts as belong to one, and to one alone, who had known what she had known.

I did not speak to her, for she was to me a holy being, not to be addressed lightly. Yet she did not refuse nourishment, and grew stronger, until at last I was able to have her moved to Quebec. There I obtained proper accommodations for her and good nurses.

I have told you what she was before this. Subsequently there came a change. The nurses and the doctors called it a stupor.

There was something in her face which inspired awe among all who saw her. If it is the her sit with tears streaming down her face, tears such as men shed in exile. For she is like a banished man who has only one feeling, a longing, yearning homesickness. She has been once in that radiant world for a time which we call three days in our human calculations, but which to her seems indefinite; for as she once said—and it is a pregnant thought, full of meaning—there is no time there, all is infinite duration. The soul has illimitable powers; in an instant it can live years, and she in those three days had the life of ages. Her former life on earth has now but a faint hold upon her memory in comparison with that life among the stars. The sorrow that her loved ones endured has become eclipsed by the knowledge of the blessedness in which she found them.

Alas! it is a blessing to die, and it is only a curse to rise from the dead. And now she endures this exile with an aching heart, with memories that are irrepressible, with longings unutterable, and yearnings that can not be expressed for that starry world and that bright companionship from which she has been recalled. So she sometimes speaks. And little else can she say amidst her tears. Oh, sublime and mysterious exile, could I but know what you know, and have but a small part of that secret which you can not explain!

For she can not tell what she witnessed there. She sometimes wishes to do so, but can not. When asked directly, she sinks into herself and is lost in thought. She finds no words. It is as when we try to explain to a man who has been always blind the scenes before our eyes. We can not explain them to such a man. And so with her. She finds in her memory things which no human language has been made to express. These languages were made for the earth, not for heaven. In order to tell me what she knows, she would need the language of that world, and then she could not explain it, for I could not understand it.

Only once I saw her smile, and that was when one of the nurses casually mentioned, with horror, the death of some acquaintance. "Death!" she murmured, and her eyes lighted up with a kind of ecstasy. "Oh, that I might die!" She knows no blessing on earth except that which we consider a curse, and to her the object of all her wishes is this one thing—Death. I shall not soon forget that smile. It seemed of itself to give a new meaning to death.

Do I believe this, so wild a theory, the very mention of which has carried me beyond myself? I do not know. All my reason rebels. It scents the monstrous idea. But here she stands before me, with her memories and thoughts, and her wonderful words, few, but full of deepest meaning—words which I shall never forget—and I recognize something before which Reason falters. Whence this deep longing of hers? Why when she thinks of death does her face grow thus radiant, and her eyes kindle with hope? Why does she so pine and grow sick with desire? Why does her heart thus ache as day succeeds to day, and she finds herself still under the sunlight, with the landscapes and the music of this fair earth still around her?

Once, in some speculations of mine, which I think I mentioned to you, Teresina, I thought that if a man could reach that spiritual world he would look with contempt upon the highest charms that belong to this. Here is one who believes that she has gone through this experience, and all this earth, with all its beauty, is now an object of indifference to her. Perhaps you may ask, Is she sane? Yes, dear, as sane as I am, but with a profounder experience and a diviner knowledge.

After I had been in Quebec about a month I learned that one of the regiments stationed here was commanded by Colonel Henry Despard. I called on him, and he received me with unbounded delight. He made me tell him all about myself, and I imparted to him as much of the events of the voyage and quarantine as was advisable. I did not go into particulars to any extent, of course. I mentioned nothing about the grave. That, dearest sister, is a secret between you, and me, and her. For if it should be possible that she should ever be restored to ordinary human sympathy and feeling, it will not be well that all the world should know what has happened to her.

His regiment was ordered to Halifax, and I concluded to comply with his urgent solicitations and accompany him. It is better for her at any rate that there should be more friends than one to protect her. Despard, like the doctors, supposes that she is in a stupor.

The journey here exercised a favorable influence over her. Her strength increased to a marked degree, and she has once or twice spoken about the past. She told me that her father wrote to his son Louis in Australia some weeks before his death, and urged him to come home. She thinks that he is on his way to England. The Colonel and I at once thought that he ought to be sought after without delay, and he promised to write to his nephew, your old playmate, who, he tells me, is to be a neighbor of yours.

If he is still the one whom I remember—intellectual yet spiritual, with sound reason, yet a strong heart, if he is still the Courtenay Despard who, when a boy, seemed to me to look out upon the world before him with such lofty poetic enthusiasm—then, Teresella, you should show him this diary, for it will cause him to understand things which he ought to know. I suppose it would be unintelligible to Mr. Thornton, who is a most estimable man, but who, from the nature of his mind, if he read this, would only conclude that the writer was insane.

At any rate, Mr. Thornton should be informed of the leading facts, so that he may see if something can be done to alleviate the distress, or to avenge the wrongs of one whose father was the earliest benefactor of his family.

"I TOOK HER IN MY ARMS AND BROUGHT HER FORTH FROM THE GRAVE," ETC.

I refused he threatened. At his menace I rejoined in such language that he turned pale.

"Murderer!" said I, sternly, "is it not enough that you have sent to the grave many wretches who were not dead? Do you seek to send back to death this single one whom I have rescued? Do you want all Canada and all the world to ring with the account of the horrors done here, where people are buried alive? See, she is not dead. She is only sleeping. And yet you put her in the grave."

"She is dead!" he cried, in mingled fear and anger—"and she must be buried."

"She is not dead," said I, sternly, as I glared on him out of my intensity of anguish—"she is not dead; and if you try to send her to death again you must first send me. She shall not pass to the grave except over my corpse, and over the corpse of the first murderer that dares to lay hands on her."

He started back—he and those who were with him. "The man is mad," they said.

They left me in peace. I grow excited as I write. My hand trembles. Let me be calm.

She awoke that night. It was midnight, and all was still. She opened her eyes suddenly, and looked full at me with an earnest and steadfast stare. At last a long, deep-drawn sigh broke the stillness of that lone chamber.

"Back again!"—she murmured, in a scarce audible voice—"among men, and to earth. O friends of the Realm of Light, must I be severed from your lofty communion?"

As she spoke thus the anguish which I had felt at the grave was renewed. "You have brought me back," said she, mournfully.

"No," I returned, sadly—"not I. It was not God's will that you should leave this life. He did not send death to you. You were sleeping, and I brought you to this place."

"I know all," she murmured, closing her eyes.

soul of man that gives expression to the features, then her soul must have been familiar with things unknown to us. How often have I seen her in walking across the room stop suddenly and stand fixed on the spot, musing and sad! She commonly moved about as though she saw nothing, as though she walked in a dream, with eyes half closed, and sometimes murmuring inaudible words. The nurses half loved and half feared her. Yet there were some little children in the house who felt all love and no fear, for I have seen her smiling on them with a smile so sweet that it seemed to me as if they stood in the presence of their guardian angel. Strange, sad spirit, what thoughts, what memories are these which make her life one long reverie, and have taken from her all power to enjoy the beautiful that dwells on earth!

She fills all my thoughts with her loneliness, her tears, and my spiritual face, bearing the marks of scenes that can never be forgotten. She lives and moves amidst her recollections. What is it that so overwhelms all her thoughts? That face of hers appears as though it had bathed itself in the atmosphere of some diviner world than this; and her eyes seem as if they may have gazed upon the Infinite Mystery.

Now from the few words which she has casually dropped I gather this to be her own belief. That when she fell into the state of trance her soul was parted from her body, though still by an inexplicable sympathy she was aware of what was passing around her lifeless form. Yet her soul had gone forth into that spiritual world toward which we look from this earth with such eager wonder. It had mingled there with the souls of others. It had put forth new powers, and learned the use of new faculties. Then that soul was called back to its body.

This maiden—this wonder among mortals—is not a mortal, she is an exiled soul. I have seen

THE STORY OF A CHIGNON.

"DYING—is this dying? is this death?"
On her fading brow the close lip-pressure,
On her blue eyes wistful vacanciness,
On her white mouth parted without breath,
Burning tears and sobs that scantily measure
Half the mourner's anguish, answer—"Yes."
Draw the curtain, let the wavering willow
With its shadow fan her lying there;
Let the moonbeam rest upon her pillow,
And the night-wind lift the golden hair.

Only little Bertha, only she—
Whom the Swabian village loved to honor,
She whom two short months should hail a bride,
Cheats the maidens of their revelry,
Breaks a heart whose life-hope hung upon her
For a green grave on the mountain side.
June shall come, but not the festal dances,
Not the wedding on that face so fair,
Not the flower-crown, and the lover's glances
At the glory of the golden hair.

Hushed the hamlet for the funeral day:
Mute the mourners round the cottage portals
Tend the mother in bereavement bowed,
And the loved lost face is hid away,
Farewell-kissed and wreathed with pale immortelles:
Then, unheeded of the reverent crowd,
Steals some hireling for the day's sad burden,
Creeps with felon footfall on the stair,
Lifts the face-cloth, and for paltry guerdon
Robs the dear head of its golden hair.

June is bright beyond the northern sea,
Bright on hill and wood, on lawn and river,
Tower and roof, and echoing city street,
Where the tide of costliest life flows free,
And the proud world's proudest strews forever
Self-like homage under Beauty's feet.
Looms of Lyons lovingly unfold her,
Pearl of Ind and tropic plumage rare,
And the sunlight lingers on her shoulder,
Prisoned in the pride of golden hair.

O'er the city wanes the summer noon—
Just such twilight should have come to soften
Bertha's bridal-feast beneath the vine:
Here our darlings dance to lordlier tune,
No such vision on their hearts as often,
Often, stern and ghastly, saddens mine.
Rich in charm that claims our love as duty,
Earth's most favored, ye might surely spare
Pillered dower of a dead girl's beauty,
Poor pretension of the golden hair.

Leave barbaric warriors such a spoil!
Or each toilette bring my legend o'er you,
Each assumption of the charnel's wreck:
Then nerve all your spirits to the foil
Of the peasant coffined white before you,
Of her death-damp on your warm white neck!
Ah! some night of revelry or pleasure,
While you dream before your mirror there,
What if you should see a wan wild Presence
Come to claim its wealth of golden hair?

GENTLEMEN'S UNDER-CLOTHING.

THERE is no subject connected with the everyday comfort of woman's life on which instruction is so much needed by all of us as that of the under-clothing of our husbands, sons, and brothers. There is scarcely any of our sex who is not responsible in some way for the clothing of some man, and to such particularly I wish to give the best methods of cutting, making, and mending these garments—methods acquired in a long experience.

To begin at the feet. In purchasing winter socks try and buy Shaker hand-knit yarn socks; they are soft and warm, and wear much better than woven ones. They do not fill up the boot as much as those which are thinner and stiffer.

If the heels are lined with thick, slate-colored solecia it will save many stitches. The lining should be cut bias, exactly the shape of the heel. It should be firmly sewed to the back of the heel, and then turned over and sewed on the edge with linen thread or strong sewing-silk. Many persons think that running the heels with double yarn is better, but that takes much more time and is no more of a protection.

For persons who wear very loose boots a heel-guard of chamois-skin is a great saving of the stocking, and is warm, soft, and pleasant to the feet. This guard, made after the accompanying pattern, will be found satisfactory. It should be made larger or smaller, as necessary. a a are straps of elastic that pass over the instep, holding the guard in its place. Care should be taken not to have the elastic too broad or too tight, as in that case it might draw the foot and be uncomfortable.

Some gentlemen wear long stockings; these will last much longer if a piece of cotton tape, or cotton binding that has been shrunk by being scalded, is firmly sewed down the seam at the back of the leg.

While I am speaking on this subject I will add one word as to night-stockings, though they are not peculiar to men. These are for those persons who suffer much with cold feet. They are knit of heavy yarn on wooden pins the size of a small quill, pointed at both ends; they are knit very loosely round and round like an ordinary stocking. Their peculiarity consists in their not having any heel, being merely bags of yarn, which are so loose that they may be easily put on and off, as the necessities of the case demand. They will be found a great comfort to any one who is a sufferer from cold feet at night.

For men's drawers care should be used in the cutting. If cut after the following diagram nearly three quarters of the muslin usually used in the making of a pair of drawers will be saved, and they will wear much longer when thus made.

From this diagram it will be seen that the front side of the leg is laid against the selvage of the muslin, leaving the back side of the leg bias. This is to secure more pliancy where the strain is greatest, as well as to economize the material. The waistband is only to reach three quarters of the way round the waist, and is to be finished across the back with two strong pieces of elastic sewed together, with the fullness of the back of the drawers gathered between them. On the front the waistband is to be set down a little way to the line marked in the pattern. The pieces that come off the side will make the waistband, and the piece that comes off at the top of each leg will make the facing to the front. Any woman will see at a glance that the economy of material is very great, and should she cut garments in this way she will find that they wear much better than those cut after the old fashion. Any drawers pattern can be adapted to this mode of cutting. This diagram is intended for muslin a yard wide.

In the matter of under-shirts, most gentlemen prefer those which are woven, and here the old proverb that "a stitch in time saves nine" comes in play. Before they are worn, if a gore of muslin or linen is securely sewed on each side of the neck, where under-shirts first begin to split down, it will be found a great saving of time and trouble.

Should a man prefer an under-shirt made of flannel, it will be best to shrink the flannel thoroughly before cutting out the garment. This is most readily done by putting the flannel into a kettle of cold water, setting it on the fire, tightly covered, and allowing the water to come to a boil, then remove the kettle from the fire and allow it to stand until the water is cold, when the flannel can be hung out to dry.

After this process, which does not harm the appearance of the fabric, it will be found that the garment will not shrink.

With regard to shirts, so many men prefer to buy their shirts outright that it is hardly necessary to write any thing about them. Yet to those people who still retain an old-fashioned desire to make shirts I may suggest a few useful hints. In cutting a shirt the first thing is to procure a good pattern. The fit of a shirt is as important to the comfort of the wearer as the fit of a dress. A good pattern, cut by measurement, may be procured at any of the shops where shirts are made for a sum that seems trifling compared with the comfort of having a garment wear well.

In cutting out the garment make the front in two pieces, the upper half consisting of the bosom and side pieces, and the lower half of the flap. This will save the length of the bosom in the muslin of every shirt. They are to be joined together with a strip of cotton going, as may be seen in the diagram, the whole distance across the front.

UPPER HALF OF FRONT.

LOWER HALF OF FRONT.

APPEARANCE WHEN FINISHED.

The sleeves of a shirt should be made on the same principle as the legs of the drawers, with the bias seam coming under the elbow, which will give more to the bending of the arm. Shirts that are made to open behind are much better for the use of almost every man, as in that case the gaping of the front is avoided, and, besides, the shirt can be ironed better. If the bosom be lined with muslin, it is less likely to split open, and, should it split, can be more easily mended.

All shirts should be repaired before they are washed, as after they are starched nothing can be done with them without tumbling them very much.

When buttons are sewed on any thing that is to be starched, if a small piece of muslin is folded two or three times and sewed on with the button, and then all that protrudes cut away, it will add much to their strength.

It is best, however, on shirts to do away with buttons, and use only studs—gold or silver, if you have them; but if not, those of bone, and which cost about the same as buttons, are very useful. All these experiments have been tried and found perfect of their kind, and I shall feel very glad if they are of use to any of my hard-worked sisters.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, November 19, 1867.

Ed. Harper's Bazar:

Now that the Great Exposition is over, and the strangers have left Paris, the Parisians describe themselves as feeling like a man who awakes from fantastic dreams the day after a scene of dissipation. He rubs his eyes, turns over, but is unable to sleep again, and sits up to look into the glass, to see if he appears as haggard as he feels. The buildings on the Champ de Mars are rapidly falling to pieces under the hammers of the workmen. The special conveyances which crowded the streets have disappeared. The long "run" of old pieces at the theatres is at an end. High prices in the shops and hotels are reduced. In short, Paris is readjusting itself to the tastes and requirements of the Parisians.

The city is none the less interesting to a quiet and observing spectator for this change. And those who have been here during the past or previous seasons, as well as those who cross the ocean only on paper, and visit foreign scenes by proxy, through the narratives of others, may be interested in some every-day scenes of common life in this great capital, which has so lately been the theatre of the most imposing display.

Let us begin at the beginning, that is to say, with a wedding.

The other day, as I was sauntering with my companions along the streets upon the left bank of the Seine, past the famous old church of St. Germain-des-Près, I was struck by the fact that the inner door of the church was closed, although I had previously always found it open. Now the shutting of a door which is customarily open is a sort of challenge to one's curiosity. So we looked about us, and saw that in the porch stood a man clothed in black, with a silver-tipped wand in his hand, and a massive silver chain hung about his neck; and in the adjoining square, a little removed from the church-door, was the head of a long file of carriages. The man in black suffered us to enter the door without objection, and we saw that we had happened upon a modest Parisian church-wedding. Evidently the silver chain worn by the vergier might be taken, for the time, to symbolize the bond of the marriage vow, and the little black wand the moderate but actual authority vested in the husband thereby. As the nave was filled with a numerous assemblage of the friends, we walked up one of the side aisles to the transept, where we were opposite the bride and bridegroom, and stood there, outside the rail, in a little group of chance spectators or humbler friends of the bridal party, old women and nurses in their white caps, and one or two workmen and boys in their blue blouses.

The bride and groom sat in velvet-covered chairs, in the front rank of the congregation. Before each was a velvet kneeling-chair or prie-Dieu. The ample white veil which covered the bride and her chair was solicitously arranged from time to time by her mother, who sat at her left. At each side of the bridal party, upon the marble floor which intervened between them and the steps of the altar, stood two decorated beaules in their cocked-hats. Whenever the bride and groom were required to step forward two vergiers in black, with silver chains, advanced, and pointed out with their wands the spot where each was to stand. Whenever the assembly were to rise, or to kneel, or any significant step in the progress of the ceremony was accomplished, the beaules simultaneously raised their heavy staves and struck a loud blow on the stone floor.

The reading of the service was inaudible at the moderate distance at which we stood. The bride, with her prayer-book in her hand, knelt and rose, sometimes alone, and sometimes with the bridegroom. The priest came down the steps with a golden plate, and the bride and groom went forward, each bearing a tall lighted candle handed them by the vergiers, and received the sacrament. The candles used for such purposes are about six feet high, elegantly moulded at the lower end, and prepared with a satin wrapping for the hand. When the bride and groom had resumed their seats and bowed their heads the groomsmen held over them a large canopy of white satin embroidered with silver; while a bridesmaid, led by a groomsmen, went about among the congregation, one of the beaules preceding them to clear the way, and took up the usual contribution, which she afterward carried to the sacristy.

When the ceremony at the altar was concluded the party retired to a room adjoining, where the proper record of the act was made, and congratulations were given.

The great event of yesterday in Paris was the address of the Emperor to the Legislature upon the first meeting of the session. The occurrence of such events as this is not previously notified to the public by the daily press here to such an extent as is usual in the United States, where the newspapers of the morning inform or remind us of much that is going to happen to-day, as well as of what did happen yesterday. But rumors run so quickly through sociable Paris that newspaper paragraphs are less necessary. Every body is informed as if by magic. The Parisian says: "The Emperor is going to open the session of the Corps Legislatif to-day, with an address at the Louvre. The morning journal does not mention it; but every body says so, and the streets are full of people going to the Palace to see him."

The streets and the quai opposite the Louvre were lined with the equipages of the legislators; and a great crowd of the curious sauntered around, gazing at the various liveries of scarlet, crimson, white, or yellow, in which the coachmen and footmen were attired. But the principal scene of attraction was the Place du Carrousel, for through this the Emperor was to pass. A large number of troops were drawn up so as to form a broad avenue, completely guarded by bayonets on each side, reaching from the great door of the Tuileries, at one end of this vast esplanade, to that of the Louvre at the other; and through this avenue, at one o'clock, the imperial carriages moved, to the sound of drums and trumpets, and escorted by some score of mounted guardsmen. First a few of these horsemen led the way, followed by several richly-decorated coaches, the foremost of which was occupied by the Empress. After a few moments' pause the coach of the Emperor followed, with a compact body of horsemen both before and after it. He bowed from the carriage window on either hand to the great crowd of spectators who thronged the place; and a number of them, in turn, cheered, and here and there a hat was waved.

Two hours afterward the news-women in the streets were crying, "The discourse of his Majesty the Emperor."

A GREAT MANY RAINBOWS.

IT is a curious fact that no two persons ever see the same rainbow. The rays of the sun are refracted and reflected alike by every drop of falling rain on which they shine, and it is only those which lie in a particular range and direction from the eye that throw the reflections and refractions upon it in such a manner as to produce the prismatic colors on the retina.

Of course for every different position of the eye there is a different set of drops in the cloud to analyze the light for it, or, in other words, a different rainbow.

Any one can convince himself by experiment, or rather by observation, that this is true. We have only to walk along a little way toward the south, or toward the north, when looking at a rainbow in the east, and observe how it will keep pace with us in our motion—the extremities of it passing along the various objects seen in the horizon, so as to be always opposite to us as we advance or recede.

Or, two persons standing at a little distance apart can report to each other at what tree, or by what chimney, or other object, the terminations of the arch come down, as seen by each respectively.

It results from this that if a hundred persons were looking at a dark cloud in the east when the setting sun was shining upon it, all admiring the beauty of what they would call "the rainbow," it would really be a hundred rainbows that they were looking at instead of one. No one would see either of the rainbows that the other ninety-nine were admiring.

And yet, on second thoughts, it is perhaps not so certain that it may not be, philosophically speaking, the same rainbow after all. It depends upon the very nice and difficult metaphysical question: What properly constitutes the identity of a rainbow? This question I shall not attempt to solve, but shall leave it for the consideration of the reader.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

KITTY AND THE PIN-CUSHION.

"Good-morning, Alice!"

Arthur was just going out of the yard as he said this. He had a long fishing-pole over his shoulder, and a queer-looking basket fastened by a belt to his waist.

"Oh! I want to go a-fishing with Arthur," said Alice.

"It is too far for Alice to go down to the river," said Aunt Mary.

"Arthur!" shouted Alice, at the top of her voice, "will you catch a fish for me?"

"Yes," said Arthur, turning around and shouting back; "be a good little girl, and brother will catch you a pretty little fish."

But Alice still stood on the door-step, mournfully watching Arthur.

"Auntie, when I am a big young lady can I go down to the river with Arthur and catch fishes?"

Aunt Mary laughed. "Yes, I think so, if you should want to then. But now come and let us see what we can find to do. Shall we go into the shed and swing, or shall I tell you a story?"

"Swing me, and tell me a story, Auntie!"

"What, both?"

"Yes," replied Alice, laughing, and dancing toward the shed.

Aunt Mary followed. There were two swings in the shed, side by side. One was a good deal lower than the other. Aunt Mary lifted Alice into the low swing, and seated herself in the other. The two swings were so near together that she could reach out her hand and push Alice gently to and fro while she was swinging herself.

Alice sat silently enjoying the gentle motion for a few moments, and then said:

"Please, tell me a story, Auntie!"

So Aunt Mary began.

"I will tell you a little more about my mischievous black-and-white kitten. She was very fond of going into Grandmamma's room, and knocking down any spool of thread that she could find on the work-table, and rolling it about the floor. Often Grandmamma would find her thread all twisted around the legs of a chair, and the spool under the bed. So she was obliged to be very careful, and keep her things where Kitty could not find them."

"One day Grandmamma was going out to take a ride. She went into her room to put on her bonnet and shawl. And she said to herself, 'I will be sure to shut my door, and then Kitty can not get in to do any mischief.' When she was ready she went out, and shut the door after her. She did not know that Kitty was hidden under the bed."

"Was Kitty under the bed?" asked Alice.

"Yes, she was under the bed. She had slyly followed Grandmamma into the room, and whisked away under the bed. When Kitty heard Grandmamma go out, she peeped out from her hiding-place to see if any one else was in the room. She could not see any one. So she came out, and thought she would have a grand time to play all by herself. First she jumped upon the table by the window, and looked out into the yard. Cats like to look out of the window."

"What did Kitty see, Auntie?" said Alice.

"She saw a little bird hopping about on the fence. And she said to herself, 'If I was only out there I would catch that bird. But I can not get out for the door is shut.' So Kitty jumped down from the table, and looked around to find something to amuse herself with. Presently she spied a round looking thing upon the mantle-piece."

"I wonder what that is?" said Kitty to herself. "It looks like a ball, and I'll knock it down, and roll it around the room."

"So Kitty jumped as high as she could to reach the round thing on the mantle-piece. But she could not reach it. It was too high."

"Oh!" said she to herself, "here is a chair. I will jump on the chair first, and then I can reach the ball!"

"So Kitty jumped into the chair, and then upon the mantle-piece, and with her paw she gave the round-looking thing a push, and down it went rolling on the floor. Kitty sprang after it, but she found it was not a ball."

"What was it?" asked Alice.

"It was Grandmamma's pin-cushion, full of pins and needles. Kitty knocked it with her paws to make it roll on the floor. But it would not roll very well, and the pins and needles hurt her paws. Kitty looked at the pin-cushion carefully, to see what it was that hurt her paws. She saw the pins and needles."

"I'll pull these things out," she said to herself, "and then I can knock the ball around without hurting my paws."

"So she began to try to get the pins and needles out. It was not easy for Kitty to get them out. She tried to pick them out with her paws. But they did not come out well. So she took hold of the cushion with her two front paws, and with her sharp little teeth began carefully to pick out the pins and needles, and to drop them on the floor."

"Oh!" exclaimed Alice.

"Kitty had pulled almost all of the pins and needles out of the cushion when the door opened, and Grandmamma came in. Kitty was so busy that she did not notice that any one had come in until Grandmamma, seeing what she was about, exclaimed:

"Why, Kitty!"

"Kitty started, dropped the pin-cushion, and scampered out of the room."

"What did Grandmamma do?" asked Alice.

"Oh! she picked up the pins and needles and put them in the cushion, and—"

"Why, here comes Arthur!" interrupted Alice, getting out of the swing hastily. "I am going to see if he has got my fish."

And away she ran.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lots at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to us.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

THE MAID OF THE JUNIATA,

From the pen of America's gifted Romancer,

EMERSON BENNETT,

Commenced in

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,

No. 6—Now Ready.

SOL SLOCUM;

OR,

THE MAID OF THE JUNIATA,

BY

EMERSON BENNETT,

Is the greatest product of his transcendently great pen. It is a tale of the great border, and the characters which figure in it are as various as the many scenes through which they have to pass. One after another are introduced the hardy pioneer, the cunning trapper, the wily savage, the eccentric seeker after adventure, the tender maiden, severed by the force of circumstances from friends and kindred, the heroic and daring youth whose aspirations are lofty, whose soul is fearless, and whose deeds are daring, together with a miscellaneous crowd of adventurous spirits presenting almost every phase of human character, each of whom plays his or her part in the thrilling drama. The story is replete with scenes and incidents which cause the blood of the reader to leap with electric force; and constantly alternating between joy and sorrow, tears and laughter, indignation and admiration, he suffers and rejoices with the characters, absolutely seeming to act with them, so intensely is he interested—so deeply is he spell-bound. The story never flags from the beginning to the end, and the love portions of it are especially beautiful, and such as to enlist the sympathies of every lady reader. This great story is commenced in No. 6 of the present volume, and those who desire to read it should send in their orders. Once more we say, buy the

"A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

The Publishers have just commenced the issue of HARPER'S BAZAR, a Weekly Illustrated Family Journal, devoted to Fashion and Home Literature. Their aim is twofold: to supply the existing need of a Weekly Fashion Newspaper, and to combine therewith a first-class literary journal, which will be indispensable to every household.

It is the first Weekly Journal of Fashion ever published in the United States. The Publishers have made arrangements, at great cost, with the most celebrated of the Fashion Papers of Europe, especially with the famous Bazar of Berlin, which supplies the fashions to the leading journals of Paris, to furnish the same to them in advance, so that henceforth the fashions will appear in HARPER'S BAZAR simultaneously with their publication in Paris and Berlin—an advantage enjoyed by no other journal in the country.

The patrons of HARPER'S BAZAR will receive every fortnight large pattern-plates, containing from forty to fifty full-sized patterns of ladies', misses', and children's bonnets, cloaks, dresses, under-clothing, and other articles, accompanied with the necessary descriptions and directions, and occasionally an elegant colored fashion plate.

HARPER'S BAZAR, besides being the leading Fashion Journal in this country, will also aim to present before its readers the very best specimens of Household Literature. It will contain original and selected Serial Stories, Poetry, Novels, Articles on the Topics of the Day (excluding Politics), on Books, Art, Morals, Familiar Science, Education, Amusements, Hygiene, Etiquette, Housekeeping, Gardening, with Home and Foreign Gossip. No subject of household interest will be excluded from its columns.

HARPER'S BAZAR will contain 16 folio pages, of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superfine calendered paper, and will be published weekly.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the World."

HARPER'S New MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

We can account for its success only by the simple fact that it meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructive variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A Complete Pictorial History of the Times."

"The best, cheapest, and most successful Family Paper in the Union."

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
SPLENDIDLY ILLUSTRATED.

The MODEL NEWSPAPER of our country—complete in all the departments of an American Family Paper—HARPER'S WEEKLY has earned for itself a right to its title, "A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION."—New York Evening Post.

This Paper furnishes the best illustrations. Our future historians will enrich themselves out of HARPER'S WEEKLY long after writers, and printers, and publishers are turned to dust.—New York Evangelist.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY from week to week form a remarkable series of brief political essays. They are distinguished by clear and pointed statements, by good common sense, by independence and breadth of view. They are the expression of mature conviction, high principle, and strong feeling, and take their place among the best newspaper writing of the time.—North American Review, Boston, Mass.

SUBSCRIPTIONS.

1868.

The Publishers have perfected a system of mailing by which they can supply the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR promptly to those who prefer to receive their periodicals directly from the Office of Publication. Postmasters and others desirous of getting up Clubs will be supplied with a Show-Bill on application.

The postage on HARPER'S WEEKLY is 20 cents a year, on the BAZAR 20 cents, and on the MAGAZINE 24 cents, which must be paid at the subscriber's post-office.

The latest novelty in millinerdom in San Francisco is reported to be a paper bonnet. We trust the fashion will not reach New York, as the bonnet-makers would no doubt insist on using bank-notes for the article.

HAND-BOOK TO THE LIBERTIES OF FRANCE.

As many of our countrymen are in the habit of visiting Paris, and particularly France generally, and taking up their residence there for some time, we think it right to publish a few useful hints as to their conduct in that land of liberty, where universal suffrage, that panacea for all human ills, is enjoyed, in order that they may not unintentionally offend the prejudice of the governing powers:

Be careful to ascertain from the Minister of Police that your hotel-keeper or landlord is thoroughly loyal to the present dynasty, and never incurred the displeasure of the police. You will then find it a pleasure and not a hardship to pay the eccentric charges he may demand of you.

Before going to rest ascertain as accurately as possible on which side of the bed the Government prefers that you should get out in the morning.

A MISCHIEF-MAKER.

1. Jones, poor fellow! doesn't mean to, but he always is making mischief. Remark only the other day to his landlady's daughter that he did so admire red hair! Found out afterward that she considered hers golden.

2. Saw his fellow-boarder drop this, and supposed, of course, he wanted it again.

3. "All young ladies like pets, Miss; let me make you a present." How was he to know she had such an antipathy to the animal Cat that she fainted at the touch of one?

4. Tries to make it up by admiring the young lady's drawing: "That cow is drawn beautifully!" Alas! it was a pig.

5. "You'd better not go in, Sir. I just heard a kiss." "A kiss!—the d—! she's my wife!" Now how was Jones to know that?

6. Again, when he handed Mrs. P. her muff, how was he to know she'd been out marketing?

"THE HAPPY PAIR THEN LEFT TOWN—"

AMELIA (who flatters herself they are taken for quite an Old Married Couple).—"Tell me, George, do you like Green Tea, or Black?" [The Waiter winks, the Chambermaid chuckles.]

Before leaving your apartments, or holding any converse with any body, read the Moniteur carefully through, committing to memory, if you can, the political articles, so that you may be able to regulate your conversation with a due regard to the delicate sensibilities of H. I. M.'s Government.

Whenever any one alludes, in your presence, to any other country than France, or to any other political constitution than that of France, be careful to say: "There is no country at once so free, so happy, so prosperous, and so powerful as France, under His present Imperial Majesty;" or, "There is no constitution at once so fatherly, so liberal, so perfect as the constitution of France under H. I. M. Napoleon the Third."

Before going to bed every night devote at least half an hour to a rigorous and impartial self-examination, and if you shall find, after searching your heart diligently, that you have nourished any thought, or spoken any word against H. I. M. Napoleon III. and his Government, clothe yourself in deep mourning, and go to the Minister of Police, or some other fit and proper person, and confess your fault humbly, and ask forgiveness. So will you be able to sleep with a clear conscience, and the secret police will be able to say nothing against you.

Always kneel and uncover your head when you meet any of the gens d'armes, or of the police, or any other official.

By carefully and conscientiously observing these rules you may live in perfect unshackled freedom of thought and action under the blessed Government of H. I. M. Napoleon III.

One of our Philadelphia brethren has made us the subject of a conundrum, which we set our readers to guess:

"Why is Harper's Bazar like a dinner-table?—Because it is adorned with plates."

BACKING OUT PROFESSIONALLY.—A Vienna actress, deciding to break a marriage engagement at the very last moment, sent the professional excuse, "Fräulein Galmeyer is unfortunately hoarse, and can not attend the ceremony."

An LL.D. of one of the "fresh-water colleges" recently told a graduating class that the eyes of the vox populi were on them.

Tomkins says he never lends an umbrella—if it's a cotton one his friends are guilty of flaxity of morals as regards meum and tuum—if it's a silk one they seem to think it's (silk)-convenient to return it—and as for gingham umbrellas he declares no one ever gives a thought to bringing 'em home again.

Why would the Prince of Wales, had he been at a public school, have been the most thoroughly whipped boy there?—He would be wales from head to foot.

At a negro ball, in lieu of "Not transferable" on the tickets, a notice was posted over the door, "No gentleman admitted unless he comes hisself."

When a young gentleman in Canada wishes to pay attention to a young lady he usually, if it be winter, undertakes to kill her with kindness—by taking her out and sleighing her.

The Montreal Gazette says that the body of a woman was "recovered alive."

In my lonely room I've seen her, when the fire was burning bright,
And the moderator struggled with the blackness of the night;
I have seen her in the morning when the milkmen all arose,
And her image metaphorically trod upon my toes.

She is black and she is creeping; she has soft and silent ways;
But my landlady insists on it, so in my room she stays:
I have somehow grown to like her, and I think she likes me too,
But I wish she wouldn't indicate affection by a mew.

She is corpulent and tabby; I have often noticed that.
To think that I should waste my young affections on a cat!
I have done so; I admire her; and I think she's very nice;
And she finds extreme enjoyment in the massacre of mice.

Mice are my abomination: haply, if it were not so, I should not esteem my feline friend; it may be—I don't know.
At the present time I like her, and her presence gladness sheds,
Which it will do till she takes to caterwauling on the leads.

A Frenchman, being about to remove his shop, his landlord inquired the reason, stating at the same time that it was considered a very good stand for business. The Frenchman replied, "Oh yes, he's very good stand for de business—by gar, me stand all day, for nobody come to make me move."

BY THE LATE COUNT D'(H)ORSAY.

A banquet of horse-flesh! give, give to me;
Give those who prefer it roast beef:
Such succulent food as a course from a courser
To the palate is quite a relief.

You talk of the pig, and descant on the sheep;
Not one is deserving a button:
My favorite horse has a saddle much finer
Than was ever your saddle of mutton.

Such food was sent mankind to cheer up,
And at dinner create a horse-laugh;
That food is fittest which feeds upon fun,
For a horse is the essence of chaff!

Great Apollo, the Muses have likewise a steed—
Not for eating, as we are inclined:
Sleek Pegasus is a very similar thing;
He furnishes food for the mind.

So bring out your cattle, and I will bring mine,
For any wager I'm willing to take;
Let the bets which we make on the table be laid,
And I'll warrant I take off your stake.

When does an old cab-horse show more pluck than other horses?—When he "dies with harness on his back."

THE EVENING PAPERS—Curl papers.

Those two observing men, one of whom said he had always noticed that when he lived through the month of May he always lived through the year, and the other of whom said at a wedding he remarked that more women than men had been married that year, were neither of them Irishmen.

Affected young lady, seated in a rocking-chair, reading the Bible, exclaims, "Mother, here is a grammatical error in the Bible!" Mother, lowering her specks, and approaching the reader in a very scrutinizing attitude, says, "Kill it! kill it! It's the very thing that has been eating the leaves and book-marks."

An Illinois editor, all of whose memories are associated with the war, says he does not know what Fitz-Greene Halleck could do as a poet, but that he was a very bad general.

"I wonder what causes my eyes to be so weak?" said a fop to a gentleman. "They are in a weak place," replied the latter.

A lady who had two children sick with measles wrote to a friend for the best remedy. The friend had just received a note from another lady inquiring the way to pickle cucumbers. In the confusion the lady who inquired about the pickles received the remedy for the measles, and the anxious mother of the sick children with horror read the following: "Scald them three or four times in very hot vinegar, and sprinkle them with salt, and in a very few days they will be cured."

Fig. 1.—Home Dress of brown gros grain, trimmed with three brown satin flounces, cut in points; the pleats of these folds are made over the interval that separates each point, so that the latter is always flat and covered with a fold on each side. A large rouleau of satin forms the heading of the upper flounce, and is surmounted in turn with a row of small points, turned upward. Waist high-necked, with close sleeves, trimmed with satin rouleaux and points. Belt with rounding lappets, trimmed also with small satin points.

Fig. 2.—Evening Dress of yellow satin, with two white lace flounces in front. Trained over-skirt, open in front, of yellow silk tissue, edged with a puffing ornamented with a border of brown foliage. Low-necked waist, trimmed to match the dress. Greek white lace sleeves. Gold bandeau in the hair.

A CUP OF TEA.

THERE are at least five hundred millions of people, or more than one half of all the inhabitants of the earth, who are in the daily habit of drinking tea. About fifty-five millions of pounds, or forty-four thousand tons, of this herb are supposed to be annually consumed in Great Britain alone, and three and a half millions of acres of land in China, with a yearly product of one million of tons, are kept in constant and active culture with the growth of the tea-plant. The islands of Japan, Corea, Assam, and Java also contribute more or less toward the world's demand for this favorite production.

Two hundred and fifty years ago there was not a single cup of tea drank in all Europe, and as late as 1664 the English East India Company could think of no more rare and valuable present to give a queen of England than a couple of pounds of this Chinese herb. That tough old virgin Queen Elizabeth, as is well known, indulged in all her gossip and tittle-tattle with her maids over pots of beer, which we may presume gave a seriousness to their scandal unknown to modern tea-tables. Inspired by her potent "home-brewed," that royal old maid vented her malice in chopping off the heads of her rivals and faithless suitors. Under the more gentle influence of that beverage "which cheers but not inebriates," our tea-drinking dames are contented with brandishing "air-drawn" daggers, and exercising the bloodless cruelty of stabbing reputations.

The millions who have taken to tea with the avidity of an instinct have no reason to regret it. Experience has proved, and science confirms, that it is a most healthful beverage. "Drink it," say the Chinese, "and the animal spirits will be lively and clear." A gentle stimulant of the nervous system, it removes the sense of fatigue after mental and bodily exertion, and renews the vigor of the faculties for future effort. The chemists have discovered in tea a constituent which they call theine. With this they have diligently experimented, and found that it has the peculiar effect of arresting the waste or decay which is constantly going on in every living body. To compensate for this decay or waste food is taken, and thus life is sustained. If by any means the former be diminished, the quantity of the latter may be also. Theine has just this effect of lessening the waste of the body, and those who take it have in consequence a less necessity for food.

The cup of tea therefore merits, according to science, all the vulgar reputation it has earned in course of the long and extended experience of its services. It is not only an innocent and refreshing beverage for all, but a most effective medicine for the sick, the weak, and the old; the tastes and stomachs of these refusing food, or being incapable of digesting it, the cup of tea, always grateful, comes with its potent element, theine, to stop that waste of the body which would be otherwise inevitable. The system is thus sustained in its integrity with a vigor more capable of resisting disease and death.

Every dame, young or old, considers it almost an impertinence to doubt her skill in tea-making; and yet it is seldom that grave mistakes are not made in the course of this simple process. We need not insist, we suppose, upon the necessity of using boiling water, but notwithstanding, from the frequent neglect of first heating the tea-pot, it is very seldom that this is used. If water raised to 212°, its boiling point, is poured into a cold vessel, it falls immediately to several degrees below, and of course will not be hot enough to extract from the tea the desired qualities. Don't forget then, ladies, to pour some boiling water in your tea-pot, and to empty it out before you use it.

There is a habit more or less prevalent of letting the tea, when once infused, "stand" too long. The practice of having the tea made in the kitchen by the servants, instead of by the mistress in the parlor, is sure to lead to this result. There are two bad effects which ensue from a lengthened infusion. First, the volatile oil, which gives aroma to the beverage and adds greatly to its taste, escapes; and, second, the tannin—a bitter astringent and constipating element—which all tea contains, is extracted, rendering the drink not only disagreeable but unwholesome.

Our tea-drinkers are wise in preferring black to green teas. Though their color is not produced, as is generally thought, by the process of drying them on copper pans, but by the quick roasting to which they are immediately exposed on being plucked, the latter have too stimulating an action upon the nervous system to be freely used.

As a general thing excessively cheap teas should be avoided, or care taken to buy them only of the most honest dealers. There is a kind of this product known in China as Lie tea—a very appropriate name for a fictitious thing—which consists of the dust and sweepings of the native warehouses stuck together with rice-water, and broken up and colored with Prussian-blue and indigo so as to represent the various genuine green and black teas, and for which it is sold in European markets.

When, gentle dames, you first, as Mrs. Glass advises, catch your hare—obtain good tea, and prepare it, as we have recommended, you may indulge in it not only without fear of its doing you harm, but with the certainty of its affording you much benefit as well as comfort. You must be moderate, however, and neither drink it too strong nor too long. The Chinese, whose experience of the beverage dates as far back as the year 600, say, "If drank too freely it will produce exhaustion and lassitude." Children, however, who seldom require it except in illness, had better abstain from the cup of tea; for the theine which it contains, and which is so beneficial to the infirm and old in arresting the waste of the system, and acting as a substitute for food, must be injurious to the young by interfering with the processes of nutrition and excretion so essential to their growth.

The fashion which has been adopted by English dames, and imitated by a few of their slavish followers in this country lately, of drinking before dinner a cup of tea flavored with a dash of some liqueur or other, as an appetizer, is not only misuse, but a dangerous perversion of a good thing, and can not be condemned too strongly.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Young Missionary.

MY DEAR HOWARD,—I have been having a very pleasant correspondence with many of my young friends who are traveling upon the road of life, and we have discoursed of manners in general, giving the word a very generous interpretation. In fact, by manners I understand conduct in the largest sense, and by the road, as you would have seen if your engagements had permitted you to read what I have written, I mean simply the World, or life. The phrase Manners upon the Road becomes, therefore, merely a paraphrase of Conduct in Life; from politeness in a street-car to the whole duty of man in society. Thus it is that subjects expand; and we can see, my dear Howard, how very easy it was for the old Puritan divines, whose names are so precious to you, to unfold from the briefest "Scripture" a body of doctrine and a scheme of improvement that extended to seventeenthly, and consumed many more than sixty minutes in the delivery.

So you are to be a missionary! I remember my nephew used to show me in his college catalogue a list of his fellow-students who all bore the same Christian name. There were Adoniram Judson Judd, and Adoniram Judson Jones, and Adoniram Judson Jenkins, and Adoniram Judson Johnson, and so on, until my nephew's enraged curiosity could hardly wait to learn who Adoniram Judson was. I kept him calm, however, and told him that Judson was a very famous missionary, and the husband of many wives. "Good Heavens! a kind of Brigham Young? Was he a Mormon?" demanded my excited nephew. "Not at all, my boy," I replied with tranquillity; "he had them successively, not contemporaneously." You have read, I do not doubt, my dear Howard, the biography of the good man, written by another good and noble man, Dr. Wayland. But after all, I have often asked myself, and now I ask you, how it is that a man who has made himself in the least familiar with the heathen of the city of New York, their utter ignorance, immorality, squalor, and apparent spiritual death, can ever feel called across the sea to preach the gospel to the pagans of Siam or of Cochin China?

Did you ever read any account whatever of the most successful foreign missionary effort that did not make you sad, not for the noble self-sacrifice of the missionaries, but for the small actual results? Look into the masterly and fascinating history, by Francis Parkman, of the Jesuit missions among the Canadian Indians, and what a spectacle it is! Heroism beyond comparison, and with what result of the kind intended? What Christian savage was there who was not a savage Christian—that is to say, no Christian at all? Canada, Africa, Burmah—why, my dear Howard, what are you thinking of? Here you are, with a high sense of Christian devotion, painfully packing up your trunk to go to them. Here is Aunt Doreas, from the country, dear old saint that she is, come down to comfort you, and to see that your stockings are heeled, and that you have a "housewife" prepared to sew on your own buttons in the "ultimate dim Thule" to which you are going. And you are pale and paler every day, you good, mistaken fellow, and somebody else, who shall be nameless, is paler than you, day by day, and some horribly bright morning there will be a prayer made, and a psalm sung, and a farewell sermon preached, all so tearful and so sad and solemn as if a funeral were being rehearsed; and high over the shrill "yeave-ho!" of the sailors as the ship drops down the harbor will be the tragical refrain of the hymn at parting; and so, dear boy, bewept, bewailed, besung, bepreached, and beprayed, you will go into the purple distance, over the horizon, and far away, to the Cannibal Islands.

Now, my advice to you, as a serious Christian man, is precisely that of Punch to those about to marry—"don't!" You wish my advice about your manners upon the road; in other words, as to the proper behavior of a young and earnest man who feels called to missionary labor; and I say to you, in all soberness, that Burmah, and Siam, and the country of the Bushmen, and the regions around the sources of the Nile, are between you and the East River, in New York. They are in the Fifth Ward. Their natives are moving up and down Broadway. The dwellers in the interior of Abyssinia, the remote subjects of the Emperor Theodore, need your ministry less, and will reward it a hundredfold less, than the savages who haunt New York and hide in its slums. So let some one, who shall be nameless, dry her eyes; let that funereal psalm of farewell, drawled out in the minor key, stop short. Don't go over the horizon—go across the street. Look along Cherry Street, and let Crim Tartary and Sumatra fade out of your morbid imagination.

No, my good friend, it seems to me that your duty upon the great road of life is plainly here; and you should do it, not officially, not perfunctorily, but simply and sensibly. Here are the pagans all around us. Here are the children who know nothing but how to steal, and who care for nothing but to steal without exposure. Do you think that the Artful Dodger died childless, or that Fagin had no grandchildren? Now, then, mind your manners, to begin with. It is a missionary work—and of the highest kind—but, if I may say so, do it as a man, not as a missionary. Don't wear a livery. Don't make yourself conspicuous by your dress. Don't drawl, nor whine, nor talk through your nose. Don't be sanctimonious. Don't attract attention to your personality by any thing but quiet neatness. That of itself is eloquence. Don't be official, as if you had some tremendous "message," and were graciously condescending to deliver it to a herd of worthless reprobates. You can do nothing without confidence; but you can not have confidence without sympathy, and sympathy is not given to any thing but the truest sympathy. When the Archbishop of Canterbury goes in his great wig and his ruffles and puffs to preach in a lofty way at a ragged school, or to the midnight mission, what do you suppose the poor people think? I have no doubt they think, "What a queer old cove!" My dear Howard, the first rule of your manners upon this road should be to dispense with every kind of ruffle and puff, and then you will travel close into the young pagan hearts with which you are to deal.

And your second rule should be to do as you would be done by. If you were a poor little New York pagan living by your naughty wits, kicked and starved, and growing up to be a criminal, what would you want first of all? Something to eat, and a fire to warm yourself by in the winter. Don't preach to an empty stomach. Don't tell a starving, shivering child who has lived in a den of misery all his life that his soul will go to destruction if he tells lies. He will tell anything for a plate of nice soup, and he will pick your pocket for a comfortable fire. Your missionary work is to the body first. You are to clothe the naked and feed the hungry, then all the rest will follow in proper order. Thus it is that one of the great missionary institutions of this country is the News-boys' Home in Fulton Street, and another is the Little Wanderers' Home, and another is every evening-school, which is a kind of bright, pleasant club-room for houseless little vagabonds. Every spring when the anniversary week comes, and the Foreign Missionary Society holds its meeting with great dignity and impressiveness, I sit in the gallery and listen to the story of the distant sacrifice; I hear of the thumping sums of money that have been spent; and I confess, my reverend and dear young friend, that I wince when I think how much that money would do for the domestic Kaffirs and the Mackerelville Bengalese.

Now you think I am like the critic of Martha's box of ointment. But I am not. The domestic missions of which I speak, among the metropolitan heathen, are essential to our national existence. We must maintain and continue them, and enlarge them more, and more, and more, or we shall be submerged in ignorance and vice. Their results are evident; they are palpable. This kind of domestic mission is a field that rewards the culture ten thousand-fold. But my dear Howard, how is it with the foreign missions? I wish to speak respectfully, for no man can respect the heroic devotion of many of the missionaries more than I; but the best of them are virtually resoluteless. The whole system seems to me a painful sowing and cultivation of the sea-shore. It is sand when you begin; it is sand when you end. And the noble, heroic lives of good men who have struggled, and toiled, and died far from home, and love, and even public knowledge of their lofty heroism, seem to me—not in themselves, but in view of the results desired—lives wasted.

So, my dear boy, stop in your packing and reflect whether you can not do your duty even more satisfactorily by taking a shorter journey. I do not ask you to consider merely the pale cheeks and the aching heart of that nameless somebody; nor to think of the infinitely greater personal happiness to yourself of living among your kind and kindred; nor to reflect upon the essential reason of the foreign effort. Leave that untouched. Do me the simple justice of believing that nobody can honor the heroes more than I. But is not your nearest sphere of duty your appointed vineyard? Ought you to pass by the starving at your very door to say a good word to a comfortable Abyssinian? If you tell me that the domestic pagans have sufficient provision without you, I am forced to tell you that you are grievously mistaken. The city swarms with ignorance, destitution, and utter heathenism; and were there twice as much money spent, and twice as many good men and women devoted to the duty of feeding body and mind, the work would still seem to be almost unattempted.

Let your road lie through this pagan country, and your manners be those of a true missionary, dear Howard, and this tough old town will be—if ever so little—softer and kinder. The Christmas bells will soon ring, and happy hearts will be happier in the genial season. But the sweetest music of the chimes is the old refrain. Let it woo you away from your distant bourne. Let it whisper to you that your field is close at hand, that your traveling is to be in these streets, and your manners upon the road those of one who brings the tidings of peace and good-will. Your hopeful friend,

HOLIDAY GIFTS.

BROADWAY has donned its holiday attire. On the sidewalks, in the shop windows, and inside the palaces of trade, visions of rare and beautiful things arrest the eye of even the most careless observer. Entering these attractive bazars we will describe to our readers some of the holiday gifts displayed in the gay parterres that delight and bewilder one with their infinite variety.

DIAMONDS AND PEARLS.

Beginning with jewelry, diamonds and pearls, of course, take precedence. A diamond brooch, larger than the palm of the hand, attracts special admiration. It is a floral design, the rose, leaves, and stem made of innumerable small diamonds. The setting nowhere obtrudes itself. The jewels are placed on fine projecting points, almost invisible, beneath which is a spiral coil or spring which vibrates with the slightest motion, keeping the diamonds in a constant quiver, and displaying their brilliancy to the greatest advantage. The price of this royal pin is $4000 in gold.

A pair of oval ear-rings is valued at $13,000. The cubical drops to these ear-rings are said to be the largest pair of matched diamonds in the country. One of the famous Esterhazy diamonds is set in a ring appraised at $4500. Another brilliant solitaire ring is marked $10,000.

A bridal parure of pearls consists of brooch, ear-rings, necklace, and bracelet. This set is valued at $5000. Twenty of the rose pearls are as large as a good-sized pea, and several pear-shaped pendants are still larger. This is said to be the most valuable set of pearls for sale in the United States.

A beautiful necklace of graduated rose pearls is worth $3000 in gold.

OPALS, EMERALDS, ETC.

Among colored stones opals and emeralds are always fashionable for full evening dress. Sapphires and rubies are in high favor. Amethysts, garnets, and malachite are passée. Turquoise, coral, and topaz are in vogue; carbuncles are obsolete.

NEAPOLITAN CORAL.

The delicate rose-pink coral is more desirable than the deep red color. The designs are after the antique, classical, and Egyptian. Coral cameos represent the full face instead of profile. Semicircular brooches have a rose coral in the centre, with conical pieces radiating above and beside it, and long pendants beneath. Very little gold is visible in these styles. Sets such as we have just described, consisting of pin and ear-rings in solid coral, vary in price from $200 to $250.

A full parure of Naples coral contains a brooch, ear-drops, comb, necklace, bracelet, and buttons for sleeves and corsage. It is of the rare mottled coral. Shells of Etruscan gold hold large rose corals in the centre. Long pendants of coral, tipped with gold. Price, $3500 in gold.

A coral cameo of rich peach-blossom tint is a Bacchante crowned with vine-leaves and clusters of grapes. The veins of the leaves and the luxuriant hair are cut with marvelous accuracy. Ear-rings and pin are $500. A less expensive set is a bunch of roses and buds. The coral is fine and exquisitely carved, but the flowers are formed of small bits of little value. The pearls of the rose are transparent, and consequently very fragile. Price, $35.

Long strings of coral beads sell as high as $800. A dozen rose coral buttons for a dress are marked $90.

BYZANTINE MOSAICS.

The Byzantine mosaics are far more beautiful than the Roman and Florentine. They are made of smaller stones, and are of more varied and brilliant colors. This is a reproduction of an art known to the ancients, but which was lost for a long time. The aid of the microscope is necessary to appreciate the perfection of these artistic gems. Birds of brilliant plumage and flowers of richest color and lustre are formed of tiny stones, with all the accuracy of painting. The price of a set ranges from $80 to $150. They are mounted with Etruscan gold, and fashioned in quaint medieval styles and after Egyptian models. Think of wearing a mummy suspended from each ear! An emblematic cross, a peculiarly Catholic gift, is made in commemoration of the late convulsion of bishops. A miniature locket has a cherub in mosaics on one side, and the word eros on the other. Satyrs, sphinxes, scarabei, doves, and groups of cherubs, are favorite mosaic designs.

ENAMELED PAINTING AND ETRUSCAN GOLD.

A beautiful Venus Aphrodite in burned enamel was illustrated in a former Number of the Bazar. The process of burning the enamel into gold is a secret known only to a few. Another mythological set represents the chase of the fleet-footed Atalanta, an elaborate design carefully carried out. The price of brooch and ear-rings is $290.

There are many pretty devices in a simple style of enameling that are less expensive. Flowers, feathers, beetles, dragon-flies, and scorpions are imitated to the life. A handsome set is a wreath of blue bells enameled on gold. The stamens are gold tipped with diamonds. A concealed spring keeps the flowers in constant motion. Clusters of violets, a single pansy, and lilies of the valley, a pure white spray on a dark-green leaf, are made up in sets at from $60 to $100. A silver brooch represents a brown ostrich feather, enameled in all the Bismarck shades. A bonnet pin is a butterfly with ruby eyes and diamond-tipped wings. The antennæ and wings are found to be perfect when examined through a microscope.

Plain Etruscan jewelry, or dead gold as it is sometimes called, is intended for morning wear. There are some new designs—heavy, massive bars of gold, scallop shells, and emblematic insignia, always with pendants or fringe.

CAMEOS, ONYX, AND SARDONYX.

Cameos are again becoming fashionable. The Madonna, Psyche, Ceres, and allegorical scenes are cut in white on a dark ground. Sardonyx is a favorite stone for cameos. The value of the stone depends on the number of different parallel strata of various colors. The settings are of finely-wrought gold, inlaid with diamonds, pearls, and rubies. There is a very clever artist in cameos in the city, among whose collection is Edwin Booth's classic profile in clear white on a dark ground.

A sardonyx pin is cut to show three layers of different color in the same stone. The background is dark-brown, the profile pure white, and over the abundant curls is drapery of the clearest amber. The setting is studded with pearls.

Another brooch represents a Madonna. The head and bust are exquisitely cut in immaculate white on a dark ground. The setting is of diamonds and black enamel. With ear-rings to match, the price is $900. Still another is a square pink onyx with a fancy scene in clear white. The design is of little value, but the workmanship is excellent. The mounting is of white roses made of pearls, and leaves of fine diamonds in Etruscan gold twining about the branches. Beneath is a fringe of gold, tipped with diamonds. Price $550 in gold. Mythological subjects are in good taste for cameos. One set represents on the pin Music, and on the ear-rings the muses of Painting and Literature. This is $600. Orpheus with his lyre, Neptune with his trident riding the waves, and many other designs are displayed.

Ebony onyx, in solid pieces like coral, has taken the place of jet for mourning jewelry.

NECKLACES, LOCKETS, ETC.

Flexible gold necklaces are formed of massive yellow links, which nevertheless are as pliant and light as a silk ribbon. Lockets of Etruscan gold, or clasps with long pendants, ornament them in front. Some of the devices for these lockets are beautiful and original. Cameos cut in opals set with diamonds, lattice of turquoise with diamonds in the interstices, squares of pink onyx with Etruscan beaded borders, amethysts with monograms and flowers in pearls or diamonds, enameled pictures and mosaics dazzle the eye.

An improved handkerchief chain has a flexible ring with a slide which enlarges the ring, allowing the mouchoir to be passed through without crushing; the slide is then slipped back, holding the lace securely without wrinkling it. They vary in price from $50 to $5000, according to the value of the ornaments and precious stones used.

Handsome glove-clasps are of emerald and amethyst with diamond initials. Filagree chains connect them, to which little jingling bells are attached.

Jeweled buttons for sleeves and corsage, and girdle-ornaments, are made of Etruscan gold with centres of pearl, amethyst, or emerald, to suit the color of the dress. Solid malachite, coral, and turquoise are left plain without any gold setting.

Sets of jewelry for children are miniature imitations of those worn by their mamma. At one house where these sets are a specialty they are made substantial and strong, as well as appropriate and youthful.

For gentlemen there are massive gold scarf-rings, enameled, or set with jewels; tiny self-adjusting studs, and scarf-pins, dog's heads of amethyst or coral, with collar and lock studded with diamonds. Green Brazilian beetles, with diamond eyes, are set in beaded borders for shirt-studs. Signet-rings and watch-chains are made of the pale yellow gold from New Mexico. Snuff-boxes, pencils, card-cases, tooth-picks, cane-heads, and whip-handles are quaintly carved in this new gold.

LACE AND SANDAL-WOOD FANS.

A fan intended for a bridal present is of point d'Alençon lace in a lily of the valley pattern over white satin, with richly-carved pearl sticks. There are several different colors of pearl used for mounting fans. A beautiful design is of point de Venise over pink velvet, with handle of pearl, tinted like opal. A dark fan for a dowager is of black tulle spangled with transparent maroon ornaments, with sticks of a rich maroon-colored pearl. Another is of a gossamer lace without lining, ornamented with an appliqué wreath of flowers, and still another is of point lace over amber satin, with handle of carved gold. Prices range from $50 to $150.

A white silk fan is exquisitely painted with a wreath of moss-roses and forget-me-nots. The sticks are of carved yellow ivory. Handsomest of all the sandal-wood fans is one designed for an American lady who has just become Madame la baronne. It displays different designs according to the way in which it is opened. The price is $250.

PARASOLS.

Some parasols were shown us which are too handsome and valuable to be forgotten, although out of season. The first we examine is of point appliqué lace over lavender silk, with an embossed white gauze lining toning down the lavender to a becoming shade. The handle and ring at the top are of gold stone, beautifully clouded, and mounted with gold enameled bands. Price $215. Another, marked $300, is of genuine point d'Alençon over blue silk. Solid amber stick, with large knob at the handle, and ring on top. A Chantilly lace cover is lined with pink silk. Handle of carved yellow ivory, inlaid with pale coral. Large coral ornaments. A tortoise-shell handle is inlaid with gold stars. A stick of real blood-stone, with black thread lace over purple satin, is $200; and one of solid malachite, with point gaze over pea-green silk, with pink lining, is $250.

VARIETIES.

A glove-box, lined with white moiré, is redolent of attar of roses. A glove-stretcher of ivory and a gilt glove-fastener with a pair of amethyst clasps accompany it. The outside is maroon velvet, with gilt bands.

A mouchoir satchel consists of two large quilted pockets of blue satin, lined with white silk. In one pocket were half a dozen of the finest cambric handkerchiefs, with three-inch hems and an embroidered monogram of vines and leaves. In the other was a point gaze kerchief, with small cambric centre almost as thin as the border.

A jewel-case has the lid and sides representing bouquets of roses and jasmine in Florentine mosaics set in gold, studded with turquoise, with ruby velvet lining. There are also some beautiful jeweled opera-glasses. One is made of pale pink coral; another of amber; and a third of opal-tinted pearl is ornamented with rubies and brilliants. One, entirely of pearl, without even the slides gilt, is intended for a bride. Another is of yellow ivory, with twelve lenses. This is small enough to be carried in a gentleman's vest pocket.

A valuable present for a lady is a work-box, writing-desk, and dressing-case combined. The inkstands, perfume-bottles, pomade-jar, cosmetic-box, etc., are of cut glass, with real silver covers. Combs, hand-glass, brush-handles, pens, and paper-knife, of yellow ivory, accompany this.

In Viennese ware there are inkstands with candlesticks to match, representing armorers making swords; cigar-cases with a miniature cannon from which a lighted match is projected; and a sword-sheath inclosing paper-folder and ivory-handled penknife, all suitable gifts for one's military friends.

A traveling-bag of Russian leather contains every thing a lady can find use for on a journey. A seal-skin muff of cuir coroll, marked $50, is lined with blue silk. A satchel is concealed at the side. A girdle of seal-skin in its natural color with mouchoir bag attached is mounted with gilt, price $27.

PERSONAL.

That clever French gentleman, DU CHATELLE, has just come over from Europe, bringing several beautiful diagrams, six feet by nine, illustrating the scenery, animals, and people of Africa. Mr. DU CHATELLE will do a bit of lecturing, and look over the proofs of a new book soon to be published by HARPER & BROTHERS.

That culinary artist and author, Professor BLON, who is to cookery what MACAULAY is to history (in other words, one of the Macaulayflowers of the literary garden), says that the butcher men of Philadelphia and Cincinnati cut their meat properly, which is not done in other cities. The Professor is good authority, and is, moreover, one of those conscientious authors who writes no line that —“dying he would wish to blot.”

Certes the young ladies of Westfield, Massachusetts, ought to feel personally complimented by the statement of the Springfield Republican, that Miss LIBBY FRENCH, of Westfield, received more attention in Europe the past summer than any other American visitor.

FANNY JANATSCHKE, the German tragedienne, has not made any great speculation by her trip to this country. In fact, she is said to be fifty thousand “out,” but she is hopeful, and may yet make up the deficit. The Germans are beginning to appreciate her great histrionic ability, and flock to hear her.

Mrs. BEECHER STOWE's new novel is to be called “Old Town Folk.” It will not be published until next spring—so we are told by the paragramist of a London journal.

Governor FENTON has approved the plan for the new State Capitol, prepared by ARTHUR GILMAN, Esq., and Mr. FEILER, and ground has already been broken for the new building. Excepting only the Capitol at Washington it will be the largest, costliest, and most elegant edifice of the kind in the United States, and will cost $6,000,000. Mr. GILMAN is a very practical as well as a very clever and cultivated gentleman, whose professional taste and talent are becoming rapidly appreciated in this metropolis. Besides the State Capitol of New Hampshire, and the new Court-House in Boston, Mr. G. is the architect of some of the most elegant town and country houses in the North.

General Upton, of the United States Army (he is not yet thirty, ladies, and a capital match), has obtained from General GRANT a year's leave of absence. He goes abroad, partly to introduce, if possible, his military tactics into the armies of Europe. The General hails from Batavia, Genesee County, New York.

Bishop SIMPSON, a close observer, and not given to making loose statements, in a lecture recently delivered in Boston made the prediction that Chinese servants would be common in American houses in a few years.

The grandfather of GEORGE H. PENDLETON, of Ohio (who was “vice” on the McClellan Presidential ticket), was the second of HAMILTON in his duel with BEE.

In the British House of Commons they are more mindful of the amenities than they are at Washington. For instance, on a recent occasion Mr. DISRAELI was in his place looking completely worn out with anxiety and fatigue. It devolved upon Mr. GLADSTONE, as leader of the Opposition, to criticize the Queen's speech. He alluded to the sickness of Mr. DISRAELI, assuring Mr. DISRAELI of the profound sympathy of his colleagues in the House, and said he could not think, under the circumstances, of forcing Mr. DISRAELI into a political discussion. Mr. DISRAELI was so touched by this considerate kindness that his reply was almost inaudible.

HALLECK, having been born July 8, 1790, was over seventy-seven at the time of his death. He took life right pleasantly until two or three years ago, when he rather gave up. Then he began to pass most of his time alone. During a visit to this city last year he would start out, night after night, on wonderfully long walks, stopping regularly at certain places for a revival of ale, which he would quaff in silence, then trudge on to the next place, and ditto. With half a dozen or a dozen friends he was delightful. With a crowd, silent as an oyster.

The Rev. JOHN COTTON SMITH, a Low-Churchman of high degree, took occasion last Thanksgiving-day to say what he thought of the “Triumph of Liberal Principles in the Protestant Episcopal Church.” From his outlook it don't seem to matter much whether or not people are solemnly ordained and set apart as bishops, priests, or deacons, or whether they preach on the Congregational or Own-Hook basis.

An English youth, only 13 years of age, and appropriately named FRANKLIN, is said to have discovered a mode of causing a vacuum without condensation, which will save half the fuel hitherto used in working steam-engines.

RALPH KEELER is the name of an ambitious young Californian, who is reported to have traveled all over Europe upon the modest sum of $181 greenbacks. Like the DUKE of ARNOLE, he has turned lecturer, and gives his views under the title of “Views Barfooted.” It is supposed that the mode of traveling and the title of the lecture bear a striking resemblance.

It's not true that the Empress EUGENIE sells her second-hand clothes. She gives them to her servants, who sell them privately, admitting none but very privileged persons to the sale. The whole thing is kept perfectly mum, and no speculators are admitted.

BISMARCK is a very great man, but his two daughters are plain, simple-minded girls, with short wists and straight dark hair, brown vells and thick boots; good, sensible girls, with no nonsense.

Satin Cravat.

See illustration, page 132.

This cravat is made of blue satin, and is trimmed with crystal beads, two small blue silk tassels, and a rosette of narrow lace. It is fastened with a button and loop. Take a bias strip of satin, a little more than an inch broad, and as long as the cravat is desired. The sides of this strip are sewed together over a piece of buckram, so that the seam is in the middle, and the ends are turned in and basted, when the cravat is ready for the bow. For this cut from Fig. 27 two pieces of satin and buckram: run the edges of the outside and lining together; put on the beads and tassels, and lay the pleats as shown in the pattern, so that the dotted line forms the outer, and the smooth line the inner fold of the pleat. Sew a stay on the ends, fasten them to the cravat, and put the rosette in the middle, finished in the centre with a blue satin button.

Girl's Crochet Imitation Fur Muff, Collar, Cuffs, and Barette.

See illustration, page 132.

The original is worked with gray zephyr, in a new kind of loop stitch to imitate fur. Work this loop stitch in single crochet around a fringe staff a quarter of an inch in diameter in the following manner: On a chain of the required length, work first 1 single crochet, then take the fringe staff back of the thread and the needle. * Insert the needle in the following stitch of the chain, wind the thread once around the needle and the staff, put it once more over the staff; put the needle, in the manner indicated by the arrow in the illustration, around the thread, and crochet 1 stitch. Repeat from *. All the other rows are worked in the same manner. The wrong side of the work on which the loops are formed is intended for the right side. For the muff work on 100 chain 40 rows the rows are to run around the muff. After finishing the last row, sew the stitches in it to the first row. Line it; gather it a little at the ends. Make a shirt about three-quarters of an inch wide of lute-string ribbon; run a cord through it; finish with tassels.

Collar.—Begin on the lower edge of the back, according to the pattern, which gives only half the collar. The widening and narrowing, to form this collar, must be worked, according to the pattern, at the beginning and end of the rows. When the back part has reached the given width, each front part must be worked separately. The collar is lined with silk. On the front sides of the neck put a cord and tassels.

Cuffs.—After having doubled the pattern, begin with the lower edge of the cuffs. Make the necessary widening at the end of the rows. The point on the upper edge is formed by shortening the rows by leaving off some stitches at the beginning and at the end. The cuffs are to be lined with quilted silk like the collar, and are fastened with buttons and loops of chain stitch.

Barette.—Cut out of buckram Figs. 50 and 51, doubling the pattern. Join the parts according to the numbers, and begin to work in the middle of the top with a chain of 4 stitches, working around in connected rows. In each row of the top, at equal distances, widen sufficiently to keep the work flat. For the border narrow in the last row of the top; work a number of rows without widening, except in the last, in which widen a little. A quilted lining, and elastic fastened to the side, finishes the barette.

Wall Bag.

See illustration, page 132.

The original is made of white rep piqué, with blue guipure insertion, silk ribbon about half an inch wide, with bows of wider blue ribbon, as shown in the illustration. It should be made either of woolen, or of some material that can be washed. Cut from strong cardboard or pasteboard, piqué, and cotton cloth, from Fig. 20, which is only half the size; therefore, double the material, so that it will be in one piece, and allow for seams in the piqué and cotton cloth. Sew the pieces on the pasteboard over hand. The little pocket is made only of piqué, cut from Fig. 21, which is half the back. Sew both parts—the back and front—together. The edges of the back are hemmed; the front is trimmed as in the engraving. Sew on the pocket so that 39 and 40 meet the corresponding figures on the main part.

The large pocket consists of a strip of piqué about seven inches wide and twenty-three inches long; make the corners a little rounding. This strip is hemmed about half an inch wide on the top, and is gathered at the bottom as seen in the engraving. Through the hem of the slip put a whalebone, or steel spring, about fifteen inches long; then sew the front part thus formed to the main part, as seen in the engraving. The pocket is now trimmed all around with ribbon and guipure, with which the seams of the two pockets must be covered. Finish the upper end of the main part with bows, and set little loops or rings, whereby to suspend it, on the back.

Knotted Slipper.

See illustration, page 132.

This slipper is made of strong red carpet-wool, with a sole of cork or leather. Commence at the toe: fasten to a pillow or cushion six threads, each about a yard and a half long; doubled together in the middle so as to form 12 threads; with every four of these ends a knot must be made. The two middle threads serve for centre threads, while the outer threads are knotted over the centre. Put the two centre threads over the fingers of the left hand, the right outside thread over the centre to the left side; then from the left side lead the outside thread over the right outside thread also through between this and the centre, and pull both outside threads closely, then put the left outside thread over the centre. Now knot the right, taking it over the left outside thread, under the centre and up through between the left and the centre, which finishes the knot. With the eight remaining threads two other knots are made. Alternate the knots of the second row by taking the two threads lying outside for a centre, and knot with the two threads which before formed the centre. There must also be added in every row of knots at each side either two or four threads, which are pulled through the loop on the outer edge, so that the rows may widen as in the pattern. When the widest part is reached, each side part is finished separately, and two or four threads are left back, according as may be needed. Bind the edge with black satin, half an inch wide, and put on the sole as indicated by the numbers in the pattern. The sole is knotted as shown in the illustration. The upper edge is also bound with black satin. Lastly, sew the woolen sole to another of leather, cork, or felt along the dotted line of Fig. 53, and ornament in the middle with rosettes of woolen loops, placing a black button in the centre.

Crochet Corset.

See illustration, page 132.

This corset is of yarn or worsted, worked in single crochet backward and forward, making ribbed crochet—two rows make a ridge. Figs. 11-15 give half the corset. Before beginning the work the parts of the pattern must be cut in thin muslin, or some kind of lining stuff; put them together according to the numbers, then take it as a measuring pattern for the crochet work. After having the given shape it will be easy to make such a corset larger or smaller. It must be worked very tight, taking up both loops of the stitch.

Begin at the back of the corset for this purpose. Make a chain of 134 stitches; crochet 2 rows. In the 3d row the eyelet holes are made—after every 8 stitches make 2 chain; miss 2 stitches of the former row. In the 4th row crochet over these 2 chain stitches in single crochet; then make 38 rows, and on the upper edge narrow according to the pattern. With the 43d row begin on the lower edge the hip gore, crochet only on the first 54 stitches 2 rows. To make the bias side of the gore, in every 1st ribbed row of the following 14 rows leave off 6 stitches at the upper end of these 54 stitches. There will be only 12 stitches left; then lengthen the rows in the same way that they were shortened, by adding the same number of stitches at the upper end of the following 16 rows. With 32 rows the gore is finished. Then work over the whole row of stitches, narrowing at the upper edge and increasing at the lower, according to the shape of the pattern. The 2d and 3d hip gorges are crocheted in a similar manner. Between the 2d and 3d gore work 2 rows three times on the lower edge to give it sufficient width. Crochet up to 46 or 48 stitches on the lower edge. The same is done on the upper edge, corresponding to the smooth line in Fig. 12. From the shape of Figs. 11 and 12 crochet the waist on about 60 stitches, counting from the upper edge; first 16 rows, and again for the bias side of the gore a sufficient number of stitches must be left off till only 10 remain on the upper edge. The same thing must be done on the lower edge of the corset to correspond with the diagram or pattern. Then crochet the breast gore like the hip gore as before described, adding as many stitches in the 2d row as have before been left off; but as this gore becomes much larger there are a larger number of rows to crochet, and these 40 rows must correspond to the 16 rows before crocheted. All the front parts are finished according to the pattern. When both parts of the corset are finished, crochet on the upper edge little scallops as follows: * 1 single crochet in one stitch of the edge, and a little picot which consists of 4 chain, 1 single crochet in the 1st of the chain. With this picot skip a sufficient number of stitches; repeat from *. As shown in the pattern, put on the back worsted tape for holding the whole lace crossways woolen cord.

Flannel Drawers for Girl from 8 to 10 Years old.

See illustration, page 132.

THESE are designed for over-drawers, to be worn out of doors in cold weather. The original is of flannel, finished at the bottom with a band of black velvet ribbon and a frill scalloped with worsted. The top is set on a bodice-shaped waistband. Cut from Figs. 28, 30, and 31 each two similar pieces, taking care to notice the piece turned down in Fig. 28. Join each part of the drawers from 1 to 2, and face the slope with a strip of muslin an inch and a half wide. Sew the fronts together from 6 to 7, and gather the top from 8 to 9. Cut a slit at the bottom along the double line in Fig. 28, face it with a strip of muslin, and gather the bottom for the band. Cut Fig. 29 of double stuff, and set it on to correspond with the figures on the pattern. Set a frill, two inches wide, on the bottom, with a heading of black velvet ribbon, and put a button and button-hole on the band. Line the waistband with muslin. Join the fronts in the middle, sew them from 8 to 9 to the backs, put a button on the left side and a button-hole on the right, and set on the waistband to correspond with the figures on the pattern.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XVI.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

"It is now the middle of February," said Despard, after a long pause, in which he had given himself up to the strange reflections which the diary was calculated to excite. "If Louis Brandon left Australia when he was called he must be in England now."

"You are calm," said Mrs. Thornton. "Have you nothing more to say than that?"

Despard looked at her earnestly. "Do you ask me such a question? It is a story so full of anguish that the heart might break out of pure sympathy, but what words could be found? I have nothing to say. I am speechless. My God! what horror thou dost permit!"

"But something must be done," said Mrs. Thornton, impetuously.

"Yes," said Despard, slowly, "but what? If we could reach our hands over the grave and bring back those who have passed away, then the soul of Edith might find peace; but now—now—we can give her no peace. She only wishes to die. Yet something must be done, and the first thing is to find Louis Brandon. I will start for London to-night. I will go and seek him, not for Edith's sake but for his own, that I may save one at least of this family. For her there is no comfort. Our efforts are useless there. If we could give her the greatest earthly happiness it would be poor and mean, and still she would sigh after that starry companionship from which her soul has been withdrawn."

"Then you believe it."

"Don't you?"

"Of course; but I did not know that you would."

"Why not? and if I did not believe it this at least would be plain, that she herself believes it. And even if it be a hallucination, it is a sublime one, and so vivid that it is the same to her as a reality. Let it be only a dream that has taken place—still that dream has made all other things dim, indistinct, and indifferent to her."

"No one but you would read Paolo's diary without thinking him insane."

Despard smiled. "Even that would be nothing to me. Some people think that a great genius must be insane."

"Great wits are sure to madness near allied," you know. For my part, I consider Paolo the sublimest of men. When I saw him last I was only a boy, and he came with his seraphic face and his divine music to give me an inspiration which has biased my life ever since. I have only known one spirit like his among those whom I have met."

An indescribable sadness passed over his face. "But now," he continued, suddenly, "I suppose Thornton must see my uncle's letter. His legal mind may discern some things which the law may do in this case. Edith is beyond all consolation from human beings, and still farther beyond all help from English law. But if Louis Brandon can be found the law may exert itself in his favor. In this respect he may be useful, and I have no doubt he would take up the case earnestly, out of his strong sense of justice."

When Thornton came in to dinner Despard handed him his uncle's letter. The lawyer read it with deep attention, and without a word.

Mrs. Thornton looked agitated—sometimes resting her head on her hand, at others looking fixedly at her husband. As soon as he had finished she said, in a calm, measured tone:

"I did not know before that Brandon of Brandon Hall and all his family had perished so miserably."

Thornton started, and looked at her earnestly. She returned his gaze with unutterable sadness in her eyes.

"He saved my father's life," said she. "He benefited him greatly. Your father also was under slight obligations to him. I thought that things like these constituted a faint claim on one's gratitude, so that if one were exposed to misfortune he might not be altogether destitute of friends."

Thornton looked uneasy as his wife spoke.

"My dear," said he, "you do not understand."

"True," she answered; "for this thing is almost incredible. If my father's friend has died in misery, unpitied and unwept, forsaken by all, do I not share the guilt of ingratitude? How can I absolve myself from blame?"

"Set your mind at rest. You never knew any thing about it. I told you nothing on the subject."

"Then you knew it?"

"Stop! You can not understand this unless I explain it. You are stating bald facts; but these facts, painful as they are, are very much modified by circumstances."

"Well, then, I hope you will tell me all, without reserve, for I wish to know how it is that this horror has happened, and I have stood idly and coldly aloof. My God!" she cried, in Italian; "did he not—did they not in their last moments think of me, and wonder how they could have been betrayed by Langhetti's daughter?"

"My dear, be calm, I pray. You are blaming yourself unjustly. I assure you."

Despard was ghastly pale as this conversation went on. He turned his face away.

"Ralph Brandon," began Thornton, "was a man of many high qualities, but of unbounded pride, and utterly impracticable. He was no judge of character, and therefore was easily deceived. He was utterly inexperienced in business, and he was always liable to be led astray by any sudden impulse. Somehow or other a man named Potts excited his interest about twelve or fifteen years ago. He was a mere vulgar adventurer; but Brandon became infatuated with him, and actually believed that this man was worthy to be intrusted with the management of large business transactions. The thing went on for years. His friends all remonstrated with him. In particular, went there to explain to him that the speculation in which he was engaged could not result in any thing except loss. But he resented all interference, and I had to leave him to himself.

"His son Louis was a boy full of energy and fire. The family were all indignant at the confidence which Ralph Brandon put in this Potts—Louis most of all. One day he met Potts. Words passed between them, and Louis struck the scoundrel. Potts complained. Brandon had his son up on the spot; and after listening to his explanations gave him the alternative either to apologize to Potts or to leave the house forever. Louis indignantly denounced Potts to his father as a swindler. Brandon ordered him to his room, and gave him a week to decide.

"The servants whispered till the matter was noised abroad. The county gentry had a meeting about it, and felt so strongly that they did an unparalleled thing. They actually waited on him to assure him that Potts was unworthy of trust, and to urge him not to treat his son so harshly. All Brandon's pride was roused at this. He said words to the deputation which cut him off forever from their sympathy, and they left in a rage. Mrs. Brandon wrote to me, and I went there. I found Brandon inflexible. I urged him to give his son a longer time, to send him to the heard of Brandon, he was just the man who would have blessed any one who would interpose to save his son."

"His son did not wish to be saved. He has all his father's inflexibility, but an intellect as clear as that of the most practical man. He has a will of iron, dauntless resolution, and an implacable temper. At the same time he has the open generosity and the tender heart of his father."

"Had his father a tender heart?"

"So tender and affectionate that this sacrifice of his son must have overwhelmed him with the deepest sorrow."

"Did you ever after make any advances to any of them?"

"No, never. I never went near the house."

"Did you ever visit any of the county gentry to see if something could be done?"

"No. It would have been useless. Besides, the very mention of his name would have been resented. I should have had to fling myself headlong against the feelings of the whole public. And no man has any right to do that."

"No," said Mrs. Thornton. "No man has. That was another mistake that the martyrs made. They would fling themselves against public opinion."

"All men can not be martyrs. Besides, the cases are not analogous."

Thornton spoke calmly and dispassionately.

"True. It is absurd in me; but I admire one who has for a moment forgotten his own interests or safety in thinking of others."

"That does very well for poetry, but not in real life."

"In real life, such as that on board the Tecumseh?" murmured Mrs. Thornton, with drooping eyelids.

"You are getting excited, my dear," said Thornton, patiently, with the air of a wise father who overlooks the petulance of his child. "I will go on. I had business on the Continent army for a while, to do any thing rather than eject him. He refused to change his sentence. Then I pointed out the character of Potts, and told him many things that I had heard. At this he hinted that I wished to have the management of his business, and was actuated by mercenary motives. Of course, after this insult, nothing more was to be said. I went home and tried to forget all about the Brandons. At the end of the week Louis refused to apologize, and left his father forever."

"THEN, COVERING HER FACE WITH HER HANDS, SHE BURST INTO AN AGONY OF TEARS."

"Did you see Louis?"

"I saw him before that insult to ask if he would apologize."

"Did you try to make him apologize?" asked Mrs. Thornton, coldly.

"Yes. But he looked at me with such an air that I had to apologize myself for hinting at such a thing. He was as inflexible as his father."

"How else could he have been?"

"Well, each might have yielded a little. It does not do to be so inflexible if one would succeed in life."

"No," said Mrs. Thornton. "Success must be gained by flexibility. The martyrs were all inflexible, and they were all unsuccessful."

Thornton looked at his wife hastily. Despard's hand trembled, and his face grew paler still with a more livid pallor.

"Did you try to do any thing for the ruined son?"

"How could I, after that insult?"

"Could you not have got him a government office, or purchased a commission for him in the army?"

"He would not have taken it from me."

"You could have co-operated with his mother, and done it in her name."

"I could not enter the house after being insulted."

"You could have written. From what I have when poor Brandon's ruin occurred. You were with me, my dear, at Berlin when I heard about it. I felt shocked, but not surprised. I feared that it would come to that."

"You showed no emotion in particular."

"No; I was careful not to trouble you."

"You were in Berlin three months. Was it at the beginning or end of your stay?"

"At the beginning."

"And you staid?"

"I had business which I could not leave."

"Would you have been ruined if you had left?"

"Well, no—not exactly ruined, but it would have entailed serious consequences."

"Would those consequences have been as serious as the Tecumseh tragedy?"

"My dear, in business there are rules which a man is not permitted to neglect. There are duties and obligations which are imperative. The code of honor there is as delicate, yet as rigid, as elsewhere."

"And yet there are times when all obligations of this sort are weakened. When friends die, this is recognized. Why should it not be so when they are in danger of a fate worse than death?"

Thornton elevated his eyebrows, and made no reply.

"You must have heard about it in March, then?"

"Yes, at the end of January. His ruin took place in December, 1845. It was the middle of May before I got home. I then, toward the end of the month, sent my clerk to Brandon village to make inquiries. He brought word of the death of Brandon, and the departure of his family to parts unknown."

"Did he make no particular inquiries?"

"No."

"And you said not a word to me!"

"I was afraid of agitating you, my dear."

"And therefore you have secured for me unending self-reproach."

"Why so? Surely you are blaming yourself without a shadow of a cause."

"I will tell you why. I dare say I feel unnecessarily on the subject, but I can not help it. It is a fact that Brandon was always impulsive and culpably careless about himself. It is to this quality, strangely enough, that I owe my father's life, and my own comfort for many years. Paolo also owes as much as I. Mr. Brandon, with a friend of his, was sailing through the Mediterranean in his own yacht, making occasional tours into the country at every place where they happened to land, and at last they came to Girgenti, with the intention of examining the ruins of Agrigentum. This was in 1818, four years before I was born. My father was stopping at Girgenti, with his wife and Paolo, who was then six years old. My father had been very active under the reign of Murat, and had held a high post in his government. This made him suspected after Murat's overthrow."

"On the day that these Englishmen visited Girgenti, a woman in deep distress came to see them, along with a little boy. It was my mother and Paolo. She flung herself on the floor at their feet, and prayed them to try and help her husband, who had been arrested on a charge of treason and was now in prison. He was suspected of belonging to the Carbonari, who were just beginning to resume their secret plots, and were showing great activity. My father belonged to the innermost degree, and had been betrayed by a villain named Cigole. My mother did not tell them all this, but merely informed them of his danger."

"At first they did not know what to do, but the prayers of my mother moved their hearts. They went to see the captain of the guard, and tried to bribe him, but without effect. They found out, however, where my father was confined, and resolved upon a desperate plan. They put my mother and Paolo on board of the yacht, and by paying a heavy bribe obtained permission to visit my father in prison. Brandon's friend was about the same height as my father. When they reached his cell they urged my father to exchange clothes with him and escape. At first he positively refused, but when assured that Brandon's friend, being an Englishman, would be set free in a few days, he consented. Brandon then took him away unnoticed, put him on board of the yacht, and sailed to Marseilles, where he gave him money enough to get to England, and told him to stop at Brandon Hall till he himself arrived. He then sailed back to see about his friend."

"He found out nothing about him for some time. At last he induced the British ambassador to take the matter in hand, and he did so with such effect that the prisoner was liberated. He had been treated with some severity at first, but he was young, and the government was persuaded to look upon it as a youthful freak. Brandon's powerful influence with the British ambassador obtained his unconditional release."

"My father afterward obtained a situation here at Holby, where he was organist till he died. Through all his life he never ceased to receive kindness and delicate acts of attention from Brandon. When in his last sickness Brandon came and staid with him till the end. He then wished to do something for Paolo, but Paolo preferred seeking his own fortune in his own way."

Mrs. Thornton ended her little narrative, to which Despard had listened with the deepest attention.

"Who was Brandon's friend?" asked Despard.

"He was a British officer," said Mrs. Thornton. "For fear of dragging in his government, and perhaps incurring dismissal from the army, he gave an assumed name—Mountjoy. This was the reason why Brandon was so long in finding him."

"Did your father not know it?"

"On the passage Brandon kept it secret, and after his friend's deliverance he came to see my father under his assumed name. My father always spoke of him as Mountjoy. After a time he heard that he was dead."

"I can tell you his true name," said Mr. Thornton. "There is no reason why you should not know it."

"What?"

"Lionel Despard—your father, and Ralph Brandon's bosom friend."

Despard looked transfixed. Mrs. Thornton gazed at her husband, and gave an unutterable look at Despard, then, covering her face with her hands, she burst into an agony of tears.

"My God," cried Despard, passing his hand over his forehead, "my father died when I was a child, and nobody was ever able to tell me any thing about him. And Brandon was his friend. He died thus, and his family have perished thus, while I have known nothing and done nothing."

"You at least are not to blame," said Thornton, calmly, "for you had scarcely heard of Brandon's name. You were in the north of England when this happened, and knew nothing whatever about it."

That evening Despard went home with a deeper trouble in his heart. He was not seen at the Grange for a month. At the end of that time he returned. He had been away to London during the whole interval.

As Mrs. Thornton entered to greet him her whole face was overspread with an expression of radiant joy. He took both her hands in his and pressed them without a word. "Welcome back," she murmured—"you have been gone a long time."

"Nothing but an overpowering sense of duty could have kept me away so long," said he, in a deep, low voice.

A few similar commonplaces followed; but with these two the tone of the voice invested the feeblest commonplaces with some hidden meaning.

At last she asked: "Tell me what success you had?" He made no reply; but taking a paper from his pocket opened it, and pointed to a marked paragraph. This was the month of March. The paper was dated January 14, 1847. The paragraph was as follows:

"DISTRESSING CASUALTY.—The ship Java, which left Sydney on the 5th of August last, reports a stormy passage. On the 12th of September a distressing casualty occurred. They were in S. lat. 11° 1' 22", E. long. 105° 6' 36", when a squall suddenly struck the ship. A passenger, Louis Brandon, Esq., of the firm of Compton & Brandon, Sydney, was standing by the lee-quarter as the squall struck, and, distressing to narrate, he was hurled violently overboard. It was impossible to do any thing, as a monsoon was beginning, which raged for twenty-four hours. Mr. Brandon was coming to England on business.

"The captain reports a sand-bank in the latitude and longitude indicated above, which he names 'Coffin Island,' from a rock of peculiar shape at the eastern extremity. Ships will do well in future to give this place a wide berth."

Deep despondency came over Mrs. Thornton's face as she read this. "We can do nothing," said she, mournfully. "He is gone. It is better for him. We must now wait till we hear more from Paolo. I will write to him at once."

"And I will write to my uncle." There was a long silence. "Do you know," said Despard, finally, "that I have been thinking much about my father of late. It seems very strange to me that my uncle never told me about that Sicilian affair before. Perhaps he did not wish me to know it, for fear that through all my life I should brood over thoughts of that noble heart lost to me forever. But I intend to write to him, and obtain afresh the particulars of his death. I wish to know more about my mother. No one was ever in such ignorance of his parents as I have been. They merely told me that my father and mother died suddenly in India, and left me an orphan at the age of seven under the care of Mr. Henry Thornton. They never told me that Brandon was a very dear friend of his. I have thought also of the circumstances of his death, and they all seem confused. Some say he died in Calcutta, others say in China, and Mr. Thornton once said in Manila. There is some mystery about it."

"When Brandon was visiting my father," said Mrs. Thornton, "you were at school, and he never saw you. I think he thought you were Henry Despard's son."

"There's some mystery about it," said Despard, thoughtfully.

When Mr. Thornton came in that night he read a few extracts from the London paper which he had just received. One was as follows:

"FOUNDERED AT SEA.—The ship H. B. Smith, from Calcutta, which arrived yesterday, reports that on the 28th January they picked up a ship's long-boat near the Cape Verd Islands. It was floating bottom upward. On the stern was painted the word Falcon. The ship Falcon has now been expected for two months, and it is feared from this that she may have foundered at sea. The Falcon was on her way from Sydney to London, and belonged to Messrs. Ringwood, Flaxman, & Co."

BERTHA'S LOVER.

I FOLDED my work as evenly as Laura would have done, and laid it away with a for once orderly collection of spools. Then I put on a calico dress and a pair of stout shoes, and roved myself over to the Point. There, under the pines, with my face against the odoriferous, brown, fallen needles, while the long summer day poured its molten splendors about me, I tried to fight out my battle.

I came back at sundown. They had just returned from the dépôt, Laura in front driving, father and Earl on the back seat. Her delicate, gray dress showed no fleck from all the dust of the road; under her narrow-brimmed hat the rose and white of her marvelous complexion were as sweet as ever. An hour and a half in the glare of that blazing afternoon had left her as unflushed and cool as if she had just come from her dressing-room. She touched Earl's hand as he stood ready to lift her down, and lighted at my side like a bird. What a contrast we made of it! She, with her baby curves, and pink tints, and crisp, fresh draperies—I, dark-faced and thin, sunburnt almost to a blister with the double glow of sky and reflecting sea I had been in all day, disordered hair and common dress, torn and grievously dragged with salt-water.

But I was ready for dinner first, after all. Father would not have waited for General Jackson. We were half through soup when she appeared, and floated into her place like a cool, white cloud. Then, somehow, all the talk centred about her, and left me mute behind the coffee urn, scowling. I suppose, and watching them savagely, for there was a pain in my heart that would not let soft words and smiles come. Her sweetness irritated me till I was ashamed of myself: and when dessert came on, and I could get away from the blue light of her great, calm eyes, I steadied myself by an effort of will that might have moved mountains. Only I could not keep steady. A storm was brewing somewhere beyond that serene skyline, and all the atmospheric currents ran counter to my quiet. Every thing went wrong. I ended at last by snubbing Earl and tearing my dress on a door. The rent breadths trailed after me limp and aggravating as I walked the veranda alone. Father was in the library over his books. Earl and Laura were close by in the nook of the house that we used as music, sitting, and reading room, all in one. I could see them as I passed the long, open window, intent over their chess-table, utterly oblivious of my moods. It did not help me much.

The night was growing troubled. Across the slow lights overhead masses of shadow, scarcely clouds as yet, swept fitfully, and white, broken gleams flitted over the water. An uneasy wind was sobbing in from seaward, every gust damp with foam. The whole air was full of a half-articulate wail, a heart-breaking murmur. If I had been nervous and a coward, I should have gone in and covered close to something human for companionship. As it was, every sudden noise sent hot shivers through my veins. My heart-throbs were like drum-beats. Every ghost there had ever been in all my life rose and haunted me now; and all the pain and disappointment and hatred, half conquered to-day, returned and wrenched me back and forth. It is not in me to cry out; there have been those of our blood who have died dumb at the stake before now; but, again and again, leaning down from the balcony, I could have answered the storm-wind with a shriek; and all I could do was to go up and down the short space, with hands clenched and every muscle strained. Yet at every turn I saw them, unmoved by the gathering tempest, scarce heeding it, absorbed in their game, the centre of a sphere of softened light. They had brightness, comfort, each other. Outside, my heart and I, alone, waited the storm.

What a picture she made! I dashed color over myself in a flood; she wore the bright hues that suited her, delicately. Against her white dress dropped some sprays of scarlet blossoms; great, lurid, earthy carbuncles burned among her laces. All that mass of bronze-brown hair, gathered half in braids, half in ringlets, shone burnished by the lamp-light. What a passionless, perfect bit she seemed!—the throned poise of her lithe figure, her intent face unconscious and calm, the long lashes lying almost on her cheek as she studied her moves, the taper hand hovering over the board. That was another difference. I could never master that game or any other where forethought and cool calculation were to be used. She was the best player in three counties—the best for a woman—and Earl was worthy of her steel.

The first dash of rain stung my face sharply. I turned and went in, passing them unnoticed to the great piano standing in half-darkness in a corner. I played thunderous chords, rattling band-marches, stormy fantasias, every thing I had ever heard that was slashing and noisy. It shattered the silence, broke over their absorption. "Don't, Bertha," I rather guessed than heard with a fretted look on Earl's face. But I thought of Laura's music, her trilled harmonies, Grobe's sweetnesses, Gottschalk's insipidities, and found more crashing possibilities among the keys. Earl did not speak again, settling to his game with a vexed look of determination. Laura raised her broad lids and looked at me with one of her sweet, cool, superior smiles, said some word to him, and moved a pawn, with that smile lingering among her dimples.

I suppose she knew it would drive me off at last. Not to spoil her hateful beauty with some cruel blow, not to speak words that might curse me in the remembrance, I went out again. Earl raised his eyes as I passed; a look came into them that made me gasp with a feeling that I was choking. He half rose, his lips parted to speak.

I saw Laura's face. For just one breath it was white with a rage that I never thought her capable of. The soft eyes flashed blue lightnings, then the lids dropped.

"It is your move," she said, silverly. "What will you do?" and he sat down again. An hour longer they played, and the storm went on. I did not mind it much. The wind did not reach me, and the great drops that now and then fell on my head and face cooled me unawares. The tossed sea, the crash of the surf, helped me to bear and wait. From my corner I watched the final struggle. In Earl's face I saw that he was driven from point after point, advantage after advantage.

She swept her men aside with a rattle. "I've won," and the suspended breath came with a gasp.

"Yes"—his voice was smothered. Then he bent over her white hand, and kissed it with determined fervor.

The diamond that had flashed remembrance into my eyes for three months hurt me as if it scorched. I took it off. My fingers were too rigid to be gentle in their movements; the sharp edges of the setting brought blood. The pain and the sight of the red drops brought me to myself. I went in—in from the night, and dark, and storm, to their white circle of warmth and light. Laura's shining eyes surveyed me standing in the doorway. They drew him; and even in that spasm of self-reproach I think he marked the difference between the old love and the new. I knew it myself; my torn drapery, wet and clinging with the rain, my slipping braids and stormy face, above all, the moods of which he had complained less than an hour ago—what chance had I beside that serene beauty?

I did not hate her then. There was no room in my heart for any thing but that numb, deadly ache. The world had gone to pieces under my feet. There was no foothold of solid ground in the universe. For a fortnight I had struggled as men do for their lives. That was over—I had come to quiet, a quiet that one who hopes never reaches.

I dropped the ring on the table before them, and the jewel, stained as it was, flashed broken sheets of flame.

"Oh, Bertha!" and there was that in his tone that was worse than a blow. Like a blow it stung me with new pain and new strength. Once more his head was against my shoulder, once more my lips pressed his. Laura started forward as if she feared to lose her prize; but I could heed only his face, white to the lips, his brown eyes full of tears. Then I left them, and from the door saw her kneeling beside his chair, her beautiful head against his arm.

I saw no one that night or the next day. So much time I would have for myself. There were knocks and voices, but they did not touch the darkness and silence where I lay. So much time to myself; then to the house claims again. How the unyielding, monotonous requirements of everyday life turn to blessings when they stand between us and the waves and billows that but for such slight bulwarks would sweep us into despair!

The summer drifted away. Earl came and went, and seemed never to tire of his new choice. Why should he? He needed some calm whereon to rest his impulses and enthusiasms. I had given him storms enough, Heaven knows; and Laura never had tempers, or if she had, she shut them up in her own room and was always serenely sweet, a model of dainty dressing for him. We saw little of each other. We did not harmonize, and there was little need of contact. The width of the house separated our rooms. She slept hours after father's early breakfast, and took her coffee where it happened. At dinner we sat in polite state, and I talked to father unless there were visitors. For the rest of the day she went her way and I mine—ways that were lives apart. I did not hate her. When she came, as she did now and then, and brought her work to my room, I talked to her as I might have done to any bare acquaintance. It was not hard, for she never looked at me—fingers and eyes were always busy with some miraculous needle doings.

I would not let her touch my life. What fate had given me to bear I bore as well as I could; always alone. For grief or for comfort that woman would never come near me.

She bore the winning side well. After that night never one word or look betrayed that she knew that her love had crossed mine. When we spoke of Earl, and we did often, it was openly and quietly.

And he read me as men do read women. He believed so firmly in my pride that he thought I had not a memory or a heartache left. I am proud. I never betrayed myself. Once father stopped me as I was leaving the library. "Is Earl going to marry Laura?" his keen eyes reading me.

"Yes, Sir, I suppose so." The bare truth did not make me falter.

"Bertha, I thought—"

"Yes, but we changed our minds, Earl and I," and that was all that was ever said about it.

Late in August there came a telegram to me one day. I was to meet the six o'clock express with the easiest carriage and pillows. I told Laura when the horses were at the door, and my hat on. "I will go with you," she said; and there was something of that once-seen fire smouldering in her eyes.

"I did not ask you. I do not want you."

"But I will go," she broke out, passionately. Then she checked herself. "It will seem so strange, will it not?"

But she did not go.

Earl had been a soldier. Long ago, in the last year of the war, he had been wounded. It was not so very bad, no actual bone-fracture, and he was up and about, and back to his post before we were used to having him an invalid. But he had never been really well since. The cure was too sudden to be radical. And now after all this time, with the hot weather and worry—he had grown to be care-taking of late, for he was poor, and Laura loved money and fame—the miserable hurt had re-opened. Father almost carried him in his arms from the car to the carriage. Three weeks of "slight illness" that he had written us about had done that for him. I turned my head away, and spoke not a word. I knew there would be demonstration enough up to the house, and there was, but I kept out of its way.

It was strange to have him in the house, and so quiet. He lay for hours on a couch by the open window or on the breezy veranda, listening while Laura read or sang or talked in that exquisite voice of hers. She was not much of a nurse. She did her utmost in keeping herself pretty, and sunshiny, and sweet-tempered; and so he was satisfied no one else had any right to fault-finding.

I did not think he grew worse. I knew the will that ran in his blood, and knew that he had probably been as ill as now days and days that he was on his feet and at work. He seemed weaker and more languid than when he came, but the excitement of the journey had worn off, and he was giving up to care and rest.

But father, coming home from a few days' absence, pronounced a different sentence, and the next day we began our journey to that other home we sometimes occupied; by the sea-side still, but in steadier sunshine and softer airs. He rallied there. He was promoted to crutches, and we tried to laugh at the strong-limbed, active fellow's awkward attempts at locomotion. Once he slipped and fell, and Laura screamed and hid her face; and through the shock and pain that turned his lips ashy, he found words of assurance for her.

Days of prostration followed. The surgeon made frequent silent visits. The unworried apprehension that gathered around the invalid's room shadowed the whole house. This was Earl's native place, and every one petted and spoiled him, for it was one of those little hamlets where every body knows every body else. I had not realized how the careless, manly boy had grown into all hearts. There was little time in the whole day when some visitor was not in the house, and he was the recipient of more bouquets and baskets of summer-fruit than if he had been a reigning belle.

I am afraid I had not much patience with Laura in those days. We were all sad enough with an unvoiced dread that we dared not meet openly. But all her sunny calm was broken up into petulant outbreaks, unreasonable and violent enough to have been ill-nature under any other circumstances. That is, when she was away from him and was not entertaining callers. Shut out, at last, from the sick-room there seemed some attraction in the parlor that sometimes stretched the evenings far toward midnight. Tacitly the entertainment of the groups that strayed in had fallen upon her. She called it a sacrifice, but she had a peculiar faculty for that sort of self-denial.

One night a long, restless day had terminated in a sleep that was as heavy as death in seeming. In the dimness his white, thin face lay sharply outlined against the scarlet cushions, and a barely perceptible breath fluttered across the parted lips. Below, Laura was the centre of a roomful, fluttering in some inimitable toilet, her sweetest and most winning in word and look. The contrast was a wide one. I believe I cried a little, quietly enough, but tears that scorched in falling.

A burst of loud laughter startled him. He opened his great hollow eyes and called her name. I went to his side. The disappointment in his voice when he spoke again was bitter to hear. My hands are always cool. For the first time since that night I laid a quiet touch on his burning forehead.

Minutes that were hours went by. He broke the silence first. "Bertha, dear sister, true friend, have you forgiven me?"

I could not lie about that, even to him. My soul cried out against the wrong he had done me. What right had he to warp and crush my whole life so, and then ask me to talk of forgiveness?

"No," I said, clearly and strongly.

He answered with a sob. He was one of those men who cry, now and then, almost as women cry. Could I bear that? I went down stairs, said a word or two to the pretty creature who was reigning in the parlor, and sent her to him. When I met her in the hall an hour later she was pale and still. We did not speak then nor for days.

Ripened September mellowed over the land. Into the sunshine crept a dreamy something that neutralized its fire. There were flitting shadows on the hill sides, even in the still noons, and in the hollows of the valleys breezes of crisp coolness. Golden-rods burned dusky lights, asters showed the purple guidons of the autumnal advance. It was an hourly surprise that the grapes were not purpling and fragrant.

The time brought healing. That miserable doctor's gig stood less frequently before the door. Laura's face cleared, we treated each other more like Christians.

We were on the beach, we three together for a wonder—Earl among the cushions of the carriage, Laura skipping smooth stones and sailing linnetts in the shallow golden pools the ebb-tide had left, I sitting on the edge of the flood gazing listlessly across its sheen.

Laura liked water as well as a cat, and managed a boat about as skillfully. But at the house she had some unfinished shell-work. Materials were wanting for its completion, and this beach did not furnish them. A few rods across the channel a rocky island had a piece of smooth shingle that the tide always left heaped with shining bits. We were not in the way of asking many favors in those days. She pushed out the light skiff, and went zigzagging off alone toward what she wanted. I saw her land safely and strolled away on the point that ran out narrowing the ebb-tide channel between the main and Laura's islet to half a good stone's-throw.

The afternoon slid half an hour nearer sunset. On the brown rock I lay absorbed in the day's wonderful coloring, hushed in the salt stillness—a stillness that was crushing with the thought of age's old monotony. Life with its tortures was a bare point beside this wide stretching, infinitely calm lapse of existence. There was no power of healing in the contrast. Our vivid lights and shadows struck sharp against the slow processes of nature, and nature threw us back as little heedless as the foam-bells that flashed up against the cliffs.

The fervid, double warmth, the hazy shimmer of reflected wave-lines, the hushing of the ripples below, lapped sense in an atmosphere of dreams. Already heavy lids dropped, sleep was coming. Then, sudden and shrill, a shriek shattered the silence. A woman's voice—piercing, full of utter fear and appeal.

The boat was drifting empty, a something deeper blue against the sun-dazzle, wasting strength with scream after scream, and senseless, desperate struggles, was Laura.

I was on my feet. Then to my ears came Earl's voice, clear and steady, shouting some direction, which she was too frenzied to heed. Then he called my name: "Bertha! Bertha! Where are you? Help! She's drowning!"

With that sound all the helping hurry that was racing in my veins died out. Like a red-hot blow the sense struck me of the cruel, hopeless wrong that woman had done me. What was she that her pretty face, and sweet ways, and shallow heart should stand between me and all that was good of life? Let her sink, and with her the nightmare that had cursed these latter days with drearful loss and loneliness. A cold rigidity settled upon me. I sat down, and turned away toward the west, aglow with deepest splendors. How I hated her! A blind, intense sense of revenge had at one bound filled my whole soul with its bitterness. I did not think. Looking back at that time, it comforts me a little to believe that in that whirl reason had no share. Time that seemed an age went by. The shrieks died in a half-choked, bubbling sob almost under my feet, and silence fell. That broke the spell.

Heaven knows that for that instant I felt what murderers feel. To the last minute of my life I shall carry with me the picture that burned itself unto my brain as I turned.

The tide was past the half-ebb. The current, sweeping round the point, had carried her down close by me—the colorless face, set and distorted with despair, the streaming hair on the water, the white, up-tossed arms, that look in the eyes that met mine before she sank. Whatever sin was in the mad passion that had possessed me, the memory of those eyes will be punishment enough through all time.

It was a desperate chance; but I had left myself no right to count chances. I plunged, and grasped the light drapery as she went down. I am a strong swimmer, but the tide set out like a race-horse. Her clinging arms, closing about me before I could avoid it, fettered and dragged me down. In that wild struggle for my own life I did not lose thought of her for an instant. Then the sky swung back and forth, the brown cliffs, with their violet tinges, ran by like lightning; there was a roar and a hiss in my ears, and blackness swallowed me.

It cleared again, when I lay drenched and soaking on the beach, lifeless as a sponge. Laura was outstretched a dozen steps away, all her pink prettiness gone, but her blue eyes open and her breath coming in little gasps. It was not at all terrible. We had slipped past that and gone to the other extreme. The two sodden bundles that we were, slowly coming back to sense again in the sunshine, had very little of the tragic element. Only the thought of the might-have-been, the dreadful possibility that only Heaven's mercy had saved me from, made me turn my face to the wet sand, and sob out a prayer of thanks that she had been spared.

Two men carried a dark form past us. Earl, who had not walked a step for weeks, had struggled from the carriage, forgetting his worse than helplessness, and had sunk senseless at the edge of the tide just as we—Laura and I—went under.

Two days afterward there was a consultation of surgeons at the house. Laura was an invalid in her chamber, being nursed, and petted, and waited on—a heroine of a great escape. I was busy dusting. From that little corner room, the room where I had watched the two on the night of storm, the murmur of voices reached me as those grave-faced men weighed chances, measured possibilities. I went on with my work, because just then idle waiting was utterly beyond me.

There was a hush directly, and a little bustle of rising. Father and Dr. Morris came down. I had no words of questioning.

"Immediate amputation," father said, roughly, as they passed me. They looked back from two steps beyond.

"Are you going to faint, girl?" Father's fingers clutched my arm savagely. Poor father! His own face was pale enough, and his voice a husky whisper. Dr. Morris dashed something sharply strong and stimulant in my face, and I dragged myself up to my room.

Laura burst in a few hours later, and dropped down on my bed a heap of tears and sobs. "It's over," she said. "Pity me."

Pity her—did I not? I thought of the surgeon's knife busy with that proud, strong frame, and shuddered with a sickness of horror. Maimed and helpless, his suffering—and through it hers—swept away all selfishness. Kneeling beside her my tears ran with hers. I am not given to crying. It was a blessedness of relief that left my brain cool and steady. Then I soothed her, as I might have done a child, with just such prospects of comfort. He had not felt the pain, mercifully stupefied; she would always be with him, to care for and help him.

She went off again into a doleful little groan. "It's just that. To be tied all my life long to a cripple. He will have to use crutches always, you know. And I'm so young," whining out her self-pity.

Not one thought of the strong life broken, not one word for his wrecked prospects and crushed hopes. The utter, complete meanness of the creature dried my tears like a flash. I devoutly trust that she profited by the shaking I administered before I dropped her outside the door and shot the bolts behind her.

My work of nurse began immediately. Dr. Morris called me down. "If he lives, it will be the nurse's work, not mine," he said, holding me in the strong cross-light of the open windows. "You'll do, I think."

In the darkened room the feeble life balanced back and forth with the faint, flowing breath for what seemed endless hours. A strange face or voice, a sudden noise, too rough a current of air, might extinguish the barely existent vitality. I sat motionless by his bedside, watching every shadow of change on the ghastly face. I can not tell if I hoped for one thing or the other. Death, with its loss and anguish for us; life, with its misery of disappointment for him; for that thing up stairs would break his heart if the grave spared him. I dared not choose.

When the surgeon went out next morning Laura's maid slipped a card into my hand. Some urgent summons called her away. They would not let her see him or me. Her farewells were entrusted to me.

After that I possessed the room absolutely. No one disputed my right, no one countermanded my orders. His life was in my hands, and the whole house waited.

On the morning of the fourth day Dr. Morris drew me out into the hall. "Go to your room, and go to bed. We shall bring him through." And I went up stairs, and for fifteen blessed hours slept the sleep of the just.

No word from Laura for ten days. Heaven pardon me the lies I told during the time. It was a week before I dared tell him she was out of the house.

The confinement wore on me. I was not used to it. Rebellious nerves demanded out-of-door relief. Three miles down the sands and back, at Clip's swinging gallop, gave me my balance again. But in the space a blunder had wrought its legitimate effect. An over-officious servant had carried letters to Earl's room. Among them lay the secret of the change that had thrown him into raving delirium. I crumpled the scented, filmy sheet in my hand, and tossed it away with a feeling in my heart I dared not name.

What need of going to the end? One midnight there was a cry made. Two servants were whispering in the passage.

"The tide is just on the turn," one said.

And as the tide fell the flush of fever died away, the strained eyes cleared into sorrowful calm. He knew me, and his last words were for me, words that I shall keep in my heart forever. When the gray morning broke all the long-closed windows were wide open, sunshine and keen air held no harm for the white face and still outlines on the bed.

And for me—I wait.

FRUITIONLESS.

Ah, little flower, that springeth, azure-eyed,
The meadow-brook beside:
Dropping delicious balms
Into the tender palms

Of lover-winds, that woo with light caress;
In still contentedness,
Living and blooming thy brief summer day.
So wiser far than I,
That only dream and sigh,
And sighing, dream my idle life away!

Ah, sweet-heart birds, a-building your wee house

In the broad-leaved boughs,
Pausing with merry trill
To praise each other's skill,
And nod your pretty heads with pretty pride:
Serenely satisfied

To trill and twitter love's sweet roundelay.
So happier far than I,
That sadly dream and sigh,
And sighing, dream my lonely life away.

Brown-bodied bees, that scent with nostrils fine
The odorous blossom-wine;
Sipping, with heads half thrust
Into the pollen-dust

Of roses, hyacinths, and daffodils:
To hive, in amber cells,
A honey-feasting for the winter day.
So better far than I,
Self-wrapt, that dream and sigh,
And sighing, dream my useless life away!

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Tuesday.—Yes, the wedding was a very stylish affair, and may be considered a "decided success." The church was filled with admiring and inquisitive spectators; and, of course, every eye was leveled at the bride and bridegroom as they slowly passed up the aisle. They were prepared for the attack, however, and did not flinch; and every one, commencing with the orange wreath, scrutinized the bridal attire. And certainly, the rich, white satin robe, with its graceful train, and elegant point lace over-dress and veil, the diamond necklace, and all the delicate details of dress, well merited attention. The bridesmaids, also, were handsomely arrayed in white silk, with lace over-dresses—all white, except the novel addition of leaves of Bismarck brown, as a fastening to the half-veils they wore. Now, by common consent, it is understood that whatever wedding paraphernalia a bride chooses to exhibit is free to inspection; but, really, I thought curiosity was going a step too far when, the service being over, I overheard one lady (?) say to her companion, "How shall we see her stockings?" The answer escaped me. "But," persisted the first speaker, "she has thread lace stockings, and I want to see them!"

Après, while on bridal toilets, the Queen of Greece at her wedding wore a robe of silver cloth, embroidered with bouquets of silver flowers, buttoned down the front by enormous diamonds, fastened round the waist by a belt in the Greek pattern of diamonds, a smaller trimming to match running round the top of the corsage and sleeves; necklace, bracelets, etc., in diamonds, a diadem on the forehead, while the royal crown in diamonds was fastened at the back of the bride's head, and the train, of several yards in length, was of crimson velvet lined with ermine.

Respecting trains, some followers of fashion can not comprehend that trains are admissible appendages to house and carriage dresses, but not to street dresses. A Boston paper, remarking on that "superfluous extremity of a lady's dress which gathers up odorous richness from the flag-stones and pavement," thinks that when a gentleman steps on it in the street neither he nor the lady should apologize; because while the lady has an undoubted right to cover an unlimited amount of space with her straggling dry-goods, the gentleman has an inalienable right to step in that space covered or uncovered. But while the present fashion prevails in the drawing-room gentlemen had better be watchful; indeed I think the chief utility of this style of dress consists in its constantly developing in them that care and tact, which, if given them by nature, is generally "laid up in a napkin."

Wednesday Morning.—A Western journal writes a column about "Ladies" and "Women;" and thinks a revised edition of the poets will soon be issued with such amendments as these:

"Frailty! thy name is lady."

"Oh, lady, in our hours of ease, Uncertain, coy, and hard to please."

"I now see
Bone of my bone, flesh of my flesh,
Before me: Lady is her name."

It concludes that soon the bridegroom will be compelled to confess that he "takes this lady to be his wedded lady," and that "washer-ladies" will do up our linen for us. On the same principle "fire-gentlemen" will be expected to extinguish our conflagrations, and "work-gentlemen" build our houses and railroads. There is much good sense in the article, which concludes with the hope we may "have more true men and women in American society, and fewer counterfeit ladies and gentlemen." Nevertheless society is not yet ready for a wholesale abandonment of the words "lady" and "gentleman." Both good usage and strict definition approve them. The words "lady" and "woman" are sometimes synonymous, and sometimes not. Woman is the generic term, and often the most complimentary one. Each has its peculiar meaning, and each may be used with equal appropriateness, as occasion requires. So with the derivatives—"lady-like" does not mean "womanly," though to be "womanly" may be the most desirable. The good old words "man" and "woman" are noble ones; but there is no need of affectation and conceit being attached to the use of the other words "lady" and "gentleman."

The following recipe for cooking lobsters dates back to 1381:

"For to make a Lopister. He schal be rostyd in his scalyis in a ovyen, other by the Feer under a panne, and etyn wyth Veneger."

It is curious to learn how long it took mankind to discover the most obvious conveniences of civilized life. Sleep seems to have been invented in the Garden of Eden; but one of the greatest improvements in the art of sleeping was introduced by the Greeks, namely, the practice of undressing before going to bed, a thing unheard of until hit upon by their inventive genius. Even now there are nations who never enjoy the luxury of taking off their clothes at night. The Romans went to bed to eat their dinners, and there are whole races now who don't know enough to sit down like rational beings. The Romans went to bed early because they hadn't genius enough to invent a candle. They trundled off to bed as the darkness began; and in Athens, Egypt, Palestine, Asia Minor, every where, the ancients went to bed, like good boys, from seven to nine o'clock. Even so simple a matter as breakfast was not invented for several centuries after the republican era of Rome. It took as much time and research to arrive at that great discovery as at the Copernican system. The morning meal of the Romans was but a bite of biscuit—tea and coffee had not been heard of then. Probably our descendants, some centuries hence, will laugh at our ignorance of many of the conveniences of life that will then be in vogue.

Thursday Eve.—A little incident I read to-night illustrates the folly of keeping up such a rigid distinction of denominations as is common among many who call themselves Christians, and is a grave rebuke to all who would allow minor points of belief to take the place of true religion. During the late war a soldier, who had been fearfully wounded, lay in one of our hospitals, dying in agony. A visitor wishing to impart religious consolation, asked him, "What church are you of?" "Of the church of Christ," he replied. "I mean of what persuasion are you?" then inquired the visitor. "Persuasion!" said the dying man, looking heavenward, his eyes beaming with love to the Saviour, "I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate me from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus." The visitor found the dying soldier had reached that point where creeds were useless, and Christ was all.

A recent work, giving some account of the present condition of woman in India, has interested me. It seems that a great number of girls, in certain parts of India, are still murdered immediately after birth. The wife of an Indian rajah having had five daughters put to death by the father's command, resolved to save the sixth, and it was reared in secret. She grew up to be very beautiful, so much so that the relatives who had concealed her believed that they might present her to her father. If they could not rely on the father's heart, yet her beautiful innocence they thought would secure her life; the more so as she was the perfect image of her deceased mother. A favorable moment was chosen to introduce to the father his child. Richly attired she approached the astonished chief, fell down at his feet, and exclaimed: "My dear father!" And the father? For a moment love struggled in his bosom with his usual proud, hard feelings, but he drew his sword from its sheath, and with a blow struck off the head of the lovely child!

Friday Eve.—What a wealth of new books the holiday season unfolds! It is as good as a novel to me to read over even the catalogues; and to-day, while visiting some of the book-stores with Miss D., I really revelled in the sight of the daintily-bound volumes. If by chance I had carried my Christmas purse with me, there wouldn't have been a farthing left for dolls and sugar-plums! One package has just come, and the bright-covered books are scattered over my table—a forerunner of Christmas. Let me see—can I recall one-half the new and choice volumes my eyes have glanced over to-day? Don't think I can—my head is pleasantly puzzled with visions of superbly-illustrated gift-books, of poems, serious and humorous, of entertaining novels, fascinating fairy-books, solid books of information, fresh biographies and histories, and every thing of every name from "Prayers of the Ages," and "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," to the "Manual of Physical Exercise" and "The Philosophy of Eating."

Among poems "Kathrina" still holds its place, and a pretty gift-book it is. Phæbe Cary's "Poems of Faith, Hope, and Love" are very sweet. There are many choice gems in Tilton's "Sexton's Tale and other Poems;" nor is it by any means a gloomy volume, as the title might indicate. "The Lover's Dictionary" consists of the choicest selection of "love-thoughts." These poems have been culled from standard authors, from rare and ancient collections, as well as from private sources. "And it is quite true that 'nothing has been admitted into these pages which can wound the many pure, bright eyes which will read them.' It is elaborately and conveniently arranged for reference, and would be an appropriate gift to any one who enjoys gems of poetry. "Love-Letters" is a curious selection from the correspondence of celebrated men and women in every age; and contains also biographical sketches of the authors. "Sunday Poetry" is a dainty little volume, and its choice bits will delight many readers. Tennyson's "Vivien" and "Guinevere" have been elegantly illustrated by Gustave Doré. The quaintly-written "Legends of St. Gwendoline," "The Fables of Æsop," "The Household Book of Poetry," "The Story without an End," and numerous other finely-illustrated books tempted my fancy and my purse to-day.

But the little folks must have the cream at Christmas, and it is ready for them. The mere names will create an appetite among the small fry. "Chitchat," "Story of a Basket," "Will-o'-the-Wisp," "Boy Artists," "Shink Shank," "Schnick Schnack," etc., etc. "Oliver Optic" has something for boys; and "Little Pitchers Have Big Ears," "Queer Little People," and "Dotty Dimple" will charm the smallest—while among Fairy stories none will fascinate both old and young more than Mac's "Home Fairy Tales," with its choice illustrations and attractive style. And for the little children "Folks and Fairies" will be just the thing.

As to novels and sundry other books of "rhyme and reason," I could easily fill my diary with the mere names of those I have seen to-day; but it grows late, and I am longing, not to sleep, but to read more fully the books before me.

Tatting Figures for Veil.

See illustration on double page.

THESE two figures are intended for ornamenting the veil, and are sewed upon the lace at regular intervals. The first is done with black silk. Make 2 double stitches and 1 picot or purl stitch, repeat 6 times (double stitches have one stitch to the right, one to the left), draw into a loop. *, attach the thread to the last picot, then follow with a Josephine knot or shell; for this make 6 stitches to the right, put the shuttle through the loop in the direction from above downward, pull the stitches close together; repeat 3 times from *, then attach the thread to the next picot. Make a loop, 1 picot separated by 2 double stitches; repeat this last 8 times; attach the thread to the same picot, and make again a Josephine knot; after which draw it up. Follow with 2 more similar loops separated by a Josephine knot. In the place of the 1st picot they are attached to the last picot of the former loop. After the last loop the thread is fastened.

For the second figure make a loop of 25 double stitches each separated by a picot; attach the beginning thread to the end thread, cut both threads at about the distance of one inch, then make a smaller loop of 8 double stitches, and separate each by a picot. However, in place of the first picot attach the thread to the 2d picot of the large ring. The threads of this loop are also tied together and cut off. Finally make a loop of 11 double stitches, and attach the thread to the 20th picot of the large loop. Make 5 more double stitches and finish the loop, then put the thread of all the loops together and work them over with fine silk, close and fine: the stem is made in this manner. The figures being finished they may now be sewed on the lace.

Tatting Edging for Veil.

See illustration on double page.

FOR this lace make a sufficient number of set figures, as shown in illustration. Join them to each other by attaching the 1st loop of the 2d figure to the 3d picot before the last in the 3d loop of the former figure. The 1st and 3d picots of the 1st and the 5th and 7th picots of the 3d of the three loops belonging together must be one-fifth of an inch long, as in the engraving. Fill the space between every 2 figures with a row of rings. Work for this purpose 2 double stitches, 1 long picot (all the picots of these rings must be long), 3 double, 1 picot, 3 double. In place of the 3d picot attach the thread to the 3d picot of the former loop of one of the figures. Again make three double; attach the thread to the one long picot of the same loop, 3 double, attach the thread between the 2 Josephine knots, make 2 double, draw up the loop, without cutting the thread, make the next loop between the 1st and 2d figures corresponding to the 1st loop, as in the engraving, attach the thread each time in the place of the picot to the respective long picot and to the joining thread between the Josephine knots. For the upper edge of the lace, crochet two rows as follows: 1 double crochet, 3 chain. In the 1st row, make the double crochet stitches at proper distances around the last made loops and in the thread, joining the Josephine knots, at the same time over the joining thread of the 2 loops. In the second row, the double crochet is to be made in the middle of the chain stitch.

Chenille and Satin Stitch Trimming.

See illustration on double page.

THIS trimming is used for hoods, waists, jackets, etc. The embroidery is executed with brown flosselle or crochet silk in two different shades and black chenille. The Greek pattern is first worked with the former in satin stitch; this is then edged with chain stitch of crochet silk, in a lighter shade, and the whole is encircled with chenille, which also separates the two rows of Greek lines. This trimming is very effective when wrought in the Turkish fashion; for instance, the Greek figures of different colors, the chain stitch of gold, and the chenille of black.

Trimming for Waists, Fichus, Etc.

See illustration on double page.

THIS trimming is simple and pretty for waists, fichus, etc., as well as for children's dresses. For articles designed to be washed it should be made of narrow white worsted braid, sewed on in points, with a figure worked in point russe, with white worsted at the end of each braid, and a blue ribbon run loosely through the points. For woollen stuffs worsted or silk braid should be used, and the point russe should be executed in silk.

Boy's Cap with Vizor.

See illustration on double page.

THIS cap is of black velvet, trimmed with fine black silk braid. Cut the foundation of buckram, three or four layers thick, from the pattern; then cut from Figs. 22-24 and Fig. 22, one piece each of black velvet and black lining silk, and from Fig. 25, the front of velvet and brown morocco. Join the crown and brim with the figures on the pattern, and trim the front with three rows of braid. Baste the parts of the vizor together, sew braid round the edge, and join it to the cap to correspond with the figures and the dotted line on the pattern. Lastly, join Fig. 26 thereto, and face the cap on the inside with a strip of morocco two inches wide.

Valenciennes Tulle Waist.

See illustration on double page.

THIS waist is made of a new kind of tulle simulating the texture of Valenciennes lace, whence its name. The trimming consists of a lilac ribbon, an inch in width, laid under a puff of plain tulle, which forms a frill on each side about half an inch in width. For this trimming take a straight strip of tulle three inches wide and twice as long as is desired for the puff; hem each side narrow, and gather it so as to form the before-mentioned frill on either side. The neck and sleeves are trimmed with bows and ends of lilac ribbon. The waist is cut from the pattern, Figs. 7-10, Supplement.

Cashmere Waist.

See illustration on double page.

THIS waist, of lilac cashmere, is cut from Figs. 7-10 in the Supplement. The tasteful trimming consists of several bias folds of lilac cashmere, about a quarter of an inch wide, edged on each side with very narrow lilac silk piping, with a heading of black and white silk gimp. The collar is likewise trimmed with gimp and edged at the top with lilac piping. The illustration shows the manner of arranging the trimming.

NO THOROUGHFARE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS AND WILKIE COLLINS.

IN FOUR ACTS.

THE OVERTURE.

DAY of the month and year, November the thirtieth, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five. London Time by the great clock of Saint Paul's, ten at night. All the lesser London churches strain their metallic throats. Some flippantly begin before the heavy bell of the great cathedral; some tardily begin three, four, half a dozen strokes behind it; all are in sufficiently near accord to leave a resonance in the air, as if the winged father who devours his children had made a sounding sweep with his gigantic scythe in flying over the city.

What is this clock lower than most of the rest, and nearer to the ear, that lags so far behind to-night as to strike into the vibration alone? This is the clock of the Hospital for Foundling Children. Time was when the Foundlings were received without question in a cradle at the gate. Time is when inquiries are made respecting them, and they are taken as by favor from the mothers who relinquish all natural knowledge of them and claim to them forevermore.

The moon is at the full, and the night is fair with light clouds. The day has been otherwise than fair, for slush and mud, thickened with the droppings of heavy fog, lie black in the streets. The veiled lady who flutters up and down near the postern-gate of the Hospital for Foundling Children has need to be well shod to-night.

She flutters to and fro, avoiding the stand of hackney-coaches, and often pausing in the shadow of the western end of the great quadrangle wall, with her face turned toward the gate. As above her there is the purity of the moonlit sky, and below her there are the defilements of the pavement, so may she, haply, be divided in her mind between two vistas of reflection or experience? As her footprints, crossing and recrossing one another, have made a labyrinth in the mire, so may her track in life have involved itself in an intricate and unraveled tangle?

The postern gate of the Hospital for Foundling Children opens, and a young woman comes out. The lady stands aside, observes closely, sees that the gate is quietly closed again from within, and follows the young woman.

Two or three streets have been traversed in silence before she, following close behind the object of her attention, stretches out her hand and touches her. Then the young woman stops and looks round, startled.

"You touched me last night, and when I turned my head, you would not speak. Why do you follow me like a silent ghost?"

"It was not," returned the lady, in a low voice, "that I would not speak, but that I could not when I tried."

"What do you want of me? I have never done you any harm?"

"Never."

"Do I know you?"

"No."

"Then what can you want of me?"

"Here are two guineas in this paper. Take my poor little present, and I will tell you."

Into the young woman's face, which is honest and comely, comes a flush as she replies: "There is neither grown person nor child, in all the large establishment that I belong to, who hasn't a good word for Sally. I am Sally. Could I be so well thought of, if I was to be bought?"

"I do not mean to buy you; I mean only to reward you very slightly."

Sally firmly, but not ungently, closes and puts back the offering hand. "If there is any thing I can do for you, ma'am, that I will not do for its own sake, you are much mistaken in me if you think that I will do it for money. What is it you want?"

"You are one of the nurses or attendants at the Hospital; I saw you leave to-night and last night."

"Yes, I am. I am Sally."

"There is a pleasant patience in your face which makes me believe that very young children would take readily to you."

"God bless 'em! So they do."

The lady lifts her veil, and shows a face no older than the nurse's. A face far more refined and capable than hers, but wild and worn with sorrow.

"I am the miserable mother of a baby lately received under your care. I have a prayer to make to you."

Instinctively respecting the confidence which has drawn aside the veil, Sally—whose ways are all ways of simplicity and spontaneity—replaces it, and begins to cry.

"You will listen to my prayer?" the lady urges. "You will not be deaf to the agonized entreaty of such a broken suppliant as I am?"

"O dear, dear, dear!" cries Sally. "What shall I say, or can I say! Don't talk of prayers. Prayers are to be put up to the Good Father of All, and not to nurses and such. And there! I am only to hold my place for half a year longer, till another young woman can be trained up to it. I am going to be married. I shouldn't have been out last night, and I shouldn't have been out to-night, but that my Dick (he is the young man I am going to be married to) lies ill, and I help his mother and sister to watch him. Don't take on so, don't take on so!"

"O good Sally, dear Sally," moans the lady, catching at her dress entreatingly. "As you are hopeful and I am hopeless,—as a fair way in life is before you, which can never, never, be before me,—as you can aspire to become a respected wife, and as you can aspire to become a proud mother,—as you are a living, loving woman, and must die,—for God's sake hear my distracted petition!"

"Deary, deary, deary me!" cries Sally, her desperation culminating in the pronoun, "what am I ever to do? And there! See how you turn my own words back upon me. I tell you I am going to be married, on purpose to make it clearer to you that I am going to leave, and therefore couldn't help you if I would, Poor Thing, and you make it seem to my own self as if I was cruel in going to be married and not helping you. It ain't kind. Now, is it kind, Poor Thing?"

"Sally! Hear me, my dear. My entreaty is for no help in the future. It applies to what is past. It is only to be told in two words."

"There! This is worse and worse," cries Sally, "supposing that I understand what two words you mean."

"You do understand. What are the names they have given my poor baby? I ask no more than that. I have read of the customs of the place. He has been christened in the chapel, and registered by some surname in the book. He was received last Monday evening. What have they called him?"

Down upon her knees in the foul mud of the by-way into which they have strayed—an empty street without a thoroughfare, giving on the dark gardens of the Hospital—the lady would drop in her passionate entreaty, but that Sally prevents her.

"Don't! Don't! You make me feel as if I was setting myself up to be good. Let me look in your pretty face again. Put your two hands in mine. Now, promise. You will never ask me any thing more than the two words?"

"Never! Never!"

"You will never put them to a bad use, if I say them?"

"Never! Never!"

"Walter Wilding."

The lady lays her face upon the nurse's breast, draws her close in her embrace with both arms, murmurs a blessing and the words, "Kiss him for me!" and is gone.

DAY of the month and year, the first Sunday in October, one thousand eight hundred and forty-seven. London Time by the great clock of Saint Paul's, half past one in the afternoon. The clock of the Hospital for Foundling Children is well up with the cathedral to-day. Service in the chapel is over, and the Foundling children are at dinner.

There are numerous lookers-on at the dinner, as the custom is. There are two or three governors, whole families from the congregation, smaller groups of both sexes, individual stragglers of various degrees. The bright autumnal sun strikes freshly into the wards; and the heavy-framed windows through which it shines, and the paneled walls on which it strikes, are such windows and such walls as pervade Hogarth's pictures. The girls' refectory (including that of the younger children) is the principal attraction. Neat attendants silently glide about the orderly and silent tables; the lookers-on move or stop as the fancy takes them; comments in whispers on face such a number from such a window are not unfrequent; many of the faces are of a character to fix attention. Some of the visitors from the outside public are accustomed visitors. They have established a speaking acquaintance with the occupants of particular seats at the tables, and halt at those points to bend down and say a word or two. It is no disparagement to their kindness that those points are generally points where personal attractions are. The monotony of the long spacious rooms and the double lines of faces is agreeably relieved by these incidents, although so slight.

A veiled lady, who has no companion, goes among the company. It would seem that curiosity and opportunity have never brought her here before. She has the air of being a little troubled by the sight, and, as she goes the length of the tables, it is with a hesitating step and an uneasy manner. At length she comes to the refectory of the boys. They are so much less popular than the girls, that it is bare of visitors when she looks in at the doorway.

But just within the doorway chances to stand, inspecting, an elderly female attendant,—some order of matron or housekeeper. To whom the lady addresses natural questions, as, How many boys? At what age are they usually put out in life? Do they often take a fancy to the sea? So, lower and lower in tone, until the lady puts the question: "Which is Walter Wilding?"

Attendant's head shaken. Against the rules.

"You know which is Walter Wilding?"

So keenly does the attendant feel the closeness with which the lady's eyes examine her face, that she keeps her own eyes fast upon the floor, lest by wandering in the right direction they should betray her.

"I know which is Walter Wilding, but it is not my place, ma'am, to tell names to visitors."

"But you can show me without telling me."

The lady's hand moves quietly to the attendant's hand. Pause and silence.

"I am going to pass round the tables," says the lady's interlocutor, without seeming to address her. "Follow me with your eyes. The boy that I stop at and speak to will not matter to you. But the boy that I touch will be Walter Wilding. Say nothing more to me, and move a little away."

Quickly acting on the hint, the lady passes on into the room, and looks about her. After a few moments, the attendant, in a staid official way, walks down outside the line of tables commencing on her left hand. She goes the whole length of the line, turns, and comes back on the inside. Very slightly glancing in the lady's direction, she stops, bends forward, and speaks. The boy whom she addresses lifts his head and replies. Good-humoredly and easily, as she listens to what he says, she lays her hand upon the shoulder of the next boy on his right. That the action may be well noted, she keeps her hand on the shoulder while speaking in return, and pats it twice or thrice before moving away. She completes her tour of the tables, touching no one else, and passes out by a door at the opposite end of the long room.

Dinner is done, and the lady, too, walks down outside the line of tables commencing on her left hand, goes the whole length of the line, turns, and comes back on the inside. Other people have strolled in, fortunately for her, and stand sprinkled about. She lifts her veil, and, stopping at the touched boy, asks how old he is.

"I am twelve, ma'am," he answers, with his bright eyes fixed on hers.

"Are you well and happy?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"May you take these sweetmeats from my hand?"

"If you please to give them to me."

In stooping low for the purpose, the lady touches the boy's face with her forehead and with her hair. Then, lowering her veil again, she passes on, and passes out without looking back.

ACT I.

THE CURTAIN RISES.

IN a court-yard in the city of London, which was No Thoroughfare either for vehicles or foot-passengers,—a court-yard diverging from a steep, a slippery, and a winding street connecting Tower Street with the Middlesex shore of the Thames,—stood the place of business of Wilding & Co., wine merchants. Probably as a jocose acknowledgment of the obstructive character of this main approach, the point nearest to its base at which one could take the river (if so inodorously minded) bore the appellation Break-Neck-Stairs. The court-yard itself had likewise been descriptively entitled, in old days, Cripple Corner.

Years before the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, people had left off taking boat at Break-Neck-Stairs, and Watermen had ceased to ply there. The slimy little causeway had dropped into the river by a slow process of suicide, and two or three stumps of piles and a rusty iron mooring-ring were all that remained of the departed Break-Neck-glories. Sometimes, indeed, a laden coal barge would bump itself into the place, and certain laborious heavers, seemingly mud-engendered, would arise, deliver the cargo in the neighborhood, shove off, and vanish; but at most times the only commerce of Break-Neck-Stairs arose out of the conveyance of casks and bottles, both full and empty, both to and from the cellars of Wilding & Co., wine merchants. Even that commerce was but occasional, and through three-fourths of its rising tides the dirty, indecorous drab of a river would come solitarily oozing and lapping at the rusty ring, as if it had heard of the Doge and the Adriatic, and wanted to be married to the great conservator of its filthiness, the right honorable the Lord Mayor.

Some two hundred and fifty yards on the right, up the opposite hill (approaching it from the low ground of Break-Neck-Stairs), was Cripple Corner. There was a pump in Cripple Corner; there was a tree in Cripple Corner. All Cripple Corner belonged to Wilding & Co., wine merchants. Their cellars burrowed under it, their mansion towered over it. It really had been a mansion in the days when merchants inhabited the city, and had a ceremonious shelter to the doorway without visible support, like the sounding-board over an old pulpit. It had also a number of long narrow strips of window, so disposed in its grave brick front as to render it symmetrically ugly. It had also on its roof a cupola with a bell in it.

"When a man at five-and-twenty can put his hat on, and can say, 'This hat covers the owner of this property and of the business which is transacted on this property,' I consider, Mr. Bintrey, that, without being boastful, he may be allowed to be deeply thankful. I don't know how it may appear to you, but so it appears to me."

Thus Mr. Walter Wilding to his man of law, in his own counting-house,—taking his hat down from its peg to suit the action to the word, and hanging it up when he had done so, not to overstep the modesty of nature.

An innocent, open-speaking, unused-looking man, Mr. Walter Wilding, with a remarkably pink and white complexion, and a figure much too bulky for so young a man, though of a good stature. With crispy curling brown hair, and amiable bright blue eyes. An extremely communicative man,—a man with whom loquacity was the irrestrainable outpouring of contentment and gratitude. Mr. Bintrey, on the other hand, a cautious man with twinkling beads of eyes in a large overhanging bald head, who inwardly but intensely enjoyed the comicality of openness of speech, or hand, or heart.

"Yes," said Mr. Bintrey. "Yes. Ha, ha!"

A decanter, two wine-glasses, and a plate of biscuits stood on the desk.

"You like this forty-five-year-old port wine?" said Mr. Wilding.

"Like it?" repeated Mr. Bintrey. "Rather, sir!"

"It's from the best corner of our best forty-five-year-old bin," said Mr. Wilding.

"Thank you, sir," said Mr. Bintrey. "It's most excellent."

He laughed again, as he held up his glass and ogled it, at the highly ludicrous idea of giving away such wine.

"And now," said Wilding, with a childish enjoyment in the discussion of affairs, "I think we have got every thing straight, Mr. Bintrey."

"Every thing straight," said Bintrey.

"A partner secured—"

"Partner secured," said Bintrey.

"A housekeeper advertised for—"

"A housekeeper advertised for," said Bintrey,—"apply personally at Cripple Corner, Great Tower Street, from ten to twelve,—tomorrow, by the by."

"My late dear mother's affairs wound up—"

"Wound up," said Bintrey.

"And all charges paid."

"And all charges paid," said Bintrey, with a chuckle; probably occasioned by the droll circumstance that they had been paid without a haggle.

"The mention of my late dear mother," Mr. Wilding continued, his eyes filling with tears, and his pocket-handkerchief drying them, "unnerves me still, Mr. Bintrey. You know how I loved her, you (her lawyer) know how she loved me. The utmost love of mother and child was cherished between us, and we never experienced one moment's division or unhappiness from the time when she took me under her care. Thirteen years in all. Thirteen years under my late dear mother's care, Mr. Bintrey, and eight of them her confidentially acknowledged son! You know the story, Mr. Bintrey; who but you, sir?" Mr. Wilding sobbed, and dried his eyes, without attempt at concealment, during these remarks.

Mr. Bintrey enjoyed his comical port, and, after rolling it in his mouth: "I know the story."

"My late dear mother, Mr. Bintrey," pursued the wine merchant, "had been deeply deceived, and had cruelly suffered. But on that subject my late dear mother's lips were forever sealed. By whom deceived, or under what circumstances, Heaven only knows. My late dear mother never betrayed her betrayer."

"She had made up her mind," said Mr. Bintrey, again turning his wine on his palate, "and she could hold her peace." An amused twinkle in his eyes pretty plainly added, "A devilish deal better than you ever will!"

"Honor," said Mr. Wilding, sobbing as he quoted from the Commandments, "'thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land.' When I was in the Foundling, Mr. Bintrey, I was at such a loss how to do it, that I apprehended my days would be short in the land. But I afterward came to honor my mother deeply, profoundly. And I honor and revere her memory. For seven happy years, Mr. Bintrey," pursued Wilding, still with the same innocent catching in his breath, and the same unabashed tears, "did my excellent mother article me to my predecessors in this business, Pebbleson Nephew. Her affectionate forethought likewise apprenticed me to the Vintners' Company, and made me in time a Free Vintner, and—and—every thing else that the best of mothers could desire. When I came of age, she bestowed her inherited share in this business upon me; it was her money that afterward bought out Pebbleson Nephew, and painted in Wilding & Co.; it was she who left me every thing she possessed, but the mourning ring you wear. And yet, Mr. Bintrey," with a fresh burst of honest affection, "she is no more. It is little over half a year since she came into the Corner to read on that door-post, with her own eyes, WILDING & CO., WINE MERCHANTS. And yet she is no more!"

"Sad. But the common lot, Mr. Wilding," observed Bintrey. "At some time or other we must all be no more." He placed the forty-five-year-old port wine in the universal condition, with a relishing sigh.

"So now, Mr. Bintrey," pursued Wilding, putting away his pocket-handkerchief, and smoothing his eyelids with his fingers, "now that I can no longer show my love and honor for the dear parent to whom my heart was mysteriously turned by Nature when she first spoke to me, a strange lady, I sitting at our Sunday dinner-table in the Foundling, I can at least show that I am not ashamed of having been a Foundling, and that I, who never knew a father of my own, wish to be a father to all in my employment. Therefore," continued Wilding, becoming enthusiastic in his loquacity,—therefore, I want a thoroughly good housekeeper to undertake this dwelling-house of Wilding & Co., Wine Merchants, Cripple Corner, so that I may restore in it some of the old relations between employer and employed! So that I may live in it on the spot where my money is made! So that I may daily sit at the head of the table at which the people in my employment eat together, and may eat of the same roast and boiled, and drink of the same beer! So that the people in my employment may lodge under the same roof with me! So that we may one and all—I beg your pardon, Mr. Bintrey, but that old singing in my head has suddenly come on, and I shall feel obliged if you will lead me to the pump."

Alarmed by the excessive pinkness of his client, Mr. Bintrey lost not a moment in leading him forth into the court-yard. It was easily done, for the counting-house in which they talked together opened on to it, at one side of the dwelling-house. There the attorney pumped with a will, obedient to a sign from the client, and the client laved his head and face with both hands, and took a hearty drink. After these remedies, he declared himself much better.

"Don't let your good feelings excite you," said Bintrey, as they returned to the counting-house, and Mr. Wilding dried himself on a jack-towel behind an inner door.

"No, no. I won't," he returned, looking out of the towel. "I won't. I have not been confused, have I?"

"Not at all. Perfectly clear."

"Where did I leave off, Mr. Bintrey?"

"Well, you left off— But I wouldn't excite myself, if I was you, by taking it up again just yet."

"I'll take care. I'll take care. The singing in my head came on at where, Mr. Bintrey?"

"At roast, and boiled, and beer," answered the lawyer, prompting,—“lodging under the same roof—and one and all—”

“Ah! And one and all singing in the head together—”

“Do you know, I really would not let my good feelings excite me, if I was you,” hinted the lawyer again, anxiously. “Try some more pump.”

“No occasion, no occasion. All right, Mr. Bintrey. And one and all forming a kind of family! You see, Mr. Bintrey, I was not used in my childhood to that sort of individual existence which most individuals have led, more or less, in their childhood. After that time I became absorbed in my late dear mother. Having lost her, I find that I am more fit for being one of a body than one by myself. To be that, and at the same time to do my duty to those dependent on me, and attach them to me, has a patriarchal and pleasant air about it. I don't know how it may appear to you, Mr. Bintrey, but so it appears to me.”

“It is not I who am all-important in the case, but you,” returned Bintrey. “Consequently, how it may appear to me, is of very small importance.”

“It appears to me,” said Mr. Wilding, in a glow, “hopeful, useful, de-lightful!”

“Do you know,” hinted the lawyer, again, “I really would not ex—”

“I am not going to. Then there's Handel.”

“There's who?” asked Bintrey.

“Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Kent, Purcell, Doctor Arne, Greene, Mendelssohn. I know the choruses to those anthems by heart. Foundling Chapel Collection. Why shouldn't we learn them together!”

“Who learn them together?” asked the lawyer, rather shortly.

“Employer and employed.”

“Ay, ay!” returned Bintrey, mollified; as if he had half expected the answer to be, Lawyer and client. “That's another thing.”

“Not another thing, Mr. Bintrey! The same thing. A part of the bond among us. We will form a choir in some quiet church near the Corner here, and, having sung together of a Sunday with a relish, we will come home and take an early dinner together with a relish. The object that I have at heart now is to get this system well in action without delay, so that my new partner may find it founded when he enters on his partnership.”

“All good be with it!” exclaimed Bintrey, rising. “May it prosper! Is Joey Ladle to take a share in Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Kent, Purcell, Doctor Arne, Greene, and Mendelssohn?”

“I hope so?”

“I wish them all well out of it,” returned Bintrey, with much heartiness. “Good-bye, sir.”

They shook hands and parted. Then (first knocking with his knuckles for leave) entered to Mr. Wilding, from a door of communication between his private counting-house and that in which his clerks sat, the Head Cellarman of the cellars of Wilding & Co., Wine Merchants, and erst Head Cellarman of the cellars of Pebbleston Nephew. The Joey Ladle in question. A slow and ponderous man, of the drayman order of human architecture, dressed in a corrugated suit and bibbed apron, apparently a composite of door-mat and rhinoceros hide.

“Respecting this same boarding and lodging, Young Master Wilding,” said he.

“Yes, Joey?”

“Speaking for myself, Young Master Wilding,—and I never did speak and I never do speak for no one else,—I don't want no boarding nor yet no lodging. But if you wish to board me and to lodge me, take me. I can peck as well as most men. Where I peck, ain't so high a object with me as What I peck. Nor even so high a object with me as How Much I peck. Is all to live in the house, Young Master Wilding? The two other cellar-men, the three porters, the two 'prentices, and the odd men?”

“Yes. I hope we shall all be an united family, Joey.”

“Ah!” said Joey. “I hope they may be.”

“They? Rather say we, Joey.”

Joey Ladle shook his head. “Don't look to me to make we on it, Young Master Wilding, not at my time of life and under the circumstances which has formed my disposition. I have said to Pebbleston Nephew many a time, when they have said to me, ‘Put a livelier face upon it, Joey,’—I have said to them, ‘Gentlemen, it is all very well for you, that has been accustomed to take your wine into your systems by the convivial channel of your throats, to put a lively face upon it; but,’ I says, ‘I have been accustomed to take my wine in at the pores of the skin, and, took that way, it acts different. It acts depressing. It's one thing, gentlemen,’ I says to Pebbleston Nephew, ‘to charge your glasses in a dining-room with a Hip Hurrah and a Jolly Companions Every One, and it's another thing to be charged yourself, through the pores, in a low dark cellar and a mouldy atmosphere. It makes all the difference betwixt bubbles and vapors,’ I tells Pebbleston Nephew. And so it do. I've been a cellarman my life through, with my mind fully given to the business. What's the consequence? I'm as muddled a man as lives—you won't find a muddler man than me,—nor yet you won't find my equal in molloncolly. Sing of Filling the bumper fair, Every drop you sprinkle O'er the brow of care Smooths away a wrinkle? Yes. P'raps so. But try filling yourself through the pores, underground, when you don't want to it!”

“I am sorry to hear this, Joey. I had even thought that you might join a singing-class in the house.”

“Me, sir? No, no, Young Master Wilding, you won't catch Joey Ladle muddling the Armony. A pecking-machine, sir, is all that I am capable of proving myself, out of my cellars; but that you're welcome to, if you think it's worth your while to keep such a thing on your premises.”

“I do, Joey.”

“Say no more, sir. The Business's word is my law. And you're a going to take Young Master George Vendale partner into the old Business?”

“I am, Joey.”

“More changes, you see! But don't change the name of the Firm again. Don't do it, Young Master Wilding. It was bad luck enough to make it Yourself & Co. Better by far have left it Pebbleston Nephew, that good luck always stuck to. You should never change luck when it's good, sir.”

“At all events, I have no intention of changing the name of the House again, Joey.”

“Glad to hear it, and wish you good-day, Young Master Wilding. But you had better by half,” muttered Joey Ladle, inaudibly, as he closed the door and shook his head, “have let the name alone from the first. You had better by half have followed the luck instead of crossing it.”

ENTER THE HOUSEKEEPER.

The wine merchant sat in his dining-room next morning to receive the personal applicants for the vacant post in his establishment. It was an old-fashioned wainscoted-room; the panels ornamented with festoons of flowers carved in wood; with an oaken floor, a well-worn Turkey carpet, and dark mahogany furniture, all of which had seen service and polish under Pebbleston Nephew. The great sideboard had assisted at many business-dinners given by Pebbleston Nephew to their connection, on the principle of throwing sprats overboard to catch whales; and Pebbleston Nephew's comprehensive three-sided plate-warmer, made to fit the whole front of the large fireplace, kept watch beneath it over a sarcophagus-shaped cellaret that had in its time held many a dozen of Pebbleston Nephew's wine. But the little rubicund old bachelor with a pig-tail, whose portrait was over the sideboard (and who could be easily identified as decidedly Pebbleston and decidedly not Nephew), had retired into another sarcophagus, and the plate-warmer had grown as cold as he. So the golden and black griffins that supported the candelabra, with black balls in their mouths at the end of gilded chains, looked as if in their old age they had lost all heart for playing at ball, and were dolefully exhibiting their chains in the Missionary line of inquiry,—whether they had not earned emancipation by this time, and were not griffins and brothers?

Such a Columbus of a morning was the summer morning, that it discovered Cripple Corner. The light and warmth pierced in at the open windows, and irradiated the picture of a lady hanging over the chimney-piece, the only other decoration of the walls.

“My mother at five-and-twenty,” said Mr. Wilding to himself, as his eyes enthusiastically followed the light to the portrait's face, “I hang up here, in order that visitors may admire my mother in the bloom of her youth and beauty. My mother at fifty I hang in the seclusion of my own chamber, as a remembrance sacred to me. Oh! It's you, Jarvis!”

These latter words he addressed to a clerk who had tapped at the door and now looked in.

“Yes, sir. I merely wished to mention that it's gone ten, sir, and that there are several females in the counting-house.”

“Dear me!” said the wine merchant, deepening in the pink of his complexion and whitening in the white; “are there several? So many as several? I had better begin before there are more. I'll see them one by one, Jarvis, in the order of their arrival.”

Hastily entrenching himself in his easy-chair, at the table, behind a great inkstand, having first placed a chair on the other side of the table opposite his own seat, Mr. Wilding entered on his task with considerable trepidation.

He ran the gauntlet that must be run on any such occasion. There were the usual species of profoundly unsympathetic women, and the usual species of much too sympathetic women. There were buccaneering widows who came to seize him, and who gripped umbrellas under their arms, as if each umbrella were he, and each griper had got him. There were towering maiden ladies who had seen better days, and who came armed with clerical testimonials to their theology, as if he were Saint Peter with his keys. There were gentle maiden ladies who came to marry him. There were professional housekeepers, like non-commissioned officers, who put him through his domestic exercise, instead of submitting themselves to catechism. There were languid invalids to whom salary was not so much an object as the comforts of a private hospital. There were sensitive creatures who burst into tears on being addressed, and had to be restored with glasses of cold water. There were some respondents who came two together,—a highly promising one and a wholly unpromising one,—of whom the promising one answered all questions charmingly, until it would at last appear that she was not a candidate at all, but only the friend of the unpromising one, who had glowered in absolute silence and apparent injury.

At last, when the good wine merchant's simple heart was failing him, there entered an applicant quite different from all the rest. A woman, perhaps fifty, but looking younger, with a face remarkable for placid cheerfulness, and a manner no less remarkable for its quiet expression of equanimity of temper. Nothing in her dress could have been changed to her advantage. Nothing in the noiseless self-possession of her manner could have been changed to her advantage. Nothing could have been in better unison with both, than her voice when she answered the question, “What name shall I have the pleasure of noting down?” with the words, “My name is Sarah Goldstraw. Mrs. Goldstraw. My husband has been dead many years, and we had no family.”

Half a dozen questions had scarcely extracted as much to the purpose from any one else. The voice dwelt so agreeably on Mr. Wilding's ear, as he made his note, that he was rather long about it. When he looked up again, Mrs. Goldstraw's glance had naturally gone round the room, and now returned to him from the chimney-piece. Its expression was one of frank readiness to be questioned, and to answer straight.

“You will excuse my asking you a few questions?” said the modest wine merchant.

“O, surely, sir. Or I should have no business here.”

“Have you filled the station of housekeeper before?”

“Only once. I have lived with the same widow lady for twelve years. Ever since I lost my husband. She was an invalid, and is lately dead, which is the occasion of my now wearing black.”

“I do not doubt that she has left you the best credentials?” said Mr. Wilding.

“I hope I may say, the very best. I thought it would save trouble, sir, if I wrote down the name and address of her representatives, and brought it with me.” Laying a card on the table.

“You singularly remind me, Mrs. Goldstraw,” said Wilding, taking the card beside him, “of a manner and tone of voice that I was once acquainted with. Not of an individual,—I feel sure of that, though I can not recall what it is I have in my mind,—but of a general bearing. I ought to add, it was a kind and pleasant one.”

She smiled, as she rejoined: “At least, I am very glad of that, sir.”

“Yes,” said the wine merchant, thoughtfully repeating his last phrase, with a momentary glance at his future housekeeper, “it was a kind and pleasant one. But that is the most I can make of it. Memory is sometimes like a half-forgotten dream. I don't know how it may appear to you, Mrs. Goldstraw, but so it appears to me.”

Probably it appeared to Mrs. Goldstraw in a similar light, for she quietly assented to the proposition. Mr. Wilding then offered to put himself at once in communication with the gentleman named upon the card,—a firm of proctors in Doctors' Commons. To this Mrs. Goldstraw thankfully assented. Doctors' Commons not being far off, Mr. Wilding suggested the feasibility of Mrs. Goldstraw's looking in again, say in three hours' time. Mrs. Goldstraw readily undertook to do so. In fine, the result of Mr. Wilding's inquiries being eminently satisfactory, Mrs. Goldstraw was that afternoon engaged (on her own perfectly fair terms) to come to-morrow and set up her rest as housekeeper in Cripple Corner.

THE HOUSEKEEPER SPEAKS.

On the next day Mrs. Goldstraw arrived, to enter on her domestic duties.

Having settled herself in her own room, without troubling the servants, and without wasting time, the new housekeeper announced herself as waiting to be favored with any instructions which her master might wish to give her. The wine merchant received Mrs. Goldstraw in the dining-room, in which he had seen her on the previous day; and the usual preliminary civilities having passed on either side, the two sat down to take counsel together on the affairs of the house.

“About the meals, sir?” said Mrs. Goldstraw. “Have I a large or a small number to provide for?”

“If I can carry out a certain old-fashioned plan of mine,” replied Mr. Wilding, “you will have a large number to provide for. I am a lonely single man, Mrs. Goldstraw; and I hope to live with all the persons in my employment as if they were members of my family. Until that time comes, you will only have me and the new partner whom I expect immediately, to provide for. What my partner's habits may be, I can not yet say. But I may describe myself as a man of regular hours, with an invariable appetite that you may depend upon to an ounce.”

“About breakfast, sir?” asked Mrs. Goldstraw. “Is there any thing particular?”

She hesitated, and left the sentence unfinished. Her eyes turned slowly away from her master, and looked toward the chimney-piece. If she had been a less excellent and experienced housekeeper, Mr. Wilding might have fancied that her attention was beginning to wander at the very outset of the interview.

“Eight o'clock is my breakfast-hour,” he resumed. “It is one of my virtues to be never tired of broiled bacon, and it is one of my vices to be habitually suspicious of the freshness of eggs.” Mrs. Goldstraw looked back at him, still a little divided between her master's chimney-piece and her master. “I take tea,” Mr. Wilding went on; “and I am perhaps rather nervous and fidgety about drinking it within a certain time after it is made. If my tea stands too long—”

He hesitated, on his side, and left the sentence unfinished. If he had not been engaged in discussing a subject of such paramount interest to himself as his breakfast, Mrs. Goldstraw might have fancied that his attention was beginning to wander at the very outset of the interview.

“If your tea stands too long, sir—?” said the housekeeper, politely taking up her master's lost thread.

“If my tea stands too long,” repeated the wine merchant, mechanically, his mind getting further and further away from his breakfast, and his eyes fixing themselves more and more inquiringly on his housekeeper's face. “If my tea— Dear, dear me, Mrs. Goldstraw! what is the manner and tone of voice that you remind me of? It strikes me even more strongly to-day than it did when I saw you yesterday. What can it be?”

“What can it be?” repeated Mrs. Goldstraw.

She said the words, evidently thinking, while she spoke them, of something else. The wine merchant, still looking at her inquiringly, observed that her eyes wandered toward the chimney-piece once more. They fixed on the portrait of his mother, which hung there, and looked at it with that slight contraction of the brow which accompanies a scarcely conscious effort of memory. Mr. Wilding remarked—

“My late dear mother, when she was five-and-twenty.”

Mrs. Goldstraw thanked him with a movement of the head for being at the pains to explain the picture, and said, with a cleared brow, that it was the portrait of a very beautiful lady.

Mr. Wilding, falling back into his former perplexity, tried once more to recover that lost recollection, associated so closely, and yet so undiscernably, with his new housekeeper's voice and manner.

“Excuse my asking you a question which has nothing to do with me or my breakfast,” he said. “May I inquire if you have ever occupied any other situation than the situation of housekeeper?”

“O yes, sir. I began life as one of the nurses at the Foundling.”

“Why, that's it!” cried the wine merchant, pushing back his chair. “By Heaven! Their manner is the manner you remind me of!”

In an astonished look at him, Mrs. Goldstraw changed color, checked herself, turned her eyes upon the ground, and sat still and silent.

“What is the matter?” asked Mr. Wilding.

“Do I understand that you were in the Foundling, sir?”

“Certainly. I am not ashamed to own it.”

“Under the name you now bear?”

“Under the name of Walter Wilding.”

“And the lady—?” Mrs. Goldstraw stepped short with a look at the portrait which was now unmistakably a look of alarm.

“You mean my mother,” interrupted Mr. Wilding.

“Your—mother,” repeated the housekeeper, a little constrainedly, “removed you from the Foundling? At what age, sir?”

“At between eleven and twelve years old. It's quite a romantic adventure, Mrs. Goldstraw.”

He told the story of the lady having spoken to him while he sat at dinner with the other boys in the Foundling, and of all that had followed, in his innocently communicative way. “My poor mother could never have discovered me,” he added, “if she had not met with one of the matrons who pitied her. The matron consented to touch the boy whose name was ‘Walter Wilding’ as she went round the dinner tables,—and so my mother discovered me again, after having parted from me as an infant at the Foundling doors.”

At those words Mrs. Goldstraw's hand, resting on the table, dropped helplessly into her lap. She sat looking at her new master, with a face that had turned deadly pale, and with eyes that expressed an unutterable dismay.

“What does this mean?” asked the wine merchant. “Stop!” he cried. “Is there something else in the past time which I ought to associate with you? I remember my mother telling me of another person at the Foundling, to whose kindness she owed a debt of gratitude. When she first parted with me, as an infant, one of the nurses informed her of the name that had been given to me in the institution. You were that nurse?”

“God forgive me, sir,—I was that nurse!”

“God forgive you?”

“We had better get back, sir (if I may make so bold as to say so), to my duties in the house,” said Mrs. Goldstraw. “Your breakfast-hour is eight. Do you lunch, or dine, in the middle of the day?”

The excessive pinkness which Mr. Bintrey had noticed in his client's face began to appear there once more. Mr. Wilding put his hand to his head, and mastered some momentary confusion in that quarter, before he spoke again.

“Mrs. Goldstraw,” he said, “you are concealing something from me!”

The housekeeper obstinately repeated, “Please to favor me, sir, by saying whether you lunch, or dine, in the middle of the day?”

“I don't know what I do in the middle of the day. I can't enter into my household affairs, Mrs. Goldstraw, till I know why you regret an act of kindness to my mother which she always spoke of gratefully to the end of her life. You are not doing me a service by your silence. You are agitating me, you are alarming me, you are bringing on the singing in my head.”

His hand went up to his head again, and the pink in his face deepened by a shade or two.

“It's hard, sir, on just entering your service,” said the housekeeper, “to say what may cost me the loss of your good-will. Please to remember, and how it may, that I only speak because you have insisted on my speaking, and because I see that I am alarming you by my silence. When I told the poor lady whose portrait you have got there the name by which her infant was christened in the Foundling, I allowed myself to forget my duty, and dreadful consequences, I am afraid, have followed from it. I'll tell you the truth, as plainly as I can. A few months from the time when I had informed the lady of her baby's name, there came to our institution in the country another lady (a stranger) whose object was to adopt one of our children. She brought the needful permission with her, and after looking at a great many of the children without being able to make up her mind, she took a sudden fancy to one of the babies—a boy—under my care. Try, pray try, to compose yourself, sir! It's no use disguising it any longer. The child the stranger took away was the child of that lady whose portrait hangs there!"

Mr. Wilding started to his feet. "Impossible!" he cried out vehemently. "What are you talking about? What absurd story are you telling me now? There's her portrait! Haven't I told you so already? The portrait of my mother!"

"When that unhappy lady removed you from the Foundling, in after years," said Mrs. Goldstraw, gently, "she was the victim, and you were the victim, sir, of a dreadful mistake."

He dropped back into his chair. "The room goes round with me," he said. "My head! my head!" The housekeeper rose in alarm, and opened the windows. Before she could get to the door to call for help, a sudden burst of tears relieved the impression which had at first almost appeared to threaten his life. He signed entreatingly to Mrs. Goldstraw not to leave him. She waited until the paroxysm of weeping had worn itself out. He raised his head as he recovered himself, and looked at her with the angry unreasoning suspicion of a weak man.

"Mistake?" he said, wildly repeating her last word. "How do I know you are not mistaken yourself?"

"There is no hope that I am mistaken, sir. I will tell you why, when you are better fit to hear it."

"Now! now!"

The tone in which he spoke warned Mrs. Goldstraw that it would be cruel kindness to let him comfort himself a moment longer with the vain hope that she might be wrong. A few words more would end it,—and those few words she determined to speak.

"I have told you," she said, "that the child of the lady whose portrait hangs there was adopted in its infancy, and taken away by a stranger. I am as certain of what I say as that I am now sitting here, obliged to distress you, sir, sorely against my will. Please to carry your mind on, now, to about three months after that time. I was then at the Foundling, in London, waiting to take some children to our Institution in the country. There was a question that day about naming an infant—a boy—who had just been received. We generally named them out of the Directory. On this occasion, one of the gentlemen who managed the Hospital happened to be looking over the Register. He noticed that the name of the lady who had been adopted ('Walter Wilding') was scratched out; for the reason, of course, that the child had been removed for good from our care. 'Here's a name to let,' he said. 'Give it to the new foundling who has been received to-day.' The name was given, and the child was christened. You, sir, were that child."

The wine merchant's head dropped on his breast. "I was that child!" he said to himself, trying helplessly to fix the idea in his mind. "I was that child!"

"Not very long after you had been received into the Institution," continued Mrs. Goldstraw, "I left my station there, to be married. If you will remember that, and if you can give your mind to it, you will see for yourself how the mistake happened. Between eleven and twelve years passed before the lady whom you have believed to be your mother returned to the Foundling, and her son, and to remove him to her own home. The lady only knew that her infant had been called 'Walter Wilding.' The mistake was taken pity on her, could but point out the boy 'Walter Wilding' known in the Institution, who might have set the matter right, and away from the Foundling and all that belonged to it. There was nothing—there was really nothing—that could prevent this terrible mistake from taking place. I feel for you,—I do indeed, sir! You must think—and with reason—that it was in an evil hour that I came here (innocently enough, I'm sure), to apply for your housekeeper's place. I feel as if I was to blame,—I feel as if I ought to have had more self-command. If I had only been able to keep my face from showing you what that portrait and what your own words put into my mind, you need never, to your dying day, have known what you know now."

Mr. Wilding looked up suddenly. The inbred honesty of the man rose in protest against the housekeeper's last words. His mind seemed to steady itself, for the moment, under the shock that had fallen on it.

"Do you mean to say that you would have concealed this from me if you could?" he exclaimed.

"I hope I should always tell the truth, sir, if I was asked," said Mrs. Goldstraw. "And I know it is better for me that I should not have a secret of this sort weighing on my mind. But is it better for you? What use can it serve now?"

"What use? Why, good Lord! if your story is true—"

"Should I have told it, sir, as I am now situated, if it had not been true?"

"I beg your pardon," said the wine merchant. "You must make allowance for me. This dreadful discovery is something I can't realize even yet. We loved each other so dearly,—I felt so fondly that I was her son. She died, Mrs. Goldstraw, in my arms,—she died blessing me, as only a mother could have blessed me. And now, after all these years, to be told she was not my mother! O me, O me! I don't know what I am saying!" he cried, as the impulse of self-control under which he had spoken a moment since flickered and died out. "It was not this dreadful grief—it was something else, that I had it in my mind to speak of. Yes, yes. You surprised me—you wounded me just now. You talked as if you would have hidden this from me, if you could. Don't talk in that way again. It would have been a crime to have hidden it. You mean well, I know. I don't want to distress you—you are a kind-hearted woman. But you don't remember what my position is. She left me all that I possess, in the firm persuasion that I was her son. I am not her son. I have taken the place—I have innocently got the inheritance of another man. He must be found! How do I know he is not at this moment in misery, without bread to eat? He must be found! My only hope of bearing up against the shock that has fallen on me is the hope of doing something which she would have approved. You must know more, Mrs. Goldstraw, than you have told me yet. Who was the stranger who adopted the child? You must have heard the lady's name?"

"I never heard it, sir. I have never seen her, or heard of her, since."

"Did she say nothing when she took the child away? Search your memory. She must have said something."

"Only one thing, sir, that I can remember. It was a miserably bad season, that year; and many of the children were suffering from it. When she took the baby away, the lady said to me, laughing, 'Don't be alarmed about his health. He will be brought up in a better climate than this,—I am going to take him to Switzerland.'"

"To Switzerland? What part of Switzerland?"

"She didn't say, sir."

"Only that faint clue!" said Mr. Wilding. "And a quarter of a century has passed since the child was taken away! What am I to do?"

"I hope you won't take offense at my freedom, sir," said Mrs. Goldstraw; "but why should you distress yourself about what is to be done? He may not be alive now, for any thing you know. And if he is alive, it's not likely he can be in any distress. The lady who adopted him was a bred and born lady,—it was easy to see that. And she must have satisfied them at the Foundling that she could provide for the child, or they would never have let her take him away. If I was in your place, sir,—please to excuse my saying so,—I should comfort myself with remembering that I had loved that poor lady whose portrait you have got there,—truly loved her as my mother, and that she had truly loved me as her son. All she gave to you, she gave for the sake of that love. It never altered while she lived; and it won't alter, I'm sure, as long as you live. How can you have a better right, sir, to keep what you have got than that?"

Mr. Wilding's immovable honesty saw the fallacy in his housekeeper's point of view at a glance.

"You don't understand me," he said. "It's because I loved her that I feel it a duty—a sacred duty—to do justice to her son. If he is a living man, I must find him: for my own sake, as well as for his. I shall break down under this dreadful trial, unless I employ myself—actively, instantly employ myself—in doing what conscience tells me ought to be done. I must speak to my lawyer; I must set my lawyer at work before I sleep to-night." He approached a tube in the wall of the room, and called down through it to the office below: "Leave me for a little, Mrs. Goldstraw," he resumed; "I shall be more composed, I shall be better able to speak to you, later in the day. We shall get on well—I hope we shall get on well together—in spite of what has happened. It isn't your fault; I know it isn't your fault. There! there! shake hands; and—and do the best you can in the house—I can't talk about it now."

The door opened as Mrs. Goldstraw advanced toward it; and Mr. Jarvis appeared.

"Send for Mr. Bintrey," said the wine merchant. "Say I want to see him directly."

The clerk unconsciously suspended the execution of the order, by announcing "Mr. Vendale," and showing in the new partner in the firm of Wilding & Co.

"Pray excuse me for one moment, George Vendale," said Wilding. "I have a word to say to Jarvis. Send for Mr. Bintrey," he repeated,— "send at once."

Mr. Jarvis laid a letter on the table before he left the room.

"From our correspondents at Neuchâtel, I think, sir. The letter has got the Swiss postmark."

NEW CHARACTERS ON THE SCENE.

The words, "The Swiss postmark," following so soon upon the housekeeper's reference to Switzerland, wrought Mr. Wilding's agitation to such a remarkable height, that his new partner could not decently make a pretense of letting it pass unnoticed.

"Wilding," he asked, hurriedly, and yet stopping short and glancing around as if for some visible cause of his state of mind, "what is the matter?"

"My good George Vendale," returned the wine merchant, giving his hand with an appealing look, rather as if he wanted help to get over some obstacle, than as if he gave it in welcome or salutation,— "my good George Vendale, so much is the matter, that I shall never be myself again. It is impossible that I can ever be myself again. For, in fact, I am not myself."

The new partner, a brown-cheeked, handsome fellow, of about his own age, with a quick determined eye and an impulsive manner, retorted with natural astonishment, "Not yourself?"

"Not what I supposed myself to be," said Wilding.

"What, in the name of wonder, did you suppose yourself to be that you are not?" was the rejoinder, delivered with a cheerful frankness, inviting confidence from a more reticent man. "I may ask without impertinence, now that we are partners."

"There again!" cried Wilding, leaning back in his chair, with a lost look at the other. "Partners! I had no right to come into this business. It was never meant for me. My mother never meant it should be mine. I mean his mother meant it should be his,—if I mean anything,—or if I am any body."

"Come, come," urged his partner, after a moment's pause, and taking possession of him with that calm confidence which inspires a strong nature when it honestly desires to aid a weak one. "Whatever has gone wrong has gone wrong through no fault of yours, I am very sure. I was not in this counting-house with you under the old régime, for three years, to doubt you, Wilding. We were not younger men than we are, together, for that. Let me begin our partnership by being a serviceable partner, and setting right whatever is wrong. Has that letter anything to do with it?"

"Hah!" said Wilding, with his hand to his temple. "There again! My head! I was forgetting the coincidence. The Swiss postmark."

"At a second glance I see the letter is unopened, so it is not very likely to have much to do with the matter," said Vendale, with comforting composure. "Is it for you, or for us?"

"For us," said Wilding.

"Suppose I open it and read it aloud, to get it out of our way?"

"Thank you, thank you."

"The letter is only from our champagne-making friends, the House at Neuchâtel. 'Dear Sir. We are in receipt of yours of the 28th ult., informing us that you have taken your Mr. Vendale into partnership, whereon we beg you to receive the assurance of our felicitations. Permit us to embrace the occasion of specially commending to you M. Jules Obenreizer.' Impossible!"

Wilding looked up in quick apprehension, and cried, "Eh?"

"Impossible sort of name," returned his partner, slightly,— "Obenreizer. —Of specially commending to you M. Jules Obenreizer, of Soho Square, London (north side), henceforth fully accredited as our agent, and who has already had the honor of making the acquaintance of your Mr. Vendale, in his (said M. Obenreizer's) native country, Switzerland,—to be sure; pooh, pooh; what have I been thinking of! I remember now,—when traveling with his niece."

"With his—?" Vendale had so slurred the last word, that Wilding had not heard it.

"When traveling with his Niece. Obenreizer's Niece," said Vendale, in a somewhat superfluously lucid manner. "Niece of Obenreizer. (I met them in my first Swiss tour, traveled a little with them, and lost them for two years; met them again my Swiss tour before last, and have lost them ever since). Obenreizer. Niece of Obenreizer. To be sure! Possible sort of name, after all! 'M. Obenreizer is in possession of our absolute confidence, and we do not doubt you will esteem his merits.' Duly signed by the House, 'Defresnier et Cie.' Very well. I undertake to see M. Obenreizer presently, and clear him out of the way. That clears the Swiss postmark out of the way. So now, my dear Wilding, tell me what I can clear out of your way, and I'll find a way to clear it."

More than ready and grateful to be thus taken charge of, the honest wine merchant wrung his partner's hand, and, beginning his tale by pathetically declaring himself an impostor, told it.

"It was on this matter, no doubt, that you were sending for Bintrey when I came in?" said his partner, after reflecting.

"It was."

"He has experience and a shrewd head; I shall be anxious to know his opinion. It is bold and hazardous in me to give you mine before I know his, but I am not good at holding back. Plainly, then, I do not see these circumstances as you see them. I do not see your position as you see it. As to your being an impostor, my dear Wilding, that is simply absurd, because no man can be that without being a consenting party to an imposition. Clearly you never were so. As to your enrichment by the lady who believed you to be her son, and whom you were forced to believe, on her own showing, to be your mother, consider whether that did not arise out of the personal relations between you. You gradually became much attached to her; she gradually became much attached to you. It was on you, personally you, as I see the case, that she conferred these worldly advantages; it was from her, personally her, that you took them."

"She supposed me," objected Wilding, shaking his head, "to have a natural claim upon her, which I had not."

"I must admit that," replied his partner, "to be true. But if she had made the discovery that you have made, six months before she died, do you think it would have canceled the years you were together, and the tenderness that each of you had conceived for the other,—each on increasing knowledge of the other?"

"What I think," said Wilding, simply but stoutly holding to the bare fact, "can no more change the truth than it can bring down the sky. The truth is that I stand possessed of what was meant for another man."

"He may be dead," said Vendale.

"He may be alive," said Wilding. "And if he is alive, have I not—innocently, I grant you innocently—robbed him of enough? Have I not robbed him of all the happy time that I enjoyed in his stead? Have I not robbed him of the exquisite delight that filled my soul when that dear lady, stretching his hand toward the picture, 'told me she was my mother? Have I not robbed him of all the care she lavished on me? Have I not even robbed him of all the devotion and duty that I so proudly gave to her? Therefore it is that I ask myself, George Vendale, and I ask you, where is he? What has become of him?"

"Who can tell!"

"I must try to find out who can tell. I must institute inquiries. I must never desist from prosecuting inquiries. I will live upon the interest of my share—I ought to say his share—in this business, and will lay up the rest for him. When I find him, I may perhaps throw myself upon his generosity; but I will yield up all to him. I will, I swear. As I loved and honored her," said Wilding, reverently kissing his hand toward the picture, and then covering his eyes with it,— "as I loved and honored her, and have a world of reasons to be grateful to her!" And so broke down again.

His partner rose from the chair he had occupied, and stood beside him, with a hand softly laid upon his shoulder. "Walter, I knew you before to-day to be an upright man, with a pure conscience and a fine heart. It is very fortunate for me that I have the privilege to travel on in life so near to so trustworthy a man. I am thankful for it. Use me as your right hand, and rely upon me to the death. Don't think the worst of me if I protest to you that my uppermost feeling at present is a confused, you may call it an unreasonable one. I feel far more pity for the lady and for you, because you did not stand in your supposed relations, than I can feel for the unknown man (if he ever became a man), because he was unconsciously displaced. You have done well in sending for Mr. Bintrey. What I think will be a part of his advice, I know is the whole of mine. Do not move a step in this serious matter precipitately. The secret must be kept among us with great strictness, for to part with it lightly would be to invite fraudulent claims, to encourage a host of knaves, to let loose a flood of perjury and plotting. I have no more to say now, Walter, than to remind you that you sold me a share in your business expressly to save yourself from more work than your present health is fit for, and that I bought it expressly to do work, and mean to do it."

With these words, and a parting grip of his partner's shoulder that gave them the best emphasis they could have had, George Vendale betook himself presently to the counting-house, and presently afterward to the address of M. Jules Obenreizer.

As he turned into Soho Square, and directed his steps toward its north side, a deepened color shot across his sun-browned face, which Wilding, if he had been a better observer, or had been less occupied with his own trouble, might have noticed when his partner read aloud a certain passage in their Swiss correspondent's letter, which he had not read so distinctly as the rest.

A curious colony of mountaineers has long been enclosed within that small flat London district of Soho. Swiss watch-makers, Swiss silver-chasers, Swiss jewelers, Swiss importers of Swiss musical boxes and Swiss toys of various kinds, draw close together there. Swiss professors of music, painting, and languages; Swiss artificers in steady work; Swiss couriers, and other Swiss servants chronically out of place; industrious Swiss laundresses and clear-starchers; mysteriously existing Swiss of both sexes; Swiss creditable and Swiss discreditable; Swiss to be trusted by all means, and Swiss to be trusted by no means; these diverse Swiss particles are attracted to a centre in the district of Soho. Shabby Swiss eating-houses, coffee-houses, and lodging-houses, Swiss drinks and dishes, Swiss service for Sundays, and Swiss schools for week-days, are all to be found there. Even the native-born English taverns drive a sort of broken English trade; announcing in their windows Swiss whets and drills, and sheltering in their bars Swiss skirmishes of love and animosity on most nights in the year.

When the new partner in Wilding & Co. rang the bell of a door bearing the blunt inscription OBENREIZER on a brass plate,—the inner door of a substantial house, whose ground story was devoted to the sale of Swiss clocks,—he passed at once into domestic Switzerland. A white-tiled stove for winter-time filled the fire-place of the room into which he was shown; the room's bare floor was laid together in a neat pattern of several ordinary woods; the room had a prevalent air of surface bareness and much scrubbing; and the little square of flowery carpet by the sofa, and the velvet chimney-board with its capacious clock and vases of artificial flowers, contended with that tone, as if, in bringing out the whole effect, a Parisian had adapted a dairy to domestic purposes.

Mimic water was dropping off a mill-wheel under the clock. The visitor had not stood before it, following it with his eyes, a minute, when M. Obenreizer, at his elbow, startled him by saying, in very good English, very slightly clipped: "How do you do? So glad!"

"I beg your pardon. I didn't hear you come in."

"Not at all! Sit, please."

Releasing his visitor's two arms, which he had lightly pinioned at the elbows by way of embrace, M. Obenreizer also sat, remarking, with a smile: "You are well? So glad!" and touching his elbows again.

"I don't know," said Vendale, after exchange of salutations, "whether you may yet have heard of me from your House at Neuchâtel?"

"Ah, yes!"

"In connection with Wilding & Co?"

"Ah, surely!"

"Is it not odd that I should come to you, in London here, as one of the Firm of Wilding & Co., to pay the Firm's respects?"

"Not at all! What did I always observe when we were on the mountains? We call them vast; but the world is so little. So little is the world, that one can not keep away from persons. There are so few persons in the world, that they continually cross and recross. So very little is the world, that one can not get rid of a person. Not," touching his elbows again, with an ingratiatory smile, "that one would desire to get rid of you."

"I hope not, M. Obenreizer."

"Please call me, in your country, Mr. I call myself so, for I love your country. If I could be English! But I am born. And you? Though descended from so fine a family, you have had the condescension to come into trade? Stop though. Wines? Is it trade, in England, or profession? Not fine art?"

"Mr. Obenreizer," returned Vendale, somewhat out of countenance, "I was but a silly young fellow, just of age, when I first had the pleasure of traveling with you, and when you and I, and Mademoiselle your niece—who is well?"

"Thank you. Who is well?"

"—Shared some slight glacier dangers together. If, with a boy's vanity, I rather vaunted my family, I hope I did so as a kind of introduction of myself. It was very weak, and in very bad taste; but perhaps you know our English proverb, 'Live and learn.'"

"You make too much of it," returned the Swiss. "And what the devil! After all, yours was a fine family."

George Vendale's laugh betrayed a little vexation, as he rejoined: "Well! I was strongly attached to my parents, and when we first traveled together, Mr. Obenreizer, I was in the first flush of coming into what my father and mother left me. So I hope it may have been, after all, more youthful openness of speech and heart than boastfulness."

"All openness of speech and heart! No boastfulness!" cried Obenreizer. "You tax yourself too heavily. You tax yourself, my faith! as if you was your government taxing you! Besides, it commenced with me. I remember, that evening in the boat upon the lake, floating among the reflections of the mountains and valleys, the crags and pine woods, which were my earliest remembrance, I drew a word-picture of my sordid childhood. Of our poor hut, by the waterfall which my mother showed to travelers; of the cow-shed where I slept with the cow; of my idiot half-brother always sitting at the door, or limping down the Pass to beg; of my half-sister always spinning, and resting her enormous goitre on a great stone; of my being a famished naked little wretch of two or three years, when they were men and women with hard hands to beat me, I, the only child of my father's second marriage,—if it even was a marriage. What more natural than for you to compare notes with me, and say, 'We are as one by age; at that same time I sat upon my mother's lap in my father's carriage, rolling through the rich English streets, all luxury surrounding me, all squalid poverty kept far from me. Such is my earliest remembrance as opposed to yours.'"

Mr. Obenreizer was a black-haired young man of a dark complexion, through whose swarthy skin no red glow ever shone. When color would have come into another cheek, a hardly discernible heat would come into his, as if the machinery for bringing up the ardent blood were there, but the machinery were dry. He was robustly made, well-proportioned, and had handsome features. Many would have perceived that some surface change in him would have set them more at their ease with him, without being able to define what change. If his lips could have been made much thicker, and his neck much thinner, they would have found their want supplied.

But the great Obenreizer peculiarity was, that a certain nameless film would come over his eyes—apparently by the action of his own will—which would impenetrably veil, not only from those tellers of tales, but from his face at large, every expression save one of attention. It by no means followed that his attention should be wholly given to the person with whom he spoke, or even wholly bestowed on present sounds and objects. Rather, it was a comprehensive watchfulness of every thing he had in his own mind, and every thing that he knew to be, or suspected to be, in the minds of other men.

At this stage of the conversation, Mr. Obenreizer's film came over him.

"The object of my present visit," said Vendale, "is, I need hardly say, to assure you of the friendliness of Wilding & Co., and of the goodness of your credit with us, and of our desire to be of service to you. We hope shortly to offer you our hospitality. Things are not quite in train with us yet, for my partner, Mr. Wilding, is reorganizing the domestic part of our establishment, and is interrupted by some private affairs. You don't know Mr. Wilding, I believe?"

Mr. Obenreizer did not.

"You must come together soon. He will be glad to have made your acquaintance, and I think I may predict that you will be glad to have made him. You have not been long established in London, I suppose, Mr. Obenreizer?"

"It is only now that I have undertaken this agency."

"Mademoiselle your niece—is—not married?"

"Not married."

George Vendale glanced about him, as if for any tokens of her.

"She has been in London?"

"She is in London."

"When, and where, might I have the honor of recalling myself to her remembrance?"

Mr. Obenreizer, discarding his film and touching his visitor's elbows as before, said lightly: "Come up stairs."

Fluttered enough by the suddenness with which the interview he had sought was coming upon him after all, George Vendale followed up stairs. In a room over the chamber he had just quitted—a room also Swiss appointed,—a young lady sat near one of three windows, working at an embroidery frame; and an older lady sat with her face turned close to another white-tiled stove (though it was summer, and the stove was not lighted), cleaning gloves. The young lady wore an unusual quantity of fair bright hair, very prettily braided about a rather rounder white forehead than the average English type, and so her face might have been a shade—or say a light—rounder than the average English face, and her figure slightly rounder than the figure of the average English girl at nineteen. A remarkable indication of freedom and grace of limb, in her quiet attitude, and a wonderful purity and freshness of color in her dimpled face and bright gray eyes, seemed fraught with mountain air. Switzerland, too, though the general fashion of her dress was English, peeped out of the fanciful bodice she wore, and lurked in the curious clocked red stocking, and in its little silver-buckled shoe. As to the elder lady, sitting with her feet apart upon the lower brass ledge of the stove, supporting a lap-full of gloves while she cleaned one stretched on her left hand, she was a true Swiss impersonation of another kind; from the breadth of her cushion-like back, and the ponderosity of her respectable legs (if the word be admissible), to the black velvet band tied tightly round her throat for the repression of a rising tendency to goitre; or, higher still, to her great copper-colored gold ear-rings; or, higher still, to her head-dress of black gauze stretched on wire.

"Miss Marguerite," said Obenreizer to the young lady, "do you recollect this gentleman?"

"I think," she answered, rising from her seat, surprised and a little confused, "it is Mr. Vendale?"

"I think it is," said Obenreizer, dryly. "Permit me, Mr. Vendale. Madame Dor."

The elder lady by the stove, with the glove stretched on her left hand, like a glove's sign, half got up, half looked over her broad shoulder, and wholly plumped down again and rubbed away.

"Madame Dor," said Obenreizer, smiling, "is so kind as to keep me free from stain or tear. Madame Dor humors my weakness for being always neat, and devotes her time to removing every one of my specks and spots."

Madame Dor, with the stretched glove in the air, and her eyes closely scrutinizing its palm, discovered a tough spot in Mr. Obenreizer at that instant, and rubbed hard at him. George Vendale took his seat by the embroidery-frame (having first taken the fair right hand that his entrance had checked), and glanced at the gold cross that dipped into the bodice, with something of the devotion of a pilgrim, who had reached his shrine at last. Obenreizer stood in the middle of the room with his thumbs in his waistcoat-pockets, and became filmy.

"He was saying down stairs, Miss Obenreizer," observed Vendale, "that the world is so small a place, that people can not escape one another. I have found it much too large for me since I saw you last."

"Have you traveled so far, then?" she inquired.

"Not so far, for I have only gone back to Switzerland each year; but I could have wished—and indeed I have wished very often—that the little world did not afford such opportunities for long escapes as it does. If it had been less, I might have found my fellow-travelers sooner, you know."

The pretty Marguerite colored, and very slightly glanced in the direction of Madame Dor.

"You find us at length, Mr. Vendale. Perhaps you may lose us again."

"I trust not. The curious coincidence that has enabled me to find you, encourages me to hope not."

"What is that coincidence, sir, if you please?" A dainty little native touch in this turn of speech and in its tone made it perfectly captivating, thought George Vendale, when again he noticed an instantaneous glance toward Madame Dor. A caution seemed to be conveyed in it, rapid flash though it was; so he quietly took heed of Madame Dor from that time forth.

"It is that I happen to have become a partner in a house of business in London, to which Mr. Obenreizer happens this very day to be expressly recommended; and that, too, by another house of business in Switzerland, in which (as it turns out) we both have a commercial interest. He has not told you?"

"Ah!" cried Obenreizer, striking in, filmless. "No. I had not told Miss Marguerite. The world is so small and so monotonous that a surprise is worth having in such a little jog-trot place. It is as he tells you, Miss Marguerite. He, of so fine a family, and so proudly bred, has condescended to trade. To trade! Like us poor peasants, who have risen from ditches!"

A cloud crept over the fair brow, and she cast down her eyes.

"Why, it is good for trade!" pursued Obenreizer, enthusiastically. "It ennobles trade! It is the misfortune of trade, it is its vulgarity, that any low people—for example, we poor peasants—may take to it and climb by it. See you, my dear Vendale!" He spoke with great energy.

"The father of Miss Marguerite, my eldest half-brother, more than two times your age or mine, if living now, wandered without shoes, almost without rags, from that wretched pass,—wandered,—wandered,—got to be fed with the mules and dogs at an Inn in the main valley far away,—got to be Boy there,—got to be Ostler,—got to be Waiter,—got to be Cook,—got to be Landlord. As Landlord, he took me (could he take the idiot beggar, his brother, or the spinning monstrosity, his sister?) to put as pupil to the famous watch-maker, his neighbor and friend. His wife dies when Miss Marguerite is born. What is his will, and what are his words, to me, when he dies, she being between girl and woman? 'All for Marguerite, except so much by the year for you. You are young, but I make her your ward, for you were of the obscurest and the poorest peasantry, and so was I, and so was her mother; we were abject peasants all, and you will remember it.' The thing is equally true of most of my countrymen, now in trade in this your London quarter of Soho. Peasants once; low-born drudging Swiss Peasants. Then how good and great for trade!—here, from having been warm, he became playfully jubilant, and touched the young wine merchant's elbows again with his light embrace—"to be exalted by gentlemen!"

"I do not think so," said Marguerite, with a flushed cheek, and a look away from the visitor, that was almost defiant. "I think it is as much exalted by us peasants."

"Fie, fie, Miss Marguerite," said Obenreizer. "You speak in proud England."

"I speak in proud earnest," she answered, quietly resuming her work, "and I am not English, but a Swiss peasant's daughter."

There was a dismissal of the subject in her words, which Vendale could not contend against. He only said in an earnest manner, "I most heartily agree with you, Miss Obenreizer, and I have already said so, as Mr. Obenreizer will bear witness," which he by no means did, "in this house."

Now, Vendale's eyes were quick eyes, and sharply watching Madame Dor by times, noted something in the broad back view of that lady. There was considerable pantomimic expression in her glove-cleaning. It had been very softly done when he spoke, with Marguerite, or it had altogether stopped, like the action of a listener. When Obenreizer's peasant-speech came to an end, she rubbed most vigorously, as if applauding it. And once or twice, as the glove (which she always held before her, a little above her face) turned in the air, or as this finger went down, or that went up, he even fancied that it made some telegraphic communication to Obenreizer: whose back was certainly never turned upon it, though he did not seem at all to heed it.

Vendale observed, too, that in Marguerite's dismissal of the subject twice forced upon him to his misrepresentation, there was an indignant treatment of her guardian which she tried to check: as though she would have flamed out against him, but for the influence of fear. He also observed—though this was not much—that he never advanced within the distance of her at which he first placed himself; as though there were limits fixed between them. Neither had he ever spoken of her without the prefix "Miss," though whenever he uttered it, it was with the faintest trace of an air of mockery. And now it occurred to Vendale for the first time that something curious in the man, which he had never before been able to define, was definable as a certain subtle essence of mockery, that eluded touch or analysis. He felt convinced that Marguerite was in some sort a prisoner as to her free will; though she held her own against those two combined, by the force of her character, which was nevertheless inadequate to her release. To feel convinced of this, was not to feel less disposed to love her than he had always been. In a word, he was desperately in love with her, and thoroughly determined to pursue the opportunity which had opened at last.

For the present, he merely touched upon the pleasure that Wilding & Co. would soon have in entreating Miss Obenreizer to honor their establishment with her presence,—a curious old place, though a bachelor house withal,—and so did not protract his visit beyond such a visit's ordinary length. Going down stairs, conducted by his host, he found the Obenreizer counting-house at the back of the entrance-hall, and several shabby men in outlandish garments, hanging about, whom Obenreizer put aside that he might pass, with a few words in patois.

"Countrymen," he explained, as he attended Vendale to the door. "Poor compatriots. Grateful and attached, like dogs! Good-bye. To meet again. So glad!"

Two more light touches on his elbows dismissed him into the street.

Sweet Marguerite at her frame, and Madame Dor's broad back at her telegraph, floated before him to Cripple Corner. On his arrival there, Wilding was closeted with Bintrey. The cellar doors happening to be open, Vendale lighted a candle in a cleft stick, and went down for a cellarous stroll. Graceful Marguerite floated before him faithfully, but Madame Dor's broad back remained outside.

The vaults were very spacious, and very old. There had been a stone crypt down there, when by-gones were not by-gones; some said, part of a monkish refectory; some said, of a chapel; some said, of a Pagan temple. It was all one now. Let who would make what he liked of a crumbled pillar and a broken arch or so. Old Time had made what he liked of it, and was quite indifferent to contradiction.

The close air, the musty smell, and the thunderous rumbling in the streets above, as being out of the routine of ordinary life, went well enough with the picture of pretty Marguerite holding her own against those two. So Vendale went on until, at a turning in the vaults, he saw a light like the light he carried.

"Oh! You are here, are you, Joey?"

"Oughtn't it rather to go, 'Oh! You're here, are you, Master George?' For it's my business to be here. But it ain't yours."

"Don't grumble, Joey."

"Oh! I don't grumble," returned the Cellarman. "If any thing grumbles, it's what I've took in through the pores; it ain't me. Have a care as something in you don't begin a-grumbling, Master George. Stop here long enough for the vapors to work, and they'll be at it."

His present occupation consisted of poking his head into the bins, making measurements and mental calculations, and entering them in a rhinoceros-hide-looking note-book, like a piece of himself.

"They'll be at it," he resumed, laying the wooden rod that he measured with, across two casks, entering his last calculation, and straightening his back, "trust 'em! And so you've regularly come into the business, Master George?"

"Regularly. I hope you don't object, Joey?"

"I don't, bless you. But vapors objects that you're too young. You're both on you too young."

"We shall get over that objection day by day, Joey."

"Ay, Master George; but I shall, day by day, get over the objection that I'm too old, and so I shan't be capable of seeing much improvement in you."

The retort so tickled Joey Ladle that he grunted forth a laugh and delivered it again, grunting forth another laugh after the second edition of "improvement in you."

"But what's no laughing matter, Master George," he resumed, straightening his back once more, "is, that Young Master Wilding has gone and changed the luck. Mark my words. He has changed the luck, and he'll find it out. I ain't been down here all my life for nothing! I know by what I notices down here, when it's a-going to rain, when it's a-going to hold up, when it's a-going to blow, when it's a-going to be calm. I know, by what I notices down here when the luck's changed, quite as well."

"Has this growth on the roof any thing to do with your divination?" asked Vendale, holding his light toward a gloomy ragged growth of dark fungus, pendent from the arches with a very disagreeable and repellent effect. "We are famous for this growth in this vault, aren't we?"

"We are, Master George," replied Joey Ladle, moving a step or two away, "and if you'll be advised by me, you'll let it alone."

Taking up the rod just now laid across the two casks, and faintly moving the languid fungus with it, Vendale asked, "Ay, indeed? Why so?"

"Why, not so much because it rises from the casks of wine, and may leave you to judge what sort of stuff a Cellarman takes into himself when he walks in the same all the days of his life, nor yet so much because at a stage of its growth it's maggots, and you'll fetch 'em down upon you," returned Joey Ladle, still keeping away, "as for another reason, Master George."

"What other reason?"

"(I wouldn't keep on touchin' it, if I was you, sir.) I'll tell you if you'll come out of the place. First, take a look at its color, Master George."

"I am doing so."

"Done, sir. Now, come out of the place."

He moved away with his light, and Vendale followed with his. When Vendale came up with him, and they were going back together, Vendale eying him as they walked through the arches, said: "Well, Joey? The color?"

"Is it like clotted blood, Master George?"

"Like enough, perhaps."

"More than enough, I think," muttered Joey Ladle, shaking his head solemnly.

"Well, say it is like; say it is exactly like. What then?"

"Master George, they do say—"

"Who?"

"How should I know who?" rejoined the Cellarman, apparently much exasperated by the unreasonable nature of the question. "Them! Them as says pretty well every thing, you know. How should I know who they are, if you don't?"

"True. Go on."

"They do say that the man that gets by any accident a piece of that dark growth right upon his breast, will, for sure and certain, die by Murder."

As Vendale laughingly stopped to meet the Cellarman's eyes, which he had fastened on his light while dreamingly saying those words, he suddenly became conscious of being struck upon his own breast by a heavy hand. Instantly following with his eyes the action of the hand that struck him—which was his companion's—he saw that it had beaten off his breast a web or clot of the fungus, even then floating to the ground.

For a moment he turned upon the Cellarman almost as scared a look as the Cellarman turned upon him. But in another moment they had reached the daylight at the foot of the cellar-steps, and before he cheerfully sprang up them, he blew out his candle and the superstition together.

EXIT WILDING.

On the morning of the next day, Wilding went out alone, after leaving a message with his clerk. "If Mr. Vendale should ask for me," he said; "or if Mr. Bintrey should call, tell them I am gone to the Foundling." All that his partner had said to him, all that his lawyer, following on the same side, could urge, had left him persisting unshaken in his own point of view. To find the lost man, whose place he had usurped, was now the paramount interest of his life, and to inquire at the Foundling was plainly to take the first step in the direction of discovery. To the Foundling, accordingly, the wine merchant now went.

The once-familiar aspect of the building was altered to him, as the look of the portrait over the chimney-piece was altered to him. His one dearest association with the place which had sheltered his childhood had been broken away from it forever. A strange reluctance possessed him, when he stated his business at the door. His heart ached as he sat alone in the waiting-room while the Treasurer of the Institution was being sent for to see him. When the interview began it was only by a painful effort that he could compose himself sufficiently to mention the nature of his errand.

The Treasurer listened with a face which promised all needful attention, and promised nothing more.

"We are obliged to be cautious," he said, when it came to his turn to speak, "about all inquiries which are made by strangers."

"You can hardly consider me a stranger," answered Wilding, simply. "I was one of your poor lost children here, in the by-gone time."

The Treasurer politely rejoined that this circumstance inspired him with a special interest in his visitor. But he pressed, nevertheless, for that visitor's motive in making his inquiry. Without further preface, Wilding told him his motive, suppressing nothing.

The Treasurer rose, and led the way into the room in which the registers of the Institution were kept. "All the information which our books can give is heartily at your service," he said. "After the time that has elapsed, I am afraid it is the only information we have to offer you."

The books were consulted, and the entry was found, expressed as follows:

"3d March, 1836. Adopted and removed from the Foundling Hospital, a male infant, named Walter Wilding. Name and condition of the person adopting the child,—Mrs. Jane Ann Miller, widow. Address,—Lime-Tree Lodge, Groombridge Wells. References,—the Reverend John Harker, Groombridge Wells; and Messrs. Giles, Jeremie, & Giles, bankers, Lombard Street."

"Is that all?" asked the wine merchant. "Had you no after-communication with Mrs. Miller?"

"None,—or some reference to it must have appeared in this book."

"May I take a copy of the entry?"

"Certainly! You are a little agitated. Let me make the copy for you."

"My only chance, I suppose," said Wilding, looking sadly at the copy, "is to inquire at Mrs. Miller's residence, and to try if her references can help me?"

"That is the only chance I see at present," answered the Treasurer. "I heartily wish I could have been of some further assistance to you."

With those farewell words to comfort him, Wilding set forth on the journey of investigation which began from the Foundling doors. The first stage to make for was plainly the house of business of the bankers in Lombard Street. Two of the partners in the firm were inaccessible to chance-visitors when he asked for them. The third, after raising certain inevitable difficulties, consented to let a clerk examine the Ledger marked with the initial letter "M." The account of Mrs. Miller, widow, of Groombridge Wells, was found. Two long lines in faded ink were drawn across it; and at the bottom of the page there appeared this note: "Account closed, September 30th, 1837."

So the first stage of the journey was reached,—and so it ended in No Thoroughfare! After sending a note to Cripple Corner to inform his partner that his absence might be prolonged for some hours, Wilding took his place in the train, and started for the second stage of the journey,—Mrs. Miller's residence at Groombridge Wells.

Mothers and children traveled with him; mothers and children met each other at the station; mothers and children were in the shops when he entered them to inquire for Lime-Tree Lodge. Everywhere, the nearest and dearest of human relations showed itself happily in the happy light of day. Everywhere he was reminded of the treasured delusion from which he had been awakened so cruelly,—of the lost memory which had passed from him like a reflection from a glass.

Inquiring here, inquiring there, he could hear of no such place as Lime-Tree Lodge. Passing a house-agent's office, he went in wearily, and put the question for the last time. The house-agent pointed across the street to a dreary mansion of many windows, which might have been a manufactory, but which was an hotel.

"That's where Lime-Tree Lodge stood, sir," said the man, "ten years ago."

The second stage reached, and No Thoroughfare again!

But one chance was left. The clerical reference, Mr. Harker, still remained to be found. Customers coming in at the moment to occupy the house-agent's attention, Wilding went down the street, and entering a bookseller's shop, asked if he could be informed of the Reverend John Harker's present address.

The bookseller looked unaffectedly shocked and astonished, and made no answer.

Wilding repeated his question.

The bookseller took up from his counter a prim little volume in a binding of sober gray. He handed it to his visitor, open at the title-page. Wilding read—

"The martyrdom of the Reverend John Harker in New Zealand. Related by a former member of his flock."

Wilding put the book down on the counter. "I beg your pardon," he said, thinking a little, perhaps, of his own present martyrdom while he spoke. The silent bookseller acknowledged the apology by a bow. Wilding went out.

Third and last stage, and No Thoroughfare for the third and last time.

There was nothing more to be done; there was absolutely no choice but to go back to London, defeated at all points. From time to time on the return journey, the wine merchant looked at his copy of the entry in the Foundling Register. There is one among the many forms of despair—perhaps the most pitiable of all—which persists in disguising itself as hope. Wilding checked himself in the act of throwing the useless morsel of paper out of the carriage window. "It may lead to something yet," he thought. "While I live I won't part with it. When I die, my executors shall find it sealed up with my will."

Now, the mention of his will set the good wine merchant on a new track of thought, without diverting his mind from its engrossing subject. He must make his will immediately.

The application of the phrase No Thoroughfare to the case had originated with Mr. Bintrey. In their first long conference following the discovery, that sagacious personage had a hundred times repeated, with an obstructive shake of the head, "No Thoroughfare, Sir, No Thoroughfare. My belief is that there is no way out of this at this time of day, and my advice is, make yourself comfortable where you are."

In the course of the protracted consultation, a mugnum of the forty-five-year-old port wine had been produced for the wetting of Mr. Bintrey's legal whistle; but the more clearly he saw his way through the wine, the more emphatically he did not see his way through the case; repeating, as often as he set his glass down empty, "Mr. Wilding, No Thoroughfare. Rest and be thankful."

It is certain that the honest wine merchant's anxiety to make a will, originated in profound conscientiousness; though it is possible (and quite consistent with his rectitude) that he may unconsciously have derived some feeling of relief from the prospect of delegating his own difficulty to two other men who were to come after him. Be that as it may, he pursued his new track of thought with great ardor, and lost no time in begging George Vendale and Mr. Bintrey to meet him in Cripple Corner and share his confidence.

"Being all three assembled with closed doors," said Mr. Bintrey, addressing the new partner on the occasion, "I wish to observe, before our friend (and my client) intrusts us with his further views, that I have indorsed what I understand from him to have been your advice, Mr. Vendale, and what would be the advice of every sensible man. I have told him that he positively must keep his secret. I have spoken with Mrs. Goldstraw, both in his presence and in his absence; and if any body is to be trusted (which is a very large IF), I think she is to be trusted to that extent. I have pointed out to our friend (and my client), that to set on foot random inquiries would not only be to raise the Devil, in the likeness of all the swindlers in the kingdom, but would also be to waste the estate. Now you see, Mr. Vendale, our friend (and my client) does not desire to waste the estate, but on the contrary, desires to husband it for what he considers—but I can't say I do—the rightful owner, if such rightful owner should ever be found. I am very much mistaken if he ever will be, but never mind that. Mr. Wilding and I are, at least, agreed that the estate is not to be wasted. Now, I have yielded to Mr. Wilding's desire to keep an advertisement at intervals flowing through the newspapers, cautiously inviting any person who may know anything about that adopted infant, taken from the Foundling Hospital, to come to my office; and I have pledged myself that such advertisement shall regularly appear. I have gathered from our friend (and my client) that I meet you here to-day to take his instructions, not to give him advice. I am prepared to receive his instructions, and to respect his wishes; but you will please observe that this does not imply my approval of either as a matter of professional opinion."

Thus Mr. Bintrey, talking quite as much as Wilding as to Vendale. And yet, in spite of his care for his client, he was so amused by his client's Quixotic conduct, as to eye him from time to time with twinkling eyes, in the light of a highly comical curiosity.

"Nothing," observed Wilding, "can be clearer. I only wish my head were as clear as yours, Mr. Bintrey."

"If you feel that singing in it, coming on," hinted the lawyer, with an alarmed glance, "put it off,—I mean the interview."

"Not at all, I thank you," said Wilding.

"What was I going to—"

"Don't excite yourself, Mr. Wilding," urged the lawyer.

"No; I wasn't going to," said the wine merchant. "Mr. Bintrey and George Vendale, would you have any hesitation or objection to become my joint trustees and executors, or can you at once consent?"

"I consent," replied George Vendale, readily.

"I consent," said Bintrey, not so readily.

"Thank you both. Mr. Bintrey, my instructions for my last will and testament are short and plain. Perhaps you will now have the goodness to take them down. I leave the whole of my real and personal estate, without any exception or reservation whatsoever, to you two, my joint trustees and executors, in trust to pay over the whole to the true Walter Wilding, if he shall be found and identified within two years after the day of my death. Failing that, in trust to you two to pay over the whole as a benefaction and legacy to the Foundling Hospital."

"Those are all your instructions, are they, Mr. Wilding?" demanded Bintrey, after a blank silence, during which nobody had looked at any body.

"The whole."

"And as to those instructions, you have absolutely made up your mind, Mr. Wilding?"

"Absolutely, decidedly, finally."

"It only remains," said the lawyer, with one shrug of his shoulders, "to get them into technical and binding form, and to execute and
